That Jonathan Russell informed the complainant, that when he left New York he was authorized by R. M. & Co. to say, that they would forward to him at Charleston, letters of guaranty from their friends, Clark & Nightingale, of Providence, addressed to the complainant, and that he expected soon to receive them.

That he soon afterwards presented to the complainant the before-mentioned letters of Clark & Nightingale, of the 20th and 21st of January, 1796, and that, confiding in the responsibility and integrity of C. & N., and in the purity and simplicity of their views, he indorsed *the bills in questiou, amounting in the [*71 whole to £3,886 10*s.* 8*d.* sterling.

That Clark & Nightingale knew that the house of R. M. & Co. began business without capital, under their patronage, and were supported by their credit, and that in the year 1795 it was found requisite, in New York and Boston, where the house of R. M. & Co. chiefly did business, that their bills of exchange, in order to their being negotiated in those places, should have the indorsement of C. & N., and even then it was necessary they should be drawn for very small sums.

That the advances and responsibilities of the house of C. & N. for that of R. M. & Co. were originally predicated chiefly upon their personal honor and integrity, and afterwards continued upon the assurances of R. M. & Co. that in case of disastrous events they should be secured by a priority of indemnity. And that upon like assurances C. &. N. agreed to aid R. M. & Co. with funds and credit to enable them to carry on the Charleston speculation which had been concerted between them; and had agreed to give them a letter of credit and guaranty to the complainant; and if the letters sent did not, in legal construction, amount to such (which the complainant does not admit), it must have arisen either from the defendant, Clark, accidentally penning the letters in terms that did not quite come up to the idea intended by himself (in which case it would be contrary to equity and good conscience, that he should be permitted to avail himself of such accident to the injury of the complainant), or from the terms being artfully and fraudulently contrived by the defendants, Clark, to give to the complainant the impression he intended, and yet by secret reservation to leave a door open for his own escape.

That the deceased partner of the defendant (Nightingale) in his life-time, confessed that the house of C. & N. was bound by their letters to indemnify the complaiuant; and that Clark has offered to compromise.

The bill further states, that the recommendations of the house of R. M. & Co., given by C. & N., were fallacions *and unwarranted, [*72 covenous and deceitful, and were made in consequence of a concerted plan to put R. M. & Co. into possession of large property, upon credit, to give the chance in the first instance of great profits to that house, in case the speculation should be successful, and finally, whether successful or not, to briug to the hands of C. & N. large reimbursements from the proceeds of property so to be acquired, and that accordingly, shortly after, it was known in America that the house of R. M. & Co. must fall, the defendant, Clark, availed himself of the private stipulations before alluded to, by obtaining from that house the greater part of their property, including the proceeds of the rice purchased upon the credit of the complainants' indorsements.

That J. B. Murray, who was named a trustee, being a citizen of New York, could not be compelled to appear in the Circuit Court, at Rhode Island, and, therefore, is not made a party.

The complainant exhibited copies of five deeds from R. M. & Co., assigning their property to the defendant, Clark, viz., one dated 23d March, 1798, one 24th March, 1798; two dated 22d of March, 1799, and one 31st of May, 1800; and called for the originals.

The bill avers that the house of R. M. & Co. has been duly declared bankrupt, and discharged; that the assignees under the commission are resident in New York, and could not be made parties to this bill; and that, in fact, there was nothing left to assign to them the previous assignments to the defendant, having transferred the whole.

That Joseph & William Russell assigned away all their property, so that the complainant cannot enforce against them the judgment at law which he had obtained upon their letter of credit.

That in the deed of the 24th of March, 1798, among the uses to which the assigned property is to be applied, is the following, viz.: "Also "for the sum or sums which the said Clark & "Nightingale have paid, or are liable to pay, on "a suit commenced against them by Nathaniel "Russell, of Charleston, South Carolinia, for 73] "*amount of certain bills of exchange, "there drawn in his favor by Jonathan Russell, "of New York, for the amount of three thous- "and nine hundred and uinety-eight pounds "seven shillings and twopence sterling, or "thereabouts." And in a subsequent part of the same deed, another use declared is, "to re- "tain, and pay to Joseph & William Russell "the amount that shall be recovered and paid "from them to Nathaniel Russell, of Charles- "tou, in South Carolina, upon account of a "letter of credit to him, given by the said "Joseph & William Russell, in favor of Jona- "than Russell," &c.

The complainant further states that, although he is unable to compel the payment from Joseph & William Russell, by reason of their having assigned away all their effects, yet William, who has survived Joseph, refuses to assent, or afford any aid in converting those funds to the relief of the complainant; and the defendant has the use of the property for an indefinite time, and refuses to account therefor to the complainant.

He further charges, that C. & N. were dormant copartners with R. M. & Co., in the Charleston speculation; that R.M. & Co. were, at the time of the recommendation from the complainant, deeply involved in debts, which they had not the means of discharging, that their credit was fictitious, and the fiction created and kept up by C. & N., who were privy to their transactions, and who knew that the representation they made was false, and fraudulent.

The bill seeks a discovery of the funds of R. M. & Co., in the hands of the defendant, Clark, and of the trusts upon which he holds them, and the manner in which he has applied them or any part of them; and prays that the intention of the parties as to the guaranty, may be enforced; that the proceeds of the rice purchased by means of the complainants' indorsements may be applied to his relief; that the defendant, Clark, may be compelled to execute the trust reposed in him, and to apply to his indemnification the funds set apart for the indemnification of Clark & Nightingale, and of Joseph and William Russell; and that he may have such other relief as his case may require and be entitled to.

*The deed of assignment of the 23d [74 of March, 1798, transferred all the property and effects of the firm of R. M. Co., in the United States, to the defendant, Clark, and J. B. Murray, to pay the balances due them, and to such other creditors as R. M. & Co. should nominate withiu twelve months; reserving to them also the power to appoint new trustees instead of Clark and J. B. Murray, if they should think proper. This assignment was made expressly subject to certain prior liens on certain parts of the property, which are particularly set forth; one of which was an assignment to Loomis & Tillinghast, of a policy on certain goods laden on board the ship Jefferson, and a policy on goods on board the ship Butler, and four promissory notes of Mott and Lawrence, amouuting to 6,460 dollars, the proceeds of which were to be applied, first to indemnify and secure Loomis & Tillinghast for a debt due to them, and for responsibilities they had, or were about to incur, and out of the surplus to pay to Joseph & William Russell, of Providence, all such moneys as they should be liable to pay as guaranty to the defendant. This assignment was afterwards transferred by Loomis & Tillinghast to Clark in consideratiou of 60,000 dollars, of R. M. & Co's. notes, indorsed by L. & T., giveu up to them by Clark.

The deed of the 24th of March, 1798, contained an express power in R. M. & Co. to revoke or alter the directions and appointments therein contained, and to make other appointments and give other directions, within twelve months from that date. In pursuance of which power, they did, by an indenture tripartite, dated the 21st of March, 1799, between R. M. and Co., of the first part, the defendant Clark, and J. B. Murray of the second part, and the defendant and J. B. Murray and other creditors, of the third part, revoke and annul the deed of the 24th of March, 1798; and substituted no other trust for the indemnification of the defendant, Clark, against his liability to the complainant.

The deed of the 22d of March, 1799, which declared the new trusts, under which the defendant, Clark, and J. B. Murray should hold the assigned property, directs them to pay "to William Russell, as surviving *part- [75 "ner of the firm of Joseph & William Rus- "sell, the amount that shall be paid by them "on a judgment recovered against them by "Nathaniel Russell, of Charleston, in South "Carolina, for the amount of £3998, 7*s*.2*d*. ster "ling in bills of exchange guaranteed by him "by the said Joseph & William Russell in "favor of the drawer, Jonathan Russell. And "the said parties of the first part do hereby or- "der and direct the said parties of the second "part to allow and pay, in manner before "mentioned, to the parties of the third part, in "addition to the claims herein before admitted, "all charges of suit and other expenses paid "upon the said several claims, together with in- "terest due thereon, payable in like mauner "with the claims as herein before recited."

This deed also contained a power of revocation and of making new appointments of trust.

On the 31st of May, 1800, (the day before the bankrupt law of the United States was to go into operation) R. M. & Co. made their final declaration of trust, under the power reserved in their former deeds; and expressing an intention to alter and add to the trusts formerly declared, but without expressing any intention of revoking any of them, they designate five successive classes of creditors to be paid in the order in which they are named; but neither of those classes included an indemnity to the defendant, Clark, or to William Russell, against their liability to the complainant.

The defendant, Clark, in his answer, admits his letters of the 20th and 21st of January, 1796, to the complainant, but does not admit that the complainaint at that time considered them as letters of credit, or guaranty, or that he indorsed the bills upon the faith of those letters. He avers that they were intended only as letters of introduction and recommendation, and not as letters of credit or of guaranty, and that the house of R. M. & Co. was then in good credit. He denies that the house of C. & N. had any interest in the purchases made in Charlestou by Jouathau Russell. He does not admit that any bills of R. M. & Co., with the indorsement of C. & N., were negotiated in New York. He denies that he had any reason to suspect that [*76 the credit of the *house of R. M. & Co., was fictitious and not real. He denies that C. & N. attempted to give them a false credit to deceive the public or auy person. He avers that he as well as the house of C. & N. had full faith aud confidence in the responsibility and solvency, the honor and integrity, of the house of R. M. & Co., and had no agreement or understanding with them for their indemnity or security in case of any disastrous event, of which he had no apprehension. He denies that C. & N. ever made any agreement to aid R.M. & Co. in raising funds for the speculation in Carolina produce, and that they ever asked from C. & N. any letter of guaranty to go or be sent to Charleston. He denies that they ever promised such letter of guaranty, or gave R.M. & Co. any authority to instruct their agent to assure any person that such letter of guaranty should be furnished by them. He denies that the letters of 20th and 21st of January were designed or written in artful and ambiguous terms with intent to deceive. He does not admit that his partner, Nightingale, acknowledged that they were letters of guaranty, or that the house of C. & N. were bound thereby to indemnify the complainant.

He avers that C. & N. never asked, and R. M. & Co. never offered, any security for their responsibilities until after the failure of R. M. & Co. was publicly known in the United States. He admits the deeds and assignments to himself and J. B. Murray, as set forth in the complainant's bill, and admits the receipt of large sums of money, a part of which has been applied, and part remaius to be applied, to the objects of the trust. He states that since the execution of the deeds of assignment to him and J. B. Murray, Robert Murray has been discharged as a bankrupt, under the law of the United States; and the assignees under that commission have brought suit in equity in New York against this defendant, and J. B. Murray and R. M. & Co., claiming an account of the assigned property and praying that it may be transferred to them; which suit is still pending.

He declares his belief that the assigned property will be sufficient to discharge all the appropriations made by the deeds of trust, and also the whole claim due to the complainant, but denies that it is liable in his hands therefor.

*William Russell, in his answer, admits [*77 the guaranty and judgment, and the insolvency of the house of Joseph & William Russell. He states that he has uo knowledge that R. M. & Co. ever conveyed any property to the defendant, Clark, and J. B. Murray, in trust to indemnify him, but if there be any such conveyance he is willing that the complainant should have the beuefit thereof.

There was evidence that bills of exchange for £5,500*l.* sterling, drawn in eighteen sets by R. M. & Co. and indorsed by Clark & Nightingale, were sold in Boston in December, 1795, and January, 1796, and derived credit chiefly from their indorsement.

There was also evidence to prove that the house of R. M. & Co. were in good credit until after January, 1796.

The decree, in the court below, was rendered, by consent, against the complainant, who brought his writ of error.

Dexter, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the letters themselves, under the circumstances of the case, imposed a liability upon Clark & Nightingale to indemnify the plaintiff; and,

2. That the defendant, Clark, was liable by reason of the funds which he held in trust for the plaintiff's indemnification.

1st. In support of the first point he contended, first, that the letters themselves created an absolute responsibility. 2d. That if they did not of themselves create an absolute responsibility, yet they contained a direct affirmation of a fact which the defendant must show to be true, or must prove that he was himself deceived; and 3d. That the evidence shows that the affirmation contained in the defendant's letters was not true, and that he was guilty of such negligence and falsehood as will render him liable to indemnify the plaintiff.

1st. The defendant is absolutely bound by these letters. *They contain an unquali- [*78 fied assertion of a fact—the responsibility and integrity of R. M. & Co. In other cases, if a man will assert positively a fact, and request another person to act upon the faith of such assertion, he is bound to make good his assertion, or to compensate the injury which he has sustained who placed confidence iu such assertion.

Thus, if a persou covenant that he has a good title, he is bound to make it good or to repair the damage sustained by his defect of title. This is the case of a covenant under seal.

So in a policy of insurance, the positive assertion of a fact is a warranty, and he who makes it is bound to prove it to be true. This is a case not under seal.

In the present case, it is more reasonable that C. & N. should sustain the loss, because they voluntcered the affirmation, and with a view to induce the plaintiff to give credit to R. M. & Co. Words spoken upon inquiry made for iu-formatiou will not bind, if he who spoke them was himself deceived.

But the present case is not like that, it was not a sudden answer made on inquiry; it was a deliberate affirmation, in writing, made to one who they knew would place confidence in their representatiou of a fact which they had the means of knowing, and which they ought to have known, before they asserted it in such a manner. It was not a letter of friendship, but of business. It requested the plaintiff "to render them every assistance in his power;" that is, to aid them with his credit.

If a man receive services upou request, he is bound to remunerate them. Is there in reason, justice, or law, any difference between services rendered and responsibilities incurred? In the present case, C. & N. not only requested the plaintiff to lend his credit to R. M. & Co., but told him he might be assured of their complying fully with any contract or eugagement they might enter into with him. If the words had been "we assure you," &c., there could have been no doubt of their responsibility. But when they say "you may be assured," &c., it is evident they meant the same thing. It was their 79] *assurance, whether expressed in the one way or the other; and it was their assurance upon which the plaintiff acted.

2d. But if these words are so artfully selected that they would uot in a court of law bind the defendant, yet if they were calculated to deceive, and intended to induce the plaintiff to give credit to R. M. & Co.; if they were such as between merchants, were understood to guaranty the credit of the persons recommended, they will have that effect in equity.

C. & N. ought to have been assured of the fact of the solidity of the house of R. M. & Co. before they stated it so positively.

They ought to have inquired of them the state of their affairs. It is not sufficient for them to say that they did not know but the fact was so. If they were not certain, they ought to have stated the simple truth—that it was a young house, had been conducting business for some time, and sustained a good character. That they themselves had given them credit to a considerable amount and that they were still their debtors. If C. & N. had written thus, as they ought to have done, the plaintiff would not have given them credit; he would have continued to hold the rice until he had security, aud would not have given it up, but upon the faith of letters which in his opinion would bind C. & N. to indemnify him.

They must have known that they were not justified in stating the facts as they did. There were facts withiu their knowledge which ought to have excited their suspicions of the credit of R. M. & Co.—particularly the fact that their bills could not be sold without the indorsement of C. & N., and then only in small sums. The knowledge of the great losses of R. M. & Co. by captures in 1794, and the fact that they began business without capital, ought to have made C. & N. more careful. That C. & N. trusted them, is not evidence that they believed them solid. They had a personal confidence that R. M. & Co. would secure them by assignments in case of difficulty, as, in fact, they did.

80*] *2. As to the trust. It is objected that the assignments are to the defendant, Clark, and J. B. Murray jointly, and that the latter is not made a defendant to this bill. But he was not within the jurisdiction of the court, and by the act of Congress he could not be made a defendant unless he had been found in Rhode Island. By the practice of courts of equity, they will not dismiss a bill for want of parties who cannot be served with process. (2 Atk., 510, Darwent v. Walton.)

Another reason for charging Clark alone is, that he has received by far the greater part of the funds of R. M. & Co., and it is a principle in equity that each trustee shall answer only for the effects which he himself received. (Digest of chancery cases, 182; 1 P. Will., 81. Fellows v. Mitchel; 3 Atk., 583, Leigh v. Barry.)

But there is a stronger ground for charging Clark alone. He received from Loomis and Tillinghast an assignment of funds which they held in trust, to pay to Joseph & William Russell all such moneys as they should be liable to pay as guaranty to the plaintiff. The defendant, Clark, received a transfer of this assignment from Loomis & Tillinghast, with full notice of the trust, and is thereby bound to execute it. It was a trust substantially for the benefit of the plaintiff. There were no funds of Joseph & William Russell, or of either of them, to which he could resort to satisfy his judgment against them. If he had recovered the money from them they might have resorted to this fund; and equity, which avoids circuity of actiou, will make it liable directly to the plaintiff.

C. Lee, suggested that there was no allegation in the bill to which these facts are pertinent.

Dexter. The defendant is charged with having received such assignments as make him liable as trustee to the plaintiff.

These facts appear in the exhibits, which are referred to in the bill and make part of it. The bill prays for general relief, and under such a prayer, the court will give such relief as the facts of the case will warrant.

*C. Lee, contra. [*81

This case presents two questions:

1. Whether the plaintiff's demand shall be satisfied out of the funds of Clark & Nightingale; and,

2. Whether it shall be satisfied out of the funds of R. M. & Co.

1. Are Clark & Nightingale liable out of their own estate?

If so, it can only be upon the letters of the 20th and 21st of January, 1796, either because they create a liability at law, or because they contain a fraudulent misrepresentation. If the letters do not create a liability at law, a court of equity will not extend them beyond their legal import. If they do create a liability at law, a court of equity has no jurisdiction.

None of the parties considered them as letters of guaranty until it was suggested by Jonathan Russell, in his letter to Nathaniel Russell, of the 11th of July, 1796. The plaintiff himself, although he wrote six letters to the defendant after he indorsed the bills, and before notice of their dishonor, yet never once mentioned that he had indorsed such bills upon the credit of C. & N. This uegligence to give them notice that he had done so, is a complete discharge to them, upon the same principles as the want of notice discharges the drawer of a bill of exchange.

The bill states certain facts from which slight infereuces are drawn—that C. & N. intended to guaranty the plaintiff's indorsement of the bills—but the answer of Clark expressly denies all those inferences, and all intention of becoming responsible, and all private assurances of idemnity from R. M. & Co.

Although no external proof can be added to the letters, or adduced to explain them, yet the answer of the defendant, who is called upon to answer as to his intention, is evidence. It is made evidence by the plaintiff having called for it in his bill.

82*] *The opinion of this court upon the construction of the letters iu this case, as reported in 3 Dall., 424, although not conclusive, because it was not upon the point on which the court decided the cause, yet will be respected. The Chief Justice there states that the majority of the court inclined to the opinion that the letters did not, of themselves, import an undertaking or guaranty. To support this opinion, Mr. Lee referred to the cases cited in 3 Dall., 420, 421.

But it is said that the defendant is liable by reason of the misrepresentation. If so, it is a clear case at law, and not in equity.

But the allegation is not supported by the evidence. The representation was true. R. M. & Co. were a house of integrity and punctuality, and were in good credit.

In order to charge the party at law (and a fortiori iu equity), the representation must be false. (3 T. R. 51, Palsey v. Freeman; 2 Esp., 92.) But here the evidence proves the represeutation to be true, and if it had been false, it would have been wholly a case at law.

2. As to the ground of trust. The plaintiff relies upon three trust funds. 1. The idemnity to Clark & Nightingale. 2. The idemnity to Joseph & William Russell. 3. The trust fund in the hands of Loomis & Tillinghast.

1. The idemnity to Clark & Nightingale was only against the suit at law then depending, which has been since abandoned by the plaintiff; and the fund withdrawn, and the deed revoked under the power of revocation which it contained.

2. The idemnity to Joseph & William Russell was only for what they should pay. They never did, and never will pay anything. It was a provision for their benefit, not for that of the plaintiff. Equality is equity. If the plaintiff claims a priority of payment, he must show a strict right. The indemnity is upon the condition of a release, which J. & W. Russell have never given. But the deeds uuder which 83] this indemnity is *claimed, were revoked by those of March, 1799, and May, 1800.

3. As to the trust deed to Loomis & Tillinghast, the evidence respecting it is not admissible. It appears only in a copy of the examination of one of the partuers of the house of R. M. & Co. before the commissioners of bankrupt, certified by the clerk and judge of the District Court, which is not competent evidence.

Nothing in the bill alludes to this deed, so that Clark had no opportunity of answering respecting it. Besides, it appears that the amount of indemnity claimed by Loomis & Tillinghast, which was to be first satisfied before the trust could arise in favor of Joseph & William Russell, was for R. M. & Co.'s notes to the amount of 60,000 dollars, indorsed by Loomis & Tillinghast, and the property pledged to them does not appear to exceed 28,000 dollars. Clark delivered up to L. & T. the notes for 60,000 dollars, and received the property amouuting to 28,000 only. Clark had a right to stand in the shoes of L. & T. and claim the 60,000 dollars, in prefereuce to J. & W. Russell, so that, in fact, there was no fund assigned for the benefit of the latter. There was no surplus after satisfying the claim of Loomis and Tillinghast.

J. B. Murray ought to be a party. The plaintiff has no right to call upon one of the trustees only to answer for the whole fund, when he has received only a part. If the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States is so limited, that it cannot compel the appearance of all the parties, let the plaintiff apply to the state court. The case of Darwent and Walter (4 T. R. 500) applies to the state courts, but not to courts of limited jurisdiction, as the circuit courts of the United States are.

The assignees of the bankrupt, Murray, ought also to be made parties, for they have an iuterest in the residuum.

The plaintiff also ought to have obtained a judgment and fieri facias against R. M. & Co. before he could call for a discovery of their effects. (1 Veruou, 399, Augell v. Draper; 3 Atk., 200, Shirley v. Watts.)

*The want of proper parties, may be [84 objected at the hearing. (3 Atk., 111, Jones v. Jones; 2 Atk., 510, Darwent v. Walton.)

Jones, on the same side. 1st. As to the law of the case.

This court, as a court of equity, has no jurisdiction upon any ground stated in the bill. It states that the letters amount to a guaranty, but that the plaintiff has failed in three suits at law. If there be a remedy at law, and no fraud, nor defect of evidence, it is no case in equity. Nor is there any equitable jurisdiction on the ground of construction of the letters. They must have the same construction in equity as at law. The confessiou that the plaintiff has no legal remedy, is a confession that the defendant is not bound by the contract. (Mitford, 111, 189.) Nor does the ground of fraud alone, give an equitable jurisdiction. A court of law is as competent as a court of equity, to decide a case of fraud. But it is said, there is a different remedy in a court of equity. This is true in some cases. When the fraud is on the part of the complainant, a court of equity will refuse its aid;—when on the part of the defendant, it may set aside a deed obtaiued by fraud; but it will give no remedy in damages for a fraud; it will give no indemnity for a deceit by a third party. Where these are the object of the suit, the remedy is at law where damages are assessed by a jury. (Prec., in ch., 147.)

It is true, that mistake and accident, are grounds of equitable jurisdiction; but the mistake or accident, must be specifically stated; the accident must be manifest, and the evidence clear. The court will then correct the instrument, and make it what it ought to have been.

(1. Vez., 318, 319, Hankle v. Roy; Ex. ass. Comp., 3, Br. C. C., 451, Burt v. Barlow; 1 Vez., Jun., 59, Doran v. Ross; Id. 171, Payne v. Collier; Id. 364, Smith v. Maitland.)

2. As to the construction of the letters, per se; and the effect of the evidence in regard to them.

They do not import a contract on their face. A letter of credit is well understood among 85] merchants. It *must include a request to advance money. No declaration that a man is trustworthy is sufficient. The words of the letters are to be taken in their usual signification. "You may be assured," means only you may be certain; it is only an affirmation of a fact. It contains no promise. It is immaterial how false or fraudulent the affirmation may be; it is but an affirmation, and does not constitute a contract.

No action will lie against a man upon his mere affirmation that he will give his daughter a portion. (1 Vin., 261, Winn v. Talbot.) There must be fraud accompanied by actual damage to support an action on the case, for a deceit, against a stranger to the contract. (3. T. R., 51, Pasley v. Freeman; 2 East., 92, Haycraft v. Creasey.) It is not law, that the defendant is liable, if he does not use due diligence to ascertain the truth. But the evidence shows that the representation was fairly and honestly made, and therefore, whether true or false, is wholly immaterial. If the plaintiff was deceived, it must have been either by his own mistake of the purport of the letters, or by the assertions of Jonathan Russell. R. M. & Co., in their letters to the plaintiff, call them letters of introduction and recommendation, not letters of credit or guaranty. There is no evidence to connect the representations or assertions of Jonathan Russell with C. & N. He was not their agent, nor can they be responsible for anything he may have said.

There is no evidence of mala fides, but strong evidence of the contrary. When one merchant speaks of the credit or integrity of another he speaks only as to general reputation. In the present case, this general reputation is fully proved. The burden of proof lies on the plaintiff, to show some act or information to the contrary, which came to the knowledge of the defendant. Fraud is never to be presumed. As to the captures in 1793 or 1794, it does not appear that the vessel and cargoes were not insured. As those losses had happened several years before the letters of recommendation, and as the house of R. M. & Co., for aught that appears, had stood unshaken thereby, those losses themselves seem to be the best evidence of the stability of that house.

As to the trust. This is a ground of com- 86] plaint totally *distinct from the question of liability under the contract. The complainant seems to rely upon some specific lien on the rice itself, or its proceeds. But when he let the rice go out of his hands, upon being satisfied of the solidity of the house of R. M. & Co., he could not recall it—he lost all claim to a specific lien.

The evidence respecting the assignment to Loomis & Tillinghast is not such as this court can notice. There is only a certificate of the clerk of the District Court that it is a copy of a paper filed in that court by Robert Murray, upon his examination under a commission of bankruptcy. It is not proved by the oath of any person who had seen the original, nor is it mentioned in the bill, nor confessed in the answer. The plaintiff can make no title to a specific lien on this fund.

The other trusts in favor of C. & N., and of Joseph & William Russell, were expressly revoked by the subsequent deeds; and the plaintiff does not claim as a general creditor.

The plaintiff must, in his bill, show a title, an interest, and a right to call upon the defendants. There must be some privity between them; and all persons interested in the trusts must be made parties. (Mitford 31, 136, 144, 220; 2 Br. C. C., Burt v. Dennet.)

If there are no allegations in the prior part of the bill to justify the interrogatories in the subsequent part, the defendant is not bound to answer them. The plaintiff had no right to call for a discovery of general assets; he was confined to the funds alleged in his bill. This is fatal as to the trust of Loomis & Tillinghast; and another objection is, that suits are now pending in New York against the present defendants and others, calling for an account of these very funds.

If the courts of the United States have not power to call all parties before them, it is a good objection to their proceeding in the case. The plaintiff should have applied to the state courts, which have power. It is true that each trustee is only liable for what he received, but that is no reason why the co-trustee should not be made a party.

Dexter* and P. B. Key, in reply. [*87

It is true that there ought to be before the court all the parties who may be necessary to enable the court to do complete justice; but the books also add the proviso, that they be within the jurisdiction of the court. Under the agreement to bring this cause up to this court for a final decision, without an argument in the court below, it was not expected that it would now be delayed by the allegation of the want of proper parties.

1. As to the liability of the defendant upon the letters, this case differs essentially from that of Haycraft and Creasey, in 2 East., 92. In that case it appeared that the defendant himself was grossly duped and deceived, and his assertion was founded upon his belief only. If this had not been the case he would have been liable. There is no difference in morality between the assertion of a falsehood and an affirmation, without any knowledge on the subject, with intent to induce the plaintiff to give credit. We have called upon the defendant to show that he was himself deceived. This he has not done, but has shown facts tending to excite his suspicions, and which ought to have put him more upon his guard. It is doubtful whether the case of Haycraft and Creasey be law. It was decided by two doubting judges against the clear and decided opinion of the Chief Justice, supported by great strength of argument. The opinion of Grose is clearly untenable.

In the case of Pasley v. Freeman, (3 T. R. 51,) the only doubt was, whether the only remedy was not in equity, and whether it could be supported upon the strict principles of the common law. But that doubt was overruled, and a legal remedy established. But it is not decided that there is no relief in equity. Courts of chancery do give relief in some cases, where relief may also be had at law. Thus, whne a case of equitable jurisdiction is blended with a case at law, or where the remedy at law is not complete, or where a court of equity once gets jurisdiction of the case upon proper grounds, although there may be a remedy at law, the court of equity, will retain it jurisdiction.

Although this cause has been several times 86] argued *yet this is the first time the question has been made whether the defendant, Clark, is not liable upon the ground of misrepresentation.

The plaintiff was not bound to give C. & N. notice that he had indorsed the bills of R. M. & Co. It would have been indelicate both with regard to them and to C. & N. It was time enough to give notice when the bills were dishonored.

The conveyance of cestui que trust will be respected in a court of equity. W. Russell, by his answer, has assigned the trust fund to the plaintiff.

The supposed objections to the trust of Loomis & Tillinghast do not exist. The bill calls upon the defendant to set forth all the assignments and trust funds he holds from R. M. & Co., and to produce the original deeds, of which copies are produced by the plaintiff, and to declare on what trusts he holds the property assigned. The bill charges him with holding funds in trust for the plaintiff. The recital, in one of the deeds produced, leads to the trust of Loomis & Tillinghast, which they assigned to the defendant who had notice of the trust, and without the knowledge of William Russell. The defendant knew to what the recital alluded; he knew of the trust in favor of Joseph and W. Russell and ought to have stated it. The notes of R. M. & Co., with the indorsement of Loomis & Tillinghast, which the defendant gave up to them in lieu of the property assigned to them by R. M. & Co., were of no value. They were notes which R. M. & Co. had given to Clark in payment, and which they had paid by the assignment of other property so as to relieve L. & T. from their indorsement; so that in truth the whole funds which R. M. & Co. had assigned to L. & T. for their indemnity, and for the indemnity of Joseph & W. Russell, were applicable to the relief of the latter; and ought to be applied to the indemnification of the plaintiff.

The nature of the speculation itself indicated that the proceeds of the sales of the rice were to constitute the fund out of which the bills were to be paid which were drawn to pay for 87] its purchase. The parties upon the *bills naturally looked to that fund as their principal security. This was known to the defendant, Clark; and with that knowledge he obtained possession of the proceeds of this very rice, for the purchase of which the plaintiff indorsed the bills. The defendant did not, as a stranger, get them innocently into his hands, but obtained those funds in consequence of his own misrepresentation as to the stability and integrity of the house of R. M. & Co. It is unconscientious for him to retain those funds under such circumstances.

March 5th. All the judges being present, MARSHALL, Ch. Justice, delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit in chancery instituted for the purpose of obtaining from the defendants payment of certain bills of exchange drawn by Jonathan Russell, an agent of Robert Murray & Co., and indorsed by Nathaniel Russell; which bills were protested for non-payment, and have since been taken up by the indorser. The plaintiff contends that the house of Clark & Nightingale had rendered itself responsible for these bills by two letters addressed to him, one of the 20th and the other of the 21st of January, 1796, on the faith of which his indorsements, as he says, were made.

The letters are in these words: (See the preceding statement of the case.)

The bill alleges that these letters bind Clark & Nightingale to pay to Nathaniel Russell any sum for which he might credit Robert Murray & Co., either because,

1st. They do, in law, amount to a guaranty; or that,

2d. They were written with a fraudulent intent to be understood as a guaranty; or that,

3d. They contain a misrepresentation of the solidity and character of the house of Robert Murray & Co.

Soon after the protest of these bills for non-payment, Robert Murray & Co. failed and became bankrupts. *Previous to their [88 bankruptcy they assigned a great proportion of their effects, including the cargoes for the purchase of which these bills were drawn, to John J. Clark and John B. Murray, in trust for Clark & Nightingale, and for sundry other creditors and purposes mentioned in several trust deeds, which are recited in the bill, and which appear in the record. The plaintiff claims to be paid his debt out of this fund.

The answer of John J. Clark was filed, and a certain William Russell, a partner of the house of Joseph & William Russell, who gave a letter of credit and guaranty to the drawer of the bills indorsed by the plaintiff, Nathaniel Russell, was made a party defendant. Against Joseph and William Russell a judgment had been obtained by Nathaniel Russell for the amount of the bills indorsed by him, but they had become insolvent, and no part of this judgment had been discharged.

Many depositions having been taken and sundry exhibits filed, a decree of dismission, without argument, and pro forma was rendered in the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, and the cause comes into this court by appeal from that decree.

It is contended by the defendants that the letters which have been recited create no liability on the part of Clark & Nightingale, but are to be considered merely as letters of introduction. Whatever may be the construction of the letters, they insist that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, has complete remedy at law, and that a court of chancery can take no jurisdiction of the cause.

It is believed to be unquestionable that a suit in chancery could not be sustained on these letters against Clark & Nightingale, unless some additional circumstance rendered an application to this court necessary.

The plaintiff contends that such application is necessary, because there are a great varicty of facts belonging to the transaction which could not be introduced into a court of law, or which would not avail him in that court, but which are proper for the consideration of a court of equity.

89*] *Because some of these facts rest within the knowledge of the defendants; and,

Because he cannot, at law, subject the trust fund to his claim.

So far as respects the question whether these letters constitute a contract of guaranty, there can be no doubt but that the construction in a court of law or a court of equity must be precisely the same, and that any explanatory fact which could be admitted in the one court, would be received in the other.

On the question of fraud the remedy at law is also complete, and no case is recollected where a court of equity has afforded relief for an injury sustained by the fraud of a person who is no party to a contract induced by that fraud.

It is true that if certain facts, essential to the merits of a claim purely legal, be exclusively within the knowledge of the party against whom that claim is asserted, he may be required, in a court of chancery, to disclose those facts, and the court, being thus rightly in possession of the cause, will proceed to determine the whole matter in controversy. But this rule cannot be abused by being employed as a mere pretext for bringing causes, proper for a court of law, into a court of equity. If the answer of the defendant discloses nothing, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules, limiting the jurisdiction of courts, require that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law.

It is also true, that if a claim is to be satisfied out of a fund, which is accessible only by the aid of a court of chancery, application may be made, in the first instance, to that court, which will not require that the claim should be first established in a court of law.

In the case under consideration, the answer confesses nothing. So far from furnishing any evidence in support of the plaintiff's claim, it denies, in the most full and explicit terms, the whole equity of the bill.

90*] *This ground of jurisdiction, therefore, is totally withdrawn from the case.

It remains to inquire whether the plaintiff can be let in to claim on any part of the trust fund; and this depends principally on his claim being within any one of the trusts declared.

The first trust deed, which was executed by Robert Murray & Co. on the 23d day of March, 1798, is declared to be in trust to apply the moneys arising from the trust property "in payment and satisfaction of the debts and balances which shall appear to be found to be due and owing from the said parties of the first part (Robert Murray & Co.) to them the said John J. Clark and John B. Murray (the trustees) and to such other of the creditors" of the said Robert Murray & Co. as they should, by any instrument of writing, within twelve months, appoint.

It may be doubted whether this declaration of trust would be applicable to a collateral undertaking not, at the time, carried into judgment.

In the second deed, one of the trusts declared is, to repay Clark & Nightingale for any sums they may pay or be liable to pay under a suit at the time depending against them. That suit was dismissed.

Without deciding whether Russell could avail himself of this trust, having failed in the particular action then depending, the court will proceed to inquire how far Clark & Nightingale were liable to the plaintiff for the debt due to him from Robert Murray & Co.

The law will subject a man, having no interest in the transaction, to pay the debt of another, only when his undertaking manifests a clear intention to bind himself for that debt. Words of doubtful import ought not, it is conceived, to receive that construction. It is the duty of the individual, who contracts with one man on the credit of another, not to trust to ambiguous phrases and strained construetions, but to require an explicit and plain declaration of the obligation he is about to assume. In their letter of the 20th, Clark & Nightingale indicate *no intention to take any responsi- [91 bility on themselves, but say that Mr. Russell may be assured Robert Murray & Co. will comply fully with their engagements. In their letter of the 21st they speak of the letter of the preceding day as a letter of recommendation, and add "we have now to request that you will endeavor to render them every assistance in your power."

How far ought this request to have influenced the plaintiff? Ought he to have considered it as a request that he would advance credit or funds for Robert Murray & Co. on the responsibility of Clark & Nightingale, or simply as a strong manifestation of the friendship of Clark & Nightingale for Murray & Co., and of their solicitude that N. Russell should aid their operations as far as his own view of his interests would induce him to embark in the commercial transactions of a house of high character, possessing the particular good wishes of Clark & Nightingale?

It is certain that merchants are in the habit of recommending correspondents to each other without meaning to become sureties for the person recommended; and that, generally speaking, such acts are deemed advantageous to the person to whom the party is introduced, as well as to him who obtains the recommendation.

These letters are strong, but they contain no intimation of any intention of Clark & Nightingale to become answerable for Robert Murray & Co., and they are not destitute of expressions alluding to that reciprocity of benefit which results from the intercourse of merchants with each other. "The friendship," say they, in their letter of the 20th, "we have for these gentlemen, induces us to wish you will render them every service in your power, at the same time we flatter ourselves this correspondence will prove a mutual benefit."

Mr. Russell appears to have contemplated the transaction as one from which a fair advantage was to be derived. He received a commission on his indorsements.

The court cannot consider these letters as constituting a contract by which Clark & Nightingale undertook *to render themselves [92 liable for the engagements of Robert Murray & Co. to Nathaniel Russell. Had it been such a contract, it would certainly have been the duty of the plaintiff to have given immediate notice to the defendants of the extent of his engagements.

It remains to inquire whether these letters contain such a misrepresentation of the circumstances and character of the house of Robert Murray & Co. as to render them accountable to the plaintiff for the injury he has sustained by trusting that company.

The question, how far merchants are responsible for the character they give each other, is one of much delicacy, and of great importance to the commercial world.

That a fraudulent recommendation (and a recommendation, known at the time to be untrue, would be deemed fraudulent) would subject the person giving it to damages sustained by the person trusting to it, seems now to be generally admitted. The case of Pasley v. Freeman, reported in 3 Durnford and East, recognizes and establishes this principle. Indeed, if an act, in itself immoral, in its consequences injurious to another, performed for the purpose of effecting that injury, be not cognizable and punishable by our laws, our system of jurisprudence is more defective than has hitherto been supposed.

But this does not appear to the court to be the case described. It is proved incontestibly that when the letters on which this suit depends were written, Robert Murray & Co. were in high credit, and were carrying on business to a great extent, which was generally deemed profitable. The bill charges particular knowledge in Clark & Nightingale that this apparent prosperity was not real. But this, as well as every other allegation of fraud, is explicitly denied by the answer; and the answer, being responsive to the bill, is evidence. Had the plaintiff been able to exhibit proofs which would have rendered this fact doubtful, it might have been proper to have directed an issue for the purpose of trying it; but he has exhibited no such proofs.

In writing the letters, then, recited in the bill, 93] Clark *& Nightingale stand acquitted of the imputation of fraud.

But it is contended by the plaintiff that the representation they made of the circumstances of Robert Murray & Co. was, at the time, untrue; and that this misrepresentation, whether made ignorantly or knowingly, was equally injurious to Nathaniel Russell, and equally charges them with the loss he has sustained by trusting to their assurances.

The fact that Robert Murray & Co. were not, in January, 1796, in solvent circumstances, is not clearly made out; but the cause does not rest entirely on this fact. The principle, that a mistake in such a fact as the real internal solidity of a mercantile house, whose external appearance is unsuspicious, shall subject the person, representing their solidity to another, to the loss sustained by that other in trusting to this representation, is not admitted.

Merchants know the circumstances under which recommendations of this description must be given. They know that when one commercial man speaks of another in extensive business, he must be presumed to speak from that knowledge only which is given by reputation. He is not supposed to have inspected all the books and transactions of his friend, with the critical eye which is employed in a case of bankruptcy. He must, therefore, be supposed to speak of the credit, not of the actual known funds of the person he recommends; of his apparent, not of his real solidity. In such a case it is certainly incautious and indiscreet to use terms which imply absolute and positive knowledge. It may, perhaps, be admitted that, in such a case, fraud may be presumed on slighter evidence than would be required in a case where a letter was written with more circumspection. Yet, even in such a case, where the communication is honestly made, and the party making it has no interest in the transaction, he has never been declared to be responsible for its actual verity. The reason of the rule is, that merchants generally possess, and are therefore presumed, in their correspondence, to speak from that knowledge only of the circumstances of other merchants, which may be acquired by observing *their course of business, their punctuality [94 and their general credit.

This principle appears to have been fully considered in the case of Haycraft v. Creasey, reported in 2 East, in which case all the authorities were reviewed. It does not appear that a single decision has been ever made asserting the liability of the writer of such a letter. The case of Haycraft v. Creasey denies his liability; and that case appears to this court to have been decided in conformity with all previous adjudications.

It is therefore the opinion of the court, that Clark & Nightingale, having believed, and had reason to believe, so far as is shown by the evidence in this cause, that the representation they made to the plaintiff of the character and circumstances of Robert Murray & Co. was true, are not liable to the plaintiff, in consequence of that representation, for the credit he gave to that company.

A claim is also set up to the funds in the hands of Clark & Nightingale, founded on the circumstance that they consist, in part, of the rice purchased with the bills indorsed by the plaintiff. But as no specific lien is alleged to have existed, and as the particular fraud, alleged to have been committed to acquire those funds, is not proved, this claim is unsustainable.

The plaintiff, then, cannot be considered as a trust creditor in consequence of any claim he can assert against Clark & Nightingale

The second deed, which is dated on the 24th day of March, 1798, is also in trust "to pay to Joseph & William Russell, the amount that shall be recovered and paid from them to Nathaniel Russell," &c., "upon account of a letter of credit," &c., "and for which the said Nathaniel Russell hath recovered a judgment against the said Joseph & William Russell."

No part of this judgment has ever been paid, and Joseph and William Russell are insolvent. The state of things, then, has perhaps not yet occurred in which Joseph and William Russell could demand the execution *of the trust; [97 and the court, though with some hesitation, feels constrained to decide that, under the terms of this trust, Nathaniel Russell claiming through Joseph & William Russell, cannot demand its execution directly to himself.

It also appears that, in September, 1796,

Robert Murray & Co. assigned to Loomis & Tillinghast certain personalties in trust. This assignment was surrendered to Clark & Nightingale in consideration of notes to a large amount, in which Loomis & Tillinghast were bound for Robert Murray & Co. It appears that Clark & Nightingale are otherwise secured with respect to these notes, at least, there is reason to believe that they are secure.

Clark & Nightingale, having taken this assignment with notice of the trust, take it clothed with the trust. They are trustees for the same uses and to the same extent with Loomis & Tillinghast.

A paper appears in the cause which purports to be the assignment to Loomis & Tillinghast. The assignment is in trust, first, to repay themselves any sums which they may pay on account of certain undertakings made by them for Robert Murray & Co., and, secondly, in trust "to pay to Joseph & William Russell all such moneys as they shall be liable to pay, as guaranty as aforesaid, to Nathaniel Russell upon bills," &c., reciting the bills for which this suit is instituted.

It is settled in this court, that the person for whose benefit a trust is created, who is to be the ultimate receiver of money, may sustain a suit in equity, to have it paid directly to himself.

This trust being to pay Joseph & William Russell a sum they are liable to pay to Nathaniel Russell, and being created in such terms that the money is certainly payable to them, the purposes of equity will be best effected by decreeing it, in a case like the present, to be paid directly to Nathaniel Russell. Indeed, a court ought not to decree a payment to Joseph & William Russell without security, that the debt to Nathaniel Russell should be satisfied. 98] *But it is not shown, by any legal evidence, that this paper is the assignment which was made in trust to Loomis & Tillinghast, and transferred by them to Clark & Nightingale. Its verity is not admitted by the defendants nor proved by the plaintiff.

Nor are the circumstances under which the transfer was made, nor the present circumstances of the trust, sufficiently before the court to enable it to decide with certainty whether the prior trust to Loomis & Tillinghast is satisfied, or otherwise so secured that the trust fund may now be applied to the debt of Joseph & William Russell.

Could these defects be supplied, the court would still be unable to decree in favor of the plaintiff, for want of proper parties.

The incapacity imposed on the circuit courts to proceed against any person residing within the United States, but not within the district, for which the court may be holden, would certainly justify them in dispensing with parties merely formal. Perhaps in cases where the real merits of the cause may be determined without essentially affecting the interest of absent persons, it may be the duty of the court to decree, as between the parties before them. But in this case, the assignees of Robert Murray & Co. are so essential to the merits of the question, and may be so much affected by the decree, that the court cannot proceed to a final decision of the cause till they are parties. They may contest the validity of all the deeds under which both parties claim, and assert in themselves, for the benefit of the creditors generally, a right to the whole fund. Certainly this court ought not, on light grounds, and without due precaution, to change the hands in which this fund is placed, until any claim of the assignees to it may be decided.

Should this difficulty be obviated by suspending the effect of the decree, till the validity of the trust deeds should be decided, or by directing security to be given, another presents itself which cannot be removed. The assignees have a right to contest the claim of Nathaniel Russell, and may either deny its original validity or *show that it has been paid. They [*99 are, then, essential parties, and the court ought not to decree in favor of the plaintiff without them. It is possible, that they may consent to make themselves parties in this cause, and as a court may, instead of dismissing a bill brought to a hearing without proper parties, give leave to make new parties, the court will, in this case, set aside the decree of the Circuit Court, dismissing this bill, and remand the cause to the Circuit Court, with leave to make new parties.

SCHOONER CATHERINE
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—WASHINGTON, Justice.

If the counsel for the appellant neglect to furnish the court with a statement of the points of the case, the appeal will be dismissed.

THIS case was dismissed because the counsel for the appellant had not furnished the court with a statement of the points of the case, agreeably to the general rule on that subject.

It was afterwards re-instated by consent of parties.

BINGHAM AND OTHERS
v.
MORRIS AND OTHERS.

The rule to dismiss a writ of error for not filing the transcript of the record within the first six days of the term, does not apply to cases where the transcript shall have been filed before the motion to dismiss.

MEREDITH moved the court to dismiss this appeal, because the transcript of the record was not filed within the first six days of the term, agreeably to the general rule (ante vol. 3, p. 239). The transcript was filed on the 13th day of the term and before the motion to dismiss.

THE COURT (WASHINGTON, Justice, absent), said that they did not consider the rule as applying to any case where the transcript shall have been filed before the motion for dismissal.

Motion overruled.

100*] *THE SLOOP ACTIVE
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Present—All the Judges.

The departure of a vessel from the wharf of a port, and proceeding a mile and an half therefrom with intent to go to sea, is not a departure from the port, within the meaning of the 3d section of the supplementary embargo act of January 9th, 1808, if the vessel had not actually gone out of the port before seizure.

A licensed fishing vessel is liable to forfeiture (under the 32d section of the act of the 18th of February, 1793, for enrolling and licensing vessels) for sailing laden with goods with intent to carry them to another place, without a license therefor, although the goods are wholly of domestic growth and manufacture and not liable to any duty. But such cargo is not liable to forfeiture unless it belong to the master, owner, or a mariner of the vessel.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of the District of Connecticut, which affirmed that of the District Court condemning the sloop Active and cargo.

The libel stated that the sloop Active was an American vessel duly enrolled and licensed for the cod-fishery on the 5th of July, 1808, and had given the bond required to be given by such vessels under the several acts of Congress laying and enforcing the embargo; and had a permit to depart and be employed in the cod-fishery.

That in the night between the 4th and 5th of July, 1808, at the port of New London, there was secretly and unlawfully laden on board her, a cargo consisting of barrels of beef, fish, butter, &c., without the knowledge and not under the inspection of a revenue officer, with intent unlawfully to proceed with the vessel and cargo to some place without the port, harbor and district of New London. That the vessel so laden left her place at the wharf in the port of New London, in the night, without the knowledge of any custom-house officer, without a license or permit, and without any custom-house papers, and departed therefrom and out of the said port, and proceeded on her said intended unlawful voyage to some place to the custom-house officers unknown. That the cargo was worth more than 600 dollars. That the vessel was unlawfully employed in trade other than that for which she was licensed.

The facts of the case appeared to be as stated in the libel, except that the vessel was seized in the act of leaving the port, but before she had gone out of the port; and that Gates, the owner of the greater part of the cargo, was neither master, owner, nor mariner of the vessel.

101*] Pitkin* and Dana, for the appellants.

Three questions arise in this cause.

1. Whether the vessel and cargo were forfeited by being laden contrary to the 2d section of the act of 25th April, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 146), which declares that "no vessel shall receive a "clearance, unless the lading shall be made "hereafter under the inspection of the proper "revenue officers, subject to the same restric- "tions, regulations, penalties and forfeitures, "as are provided by law for the inspection of "goods, wares, and merchandise imported," &c.

2. Whether she departed from a port of the United States without a clearance or permit, contrary to the 3d section of the act of the 9th of January, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11).

3. Whether she was employed in any other trade than that for which she was licensed, contrary to the 32d section of the act of February 18th, 1793, for enrolling and licensing vessels (vol. 2, p. 193).

1. Upon the first question, nothing will be added to the arguments urged in the case of the Paulina. (Ante p. 55.)

The only penalty under that act, for lading without the inspection of a revenue officer, is the denial of a clearance.

There was no law then in force to punish the intent to violate the embargo. The act of January 9th, 1809, (vol. 9, p. 184), first made it penal to lade a vessel with that intent.

The libel does not charge the intent to be to export the cargo to any foreign place, which was the evil intended to be guarded against by all those laws. It was not unlawful to transport domestic goods from one district to another in the United States. She had given bond according to the provisions of the act of January 9th, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11), not to proceed to any foreign port or place.

*The 5th section of the act of January [102 9th, 1809, (commonly called the enforcing act), first made the vessel liable to forfeiture for lading without a permit. This is a legislative confession that the law was not so before. It sanctions our construction of the act of the 25th of April, 1808.

2. It appears from the evidence that the vessel was seized within the port, about a mile and an half from the wharf.

She did not "depart from" the port, and is therefore not liable to forfeiture under the 3d section of the act of January 9th, 1808.

3. Was the Active engaged in any trade, other than that for which she was licensed, within the meaning of the enrolling act?

By the 32d section of that act (vol. 2, p. 193), it is declared, "that if any licensed vessel shall "be employed in any other trade than that for "which she is licensed, such vessel, with her "tackle, apparel and furniture, and the cargo "found on board her, shall be forfeited."

The object of this provision evidently was to prevent smuggling and other frauds upon the revenue. This is evident from various expressions and provisions in other parts of the act.

Thus the 33d section provides that if the cargo belong to a person other than the master, owner, or mariners of the vessel so trading, and if the duties on the cargo have been paid or secured according to law, such cargo shall not be forfeited,

The reason is, that the revenue cannot be defrauded if the duties have been paid. If, then, this vessel had been laden with foreign goods, and the duties had been paid, they would not have been forfeited; a fortiori, would they be exempt from forfeiture, being American produce and not liable to any duty?

So, in the 4th section of the same act (vol. 2, p. 171), bond is to be given to pay to the United States 1,000 *dollars in case it shall ap- [103 pear that the vessel has been employed in any trade, whereby the revenue of the United States has been defrauded, during the time the the license was in force; and the master is to take an oath that she shall not be employed in any trade whereby the revenue may be defrauded.

By the 5th section it is declared that no license shall be in force for carrying on any other business or employment than that for which the vessel is specially licensed; and by the 6th section, every vessel found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, without being enrolled and licensed, if laden with goods, the growth or manufacture of the United States only (distilled spirits excepted), or in ballast, shall pay foreign fees and tonnage, but if she has any articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, the vessel and cargo shall be forfeited.

The license which the sloop Active had for the cod-fishery not being in force for the coasting trade, she was found trading between different places in the same district without a license, and therefore was within the 6th section of the act; and being laden only with domestic produce, was only liable to pay foreign fees and tonnage.

By the 8th section, if a vessel, enrolled and licensed, shall proceed on a foreign voyage, without giving up her enrollment and license, and being registered, such vessel, and the goods so imported therein, shall be liable to forfeiture. Under this section the vessel must actually make the foreign voyage and import goods before she can be forfeited.

The 12th section authorizes a change of the master, and requires the new master, or the owner, to make oath that the vessel shall not, while the license continues in force, be employed in any manner whereby the revenue may be defrauded.

By the 21st section, a licensed fishing vessel trading to a foreign port without a license or permit therefor, is only liable to forfeiture in case she be found within three leagues of the coast with foreign goods on board to the value of 500 dollars. Domestic goods found on 104] *board are not liable to forfeiture. It cannot therefore be supposed that the legislature intended to render such a vessel liable to forfeiture for carrying domestic goods, upon which no duties were payable, from one part of a port to another.

The act of taking on board certain domestic goods and carrying them from one part of the port to another is not such a trade as was contemplated in the 32d section of the act. Such a construction would be contrary to the spirit of the whole act.

All that can be said is, that she took in the goods with intent to trade; but this is not trading. Such an intent is not punishable.

Dallas, Attorney of the United States for the District of Pennsylvania, and Pinkney, Attorney-General of the United States, for appellees.

The parties engaged in this transaction were conscious that it was an unlawful business. This vessel was confined by law to cod-fishery. She could not lawfully carry on the coasting trade.

She was laden in the night, and was towing out of the harbor when she was seized. Gates, who claims the cargo, appears to be master for that voyage—at least he had the use of the vessel, and was on board, and there was no other master.

1. The first inquiry is, whether this vessel is liable to forfeiture under the embargo law, and

2. Whether she is liable under the enrolling and licensing act.

1. She departed from a port of the United States without a clearance or permit, contrary to the act of January 9th, 1808. (Vol. 9, p. 11, § 3.)

To depart from a port does not mean to go out of the port. She departed from the port when she set sail to leave the port—when she broke ground. This is the construction always given to policies, when the insurance is from (not at and from) a certain port.

*2. The protection of the revenue [105 was not the only object of the prohibition to use the license for another purpose than that for which it was given. It was material to know in what kind of trade every vessel was engaged. All the sections which have been cited show that it was the intention of the legislature to prohibit the vessel from engaging in any other employment than that for which she was licensed, although such employment should not in any manner affect the revenue. It is a plain and express prohibition under the penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo, and it is unnecessary to inquire into the motives of the legislature.

She was engaged in the business of carrying goods from one place to another, and this was an employment or trade for which she had no license. She was as much engaged in trade at the inception as she would have been at the consummation of the voyage. It was not necessary that she should have finished the voyage, or have been engaged in buying and selling.

February 26. MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:[1]

The sloop Active, a vessel licensed for the fishing trade, was laden, in the night of the 4th of July in the year 1808, in the port of New London, and was seized by the revenue officer, after having left the wharf without a clearance, under circumstances which justify a belief that she was about to proceed on a foreign voyage in violation of the acts laying an embargo. The vessel and cargo were libeled as having been forfeited under the laws of the United States, and were both condemned in the District Court, which sentence was affirmed in the Circuit Court.

This sentence is supported on the part of the United States under the 3d section of the supplementary act to the act laying an embargo, and the 32d section of the act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

*This court is of opinion, that how- [106 ever criminal the intentions of those on board the Active might have been, neither the vessel nor cargo were forfeited under the 3d section of the "act supplementary to the act, entitled an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," because she appears to have been seized in port; and a departure from port without a clearance was necessary to consummate the offence.

The case is undoubtedly within the words of the 32d section of the enrolling and licensing act. The Active was a licensed vessel employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed.

The argument that this act was intended merely to secure the revenue, and that its provisions do not contemplate a vessel laden with domestic produce not subject to duty, has been urged with great force, and certainly derives much strength from the various sections of the act which have been quoted. But the words of the 32d section are explicit, and although other preceding sections furnish much reason for believing that a forfeiture in a case where the revenue could not be defrauded, might not be contemplated by the legislature, yet they are not so expressed as to control the 32d section. The Active and her cargo, therefore, must be considered as forfeited, except so far as they come within the 33d section,

That section is in these words: "Provided "nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That "in all cases where the whole or any part of "the lading, or cargo on board, any ship or "vessel, shall belong, bona fide, to any person "or persons other than the master, owner, or "mariners, of such ship or vessel, and upon "which the duties shall have been previously "paid or secured, according to law, shall be "exempted from any forfeiture under this act, "anything therein contained to the contrary "notwithstanding."

In this case the libel states, that Billings and Morgan were owners of the vessel, and a certain Gates owner of the cargo. A claim is filed by Billings and Morgan for the 107] vessel and part of *the cargo, and by Gates for the residue of the cargo. It appears, then, both from the libel and claim, that a part of the cargo did "belong, bona fide, to a person other than the master, owner or mariners of the ship or vessel." This part of the cargo comes completely within that part of the description which relates to the ownership of the property. But the goods on board being liable to no duty, the duties could not have been previously paid or secured.

The court considers this section as manifesting a clear intention in the legislature to exempt from forfeiture a cargo not belonging to the owner, master or mariners, provided that cargo was not liable to duties. Whether this condition was produced by a previous payment of duties, or by a perfect exemption from duties, must be immaterial. Duties cannot be paid or secured, according to law, on goods not liable, by law, to duty. The legislature must be understood, when saying "upon which the duties have been previously paid or secured according to law," to mean, "upon which the duties, if any, have been previously paid," &c.

It is the opinion of the court, that the sentence of the Circuit Court be reversed as to so much of the cargo of the sloop Active as is claimed as the property of Gates, and be affirmed as to the vessel and the residue of the cargo.

And it is directed to be certified that there was probable cause of seizure.

HAWTHORNE, CLAIMANT OF THE BRIG CLARISSA CLAIBORNE.
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Present—All the Judges.

This court will grant a commission to take new evidence to be used here, in a case of admiralty jurisdiction.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court, at New Orleans, condemning the brig Clarissa Claiborne for violating a law of the United States.

Hare* moved for a certiorari upon a [*108 suggestion of diminution of the record, in not sending up the depositions of the witnesses.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. What prevents you from producing the witnesses here, or taking their depositions de novo?

Hare suggested a doubt, whether cases for violation of the embargo are cases of admiralty, or of prize jurisdiction.

However, on a subsequent day he moved for, and obtained a commission to take the depositions of witnesses at New Orleans, to be used on the trial in this court at the next term.

A like commission was granted in the case of Williams and Armroyd, at this term.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
JOHN GOODWIN.

No writ of error lies to the Supreme Court of the United States, to reverse the judgment of a circuit court in a civil action, which has been carried up to the Circuit Court from the District Court by writ of error.

THIS was an action of debt brought originally in the District Court, for the District of Pennsylvania, by the United States, against John Goodwin, for 15,000 dollars, as a penalty for not entering goods agreeably to the prime cost, at the place of exportation, with intent to defraud the revenue. The judgment of the District Court, which was in favor of the United States, was, upon a writ of error, reversed in the Circuit Court; and thereupon the United States sued out the present writ of error to this court.

A doubt having been suggested, whether this court could take jurisdiction by a writ of error, in a civil action, which had been carried up by writ of error from the District Court to the Circuit Court, that question was submitted to this court without argument.

*At a subsequent day, viz., March 10, [109 all the judges being present,

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

This case stands upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court, for the District of Pennsylvania. By the record it appears that an action of debt was brought, in the name of the United States, against the defendant in error, in the District Court of Pennsylvania, in which judgment was rendered for the United States. On a writ of error to the Circuit Court for that district, that judgment was reversed; and upon like process, the cause has been brought into this court for re-examination. A rule has been obtained by the defendant in error, upon the United States, to show cause why the writ of error should not be dismissed; and the ground of the rule is that, as the cause was not removed from the District into the Circuit Court by appeal, but by writ of error, there is no provision in any of the laws of the United States, giving jurisdiction to this court to re-examine the judgment of the Circuit Court, upon a writ of error or otherwise. This question can only be decided by an attentive consideration of the different acts of Congress on this subject.

The 21st section of the judicial law of 1789 declares, that from final decrees in a district court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds 300 dollars, an appeal shall be allowed to the Circuit Court. The 22d section provides, that final decrees and judgments in civil actions, in a district court, where the matter in dispute exceeds the value of 50 dollars, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in a circuit court, upon a writ of error. This section then proceeds to declare that, upon a like process (that is to say, upon a writ of error), may final judgments and decrees in civil actions and suits in equity, in a circuit court, brought there by original process, or removed there from the state courts, or by appeal from a district court, where the value exceeds 2,000 dollars, exclusive of costs, be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court.

110*] *The 2d section of the act of the 3d of March, 1803, so far changes the above sections of the act of 1799, that whereas the latter allows an appeal from the District to the Circuit Court, only in admiralty and maritime cases, where the value in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds 300 dollars, the former provides, an appeal from all final judgments or decrees in a district court, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds 50 dollars, and also an appeal to the Supreme Court, from all final decrees and judgments in a circuit court, in cases of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and of prize or no prize, where the value, exclusive of costs, exceeds 2,000 dollars. But this law makes no provision for the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in any other cases than those above mentioned. Consequently, we must refer to the sections of the act of 1789, before noticed (which are still in force, except so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1803), to see in what cases, other than those provided for by the act of 1803, the Supreme Court can review the decisions of the circuit courts. It has been shown that all final judgments or decrees in civil actions and suits in equity, in a circuit court, brought there by original process, or removed from the state courts, or by appeal from a district court, may be re-examined in the Supreme Court, upon a writ of error. But no case can, under this act, be removed from a district court by appeal, except it be of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and, consequently, under the literal construction of this law, no other cases could be carried from the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court. The question, then, is whether the word appeal, in the 22d section, is to be understood technically, or merely as descriptive of the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court, without regard to the particular mode by which a cause is transmitted to that jurisdiction. This question appears to have been considered by the Supreme Court so early as the year 1796, in the case of Wiscart v. Dauchy. Chief Justice Ellsworth, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, expresses himself as follows: "The act of 1789 speaks of appeal and writ of error, but does not confound them. They are to be understood according to their ordinary acceptation. An appeal is a civil law process, and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the law and fact to a review and re-trial. *A writ of error is a common law pro- [111 cess, and removes for re-examination nothing but the law. This statute observes this distinction. In admiralty and maritime causes, an appeal is allowed from the District to the Circuit Court, if the matter in dispute exceeds 300 dollars, and yet decrees and judgments in civil actions may be removed by writ of error, from the District to the Circuit Court, though the value barely exceeds 50 dollars." In another part of this opinion, the judge adds, "that as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the 22d section says, and upon a like process that is, upon a writ of error, shall final judgments and decrees in civil actions, viz., cases not criminal, and suits in equity, &c. Among the causes which may be brought to the Supreme Court, by writ of error, are cases which had been removed to the Circuit Court, by appeal from a district court, which can only be cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

The objection made to this interpretation of the word appeal, that judgments in civil actions at common law, commenced in a district court, could be re-examined only in a circuit court, if well founded in itself, could not, with any propriety, be addressed to courts, after the legislative meaning of the term is ascertained. The technical distinction between a writ of error and an appeal, and between the different cases to which they were applicable, was clearly marked in the act of 13th February, 1801, which was afterwards repealed by the act of the 8th of March, 1802. The former act, after providing for the removal of all final judgments or decrees, above the value of 50 dollars, from a district to a circuit court, by appeal, and by a like proceeding for a removal to the Supreme Court, of those cases only which were of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and of prize or no prize, proceeded to provide for civil actions at common law, originating in a district court, by declaring that final judgments, in such cases, if of a certain value, might be removed at once from the District to the Supreme Court, by writ of error. So, that as the law stood at that time, a party, in cases at common law, had an election to carry his case, where it exceeded 2,000 dollars, by writ of error, from the District to the Circuit Court, under the 22d section of the act of 1789, but without the privilege of proceeding *farther, or to pro- [112 ceed with his cause, at once, to the Supreme Court, passing by the Circuit Court. But it appears not to have been the policy of the legislature at that time to subject the decisions of the District Court, in civil cases at common law, to more than one re-examination in an appellate court.

WHELAN
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Cases of seizure upon waters navigable from the sea, by vessels of more than ten tons burthen for breach of the laws of the U. S., are civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and are to be tried without a jury.

THIS cause standing so late on the docket that it was not likely to be called for trial at this term, Dallas, for the United States, suggested the propriety of assigning a particular day for the hearing, as it was a case of importance, and involved a question of jurisdiction, viz., whether a seizure of a vessel, on waters navigable from the sea for vessels of ten and more tons burthen, for breach of a law of the United States, was to be tried by a jury. This question was said to be important because the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania had refused to try any cases of that kind, until the question was finally settled by this court.

The court accordingly assigned a day for hearing that question, but intimated an opinion that it was already decided in the cases of the Vengeance (3 Dall., 297), The Betsy and Charlotte (4 Cranch, 443), and Yeaton v. United States (5 Cranch, 281).

E. Tilghman, for the appellant, after looking into those cases, abandoned the question as to jurisdiction, considering the cases cited as conclusive against him.

THE COURT (all the judges being present), said that the question had been certainly settled in this court, upon full argument.

113*] *THE UNITED STATES
v.
THE BRIG ELIZA.

Present—All the Judges.

A vessel which has proceeded to a foreign port, contrary to the embargo act of January 9th, 1808, is liable to be seized upon her return, although that act gives a penalty of double her value in case she should not be seized.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Delaware, which affirmed that of the District Court which dismissed the libel, and ordered the vessel to be restored. She had been seized by the collector of the District of Delaware, for having "proceeded to a foreign port or place," (viz., to Havanna) contrary to the 3d section of the act of January 9th, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 11), "supplementary to the act, entitled an "act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States;" and for having exported from the United States sundry goods, &c., contrary to the 4th section of the act of March 12th, 1808, "in addition to the act, entitled an act supplementary to the act, entitled an act laying an embargo," &c., (vol. 9., p. 71).

By the 3d section of the act of January 9th, 1808, it is enacted, that if any vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of that act, or of the act to which that is a supplement, proceed to a foreign port or place, such vessel shall be wholly forfeited, "and if the same shall not be "seized, the owner or owners, agent, freighter "or factors of any such ship or vessel, shall, "for every such offense, forfeit and pay a sum "equal to double the value of the ship or ves- "sel and cargo, and shall never thereafter be "allowed a credit for duties," &c., "and the "master or commander of such ship or vessel, "and all other persons who shall knowingly "be concerned in such prohibited foreign voy- "age, shall each respectively forfeit and pay a "sum not exceeding twenty thousand, nor less "than one thousand dollars, for every such "offense, whether the vessel be seized and con- "demned or not."

By the 4th section of the act of March 12th, 1808, it is enacted, "that it shall not be lawful "to export from the *United States, in [*114 "any manner whatever, any goods, wares or "merchandise of foreign or domestic growth "or manufacture, and if any goods, wares or "merchandise shall, during the continuance of "the act, entitled an act laying an embargo," &c., "and of the act supplementary," &c., "contrary to the prohibitions of this act, be "exported from the United States either by "land or water, the vessel," &c., "in which "the same shall have been exported, shall, to- "gether with the tackle, apparel," &c., "be "forfeited, and the owner or owners of such "goods," &c., "and every other person know- "ingly concerned in such prohibited exporta- "tion, shall each respectively forfeit and pay a "sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for "every such offense."

Joseph R. Ingersoll, for the appellees (the claimants of the vessel), Contended, that as the vessel was once out of the jurisdiction of the United States after the offense committed, the United States could only sue for the penalty of the double value, and could not seize the vessel itself. That the offense was complete before the return of the vessel, and while she was absent she could not be seized; that the words "if the same shall not be seized," mean, if the same cannot be seized. That as the vessel could not be seized before her return, and as the offense was complete before her return, the case had happened in which the United States were entitled to sue for the double value; and as the forfeiture of the vessel and the penalty of double value were not concurrent and cumulative remedies, the United States could only resort to the latter. The right to seize the vessel was lost by her escape, and could not be revived upon her return. If the United States had brought suit for the penalty before the return of the vessel, they might have supported it, although the vessel should have returned before judgment. Their right of action was complete.

Dallas, contra.

There is no limitation of time for the seizure;

the vessel has actually been seized, and thereby the United States have relinquished their claim to the double value. If the vessel could be seized, it is probable the United States 115] *could not have recovered the double value; and in an action therefor it would have been necessary for the United States to prove that the vessel could not have been seized. This could not be proved while the vessel was lying in a port of the United States, liable to seizure.

March 5th. All the Judges being present, MARSHALL, Ch. J., stated that it was the opinion of the court that the vessel was liable to seizure; but that a majority of the court was of opinion that the offense was not complete until the arrival of the vessel in a foreign port; but the facts of the case do not appear so as to enable the court to decide that point; the cause is therefore continued for further proof.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
JONAH CROSBY.

The title to land can be acquired and lost only in the manner prescribed by the law of the place where such land is situate.

THIS case is fully stated in the following opinion of this court, which was delivered by

STORY, Justice, on the 24th of February, all the judges being present:

A writ of intrusion was brought by the United States against the defendant in error to recover possession of an undivided part of certain land lying within the District of Maine. Upon the trial of the cause in the District Court of that district, a special verdict was found by the jury, upon which the same court gave judgment in favor of the defendant in error. This judgment was afterwards affirmed in the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, and is now before the Supreme Court for a final decision.

By the special verdict it appears that the claim of the United States to the land in con- 116] troversy is under one *Nathaniel Dowse, who derived his title, if any, from an instrument stated at large in the same verdict, and executed in his favor by one John Nelson. The instrument is without a seal and was executed at the Island of Grenada, in the West Indies, before a notary public, according to the mode prescribed, by the existing laws, to pass real estate in that colony; and both parties were, at that time, residents therein.

By the laws of Massachusetts, no estate of freehold in land can be conveyed unless by a deed or conveyance under the hand and seal of the party; and to perfect the title as against strangers, it is further requisite that the deed should be acknowledged before a proper magistrate, and recorded in the registry of deeds for the county where the land lies.

The question presented for consideration, is whether the lex loci contractus or the lex loci rei sitæ is to govern in the disposal of real estates.

The court entertain no doubt on the subject; and are clearly of opinion that the title to land can be acquired and lost only in the manner prescribed by the law of the place where such land is situate.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be affirmed.

THE SCHOONER EXCHANGE
v.
M'FADDON AND OTHERS.

Present—All the Judges.

A public vessel of war of a foreign sovereign at peace with the United States, coming into our ports, and demeaning herself in a friendly manner, is exempt from the jurisdiction of the country.

THIS being a cause in which the sovereign right claimed by Napoleon, the reigning Emperor of the French, and the political relations between the United States and France, were involved, it was, upon the suggestion of the Attorney-General, ordered to a hearing in preference to other causes which stood before it on the docket.

*It was an appeal from the sentence [117 of the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania, which reversed the sentence of the District Court, and ordered the vessel to be restored to the libellants.

The case was this: On the 24th of August, 1811, John M'Faddon and William Greetham, of the state of Maryland, filed their libel in the District Court of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania, against the schooner Exchange, setting forth that they were her sole owners, on the 27th of October, 1809, when she sailed from Baltimore, bound to St. Sebastians, in Spain. That while lawfully and peaceably pursuing her voyage, she was, on the 30th of December, 1810, violently and forcibly taken by certain persons, acting under the decrees and orders of Napoleon, Emperor of the French, out of the custody of the libellants, and of their captain and agent, and was disposed of by those persons, or some of them, in violation of the rights of the libellants, and of the law of nations in that behalf. That she had been brought into the port of Philadelphia, and was then in the jurisdiction of that court, in possession of a certain Dennis M. Begon, her reputed captain and master. That no sentence or decree of condemnation had been pronounced against her, by any court of competent jurisdiction; but that the property of the libellants in her, remained unchanged and in full force. They therefore prayed the usual process of the court, to attach the vessel, and that she might be restored to them.

Upon this libel the usual process was issued, returnable on the 30th of August, 1811, which was executed and returned accordingly, but no person appeared to claim the vessel in opposition to the libellants. On the 6th of September, the usual proclamation was made for all persons to appear and show cause why the vessel should not be restored to her former owners, but no person appeared.

On the 13th of September, a like proclamation was made, but no appearance was entered.

On the 20th of September, Mr. Dallas, the 118] Attorney *of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania, appeared, and (at the instance of the executive department of the government of the United States, as it is understood), filed a suggestion, to the following effect:

Protesting that he does not know, and does not admit the truth of the allegations contained in the libel, he suggests and gives the court to understand and be informed,

That in as much as there exists between the United States of America and Napoleon, Emperor of France and King of Italy, &c., &c., a state of peace and amity; the public vessels of His said Imperial and Royal Majesty, conforming to the law of nations, and laws of the said United States, may freely enter the ports and harbors of the said United States, and at pleasure depart therefrom without seizure, arrest, detention or molestation. That a certain public vessel described, and known as the Balaou, or vessel, No. 5, belonging to His said Imperial and Royal Majesty, and actually employed in his service, under the command of the Sieur Begon, upon a voyage from Europe to the Indies, having encountered great stress of weather upon the high seas, was compelled to enter the port of Philadelphia for refreshment and repairs, about the 22d of July, 1811. That having entered the said port from necessity, and not voluntarily; having procured the requisite refreshments and repairs, and having conformed in all things to the law of nations and the laws of the United States, was about to depart from the said port of Philadelphia, and to resume her voyage in the service of His said Imperial and Royal Majesty, when on the 24th of August, 1811, she was seized, arrested, and detained in pursuance of the process of attachment issued upon the prayer of the libelants. That the said public vessel had not, at any time, been violently and forcibly taken or captured from the libelants, their captain and agent on the high seas, as prize of war, or otherwise; but that if the said public vessel, belonging to His said Imperial and Royal Majesty as aforesaid, ever was a vessel navigating under the flag of the United States, and possessed by the libelants, citizens thereof, as in their libel is alleged 119] (which nevertheless, *the said attorney does not admit), the property of the libelants, in the said vessel was seized and divested, and the same became vested in His Imperial and Royal Majesty, within a port of his empire, or of a country occupied by his arms, out of the jurisdiction of the United States, and of any particular state of the United States, according to the decrees and laws of France, in such case provided. And the said attorney submitting, whether, in consideration of the premises, the court will take cognizance of the cause, respectfully prays that the court will be pleased to order and decree, that the process of attachment, heretofore issued, be quashed; that the libel be dismissed with costs; and that the said public vessel, her tackle, &c., belonging to His said Imperial and Royal Majesty, be released, &c. And the said attorney brings here into court the original commission of the said Sieur Begon, &c.

On the 27th of September, 1811, the libelants filed their answer to the suggestion of the District Attorney, to which they except, because it does not appear to be made for, or on behalf, or at the instance of the United States, or any other body politic or person.

They aver, that the schooner is not a public vessel, belonging to His Imperial and Royal Majesty, but is the private property of the libelants. They deny that she was compelled by stress of weather to enter the port of Philadelphia, or that she came otherwise than voluntarily; and that the property of the libelants in the vessel never was divested, or vested in His Imperial and Royal Majesty, within a port of his empire, or of a country occupied by his arms.

The District Attorney produced the affidavits of the Sieur Begon, and the French consul, verifying the commission of the captain, and stating the fact that the public vessels of the Emperor of France never carry with them any other document or evidence that they belong to him, than his flag, the commission, and the possession of his officers.

In the commission it was stated that the vessel was armed at Bayonne.

On the 4th of October, 1811, the District Judge dismissed *the libel with costs, [120 upon the ground that a public armed vessel of a foreign sovereign, in amity with our government, is not subject to the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country, so far as regards the question of title, by which such sovereign claims to hold the vessel.

From this sentence the libelants appealed to the Circuit Court, where it was reversed, on the 28th of October, 1811.

From this sentence of reversal the District Attorney appealed to this court.

Dallas, Attorney of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania, contended,

1. That this is not a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

2. That the public character of the vessel is sufficiently proved; and,

3. That being a public national vessel of France, she is not liable to the ordinary judicial process of this country.

1. It ought to appear upon the proceedings themselves that this is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

In England the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty comprehends three branches. 1. The criminal jurisdiction, for the punishment of offenses committed upon the high seas, or submitted to its cognizance by the statute law.

2. The prize jurisdiction, as to captures as prize of war, on the high seas.

3. The instance court, which has jurisdiction of torts committed at sea, in which case locality is essential; and of maritime contracts, which are also perhaps local.

The district courts of the United States have the same three branches of jurisdiction, but the jurisdiction *must be shown in the pro- [121 ceedings, together with the authority to seize within our waters. (Laws United States, vol. 1, p. 53, sect. 9, 11; vol. 3, p. 91, sect. 6; 3 Dall., 6.)

But the libel does not bring the case within either of those branches of jurisdiction. The libel simply states that while she was lawfully and peaceably pursuing her voyage, she was forcibly seized under the decrees of Napoleon,

Emperor of the French. It does not allege any crime upon the high seas. It does not state the seizure to be as prize of war. It does not allege a tort committed upon the high seas, nor any maritime contract. The admiralty has no jurisdiction upon the mere possession of the vessel in our harbors, unconnected with a tort on the high seas. Nor upon a tort committed here, or in a foreign country; nor upon a mere question of title. (2 Browne, civ. and ad. law, 110, 111, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117.)

There is not a single instance of admiralty jurisdiction exercised in this country without possession, coupled with a maritime tort.

2. As to the proof of the public character of the vessel. The flag, the public commission, and the possession of the officer, have always been sufficient evidence, at sea or in port, and for fiscal or executive purposes. Why should it not be sufficient evidence in a judicial proceeding? No public vessel ever carries any other documents. No other proof of property in the sovereign is ever required. It is acknowledged in all our treaties. Even the common law requires only the best evidence which the nature of the case admits.

In the case of Mr. Pichon (4 Dall., 321), no other evidence of his public character was produced or required than a letter from Talleyrand, the French minister for foreign affairs. Upon that evidence he was discharged.

Harper, for the appellees,

Admitted that the commission, the flag, and the possession, were sufficient evidence of the public character of the vessel.

122*] Dallas*. The principal question then is, whether a public national vessel of France, coming into the United States to repair, is liable to be arrested upon the claim of title by an individual.

This vessel was seized by a sovereign, in virtue of his sovereign prerogative. In such a case, the claim of the individual merges in the right of the offended sovereign. The size of the vessel can make no difference. Upon principle, the Royal George, belonging to his Britannic Majesty, is as liable to this process as the Balaou No. 5. Suppose a British frigate lying at New York, and one of her seamen should escape and libel her for his wages: the same argument which will support this case would support that.

This was one of the seizures under the Rambouillet decree. We do not justify that decree, but we say that whenever the act is done by a sovereign in his sovereign character, it becomes a matter of negotiation, or of reprisals, or of war, according to its importance.

It is proved that she arrived in distress; that she had been sent on a distant mission with a military cargo. No assent to submit to the ordinary jurisdiction of the country can be presumed in such a case as that. She had committed no offense while here. She did not come to trade. There was no implied waiver of the peculiar immunities of a public vessel. The right of free passage was open to her, as it was to the public vessels of every other nation, except England, whose ships were expressly excluded by a particular statute.

But put the question generally: can a vessel of war, for any cause, be attached at the suit of an individual? In doubtful cases the argument ab inconvenienti, ought to have great weight. The jurisdiction now claimed would extend to all men, to all suits, to torts and to contracts; to every vessel seized in a foreign port and taken into the public service. Impressed seamen might libel a whole British squadron for their wages. The peace of our ports and harbors would be at the mercy of individuals. It would be impossible to carry it into practice. The sentence of the court could not be executed. It is beautiful in theory to exclaim "*fiat Justitia—ruat cœlum," but [123 justice is to be administered with a due regard to the law of nations, and to the rights of other sovereigns. When an individual receives an injury from a foreign sovereign, he must complain to his own government, who will make it a matter of negotiation, and if justice be refused may grant reprisals.

Our acts of Congress never subject foreign public vessels to forfeiture. The non-intercourse act (as it is called) forfeits private, but not public British vessels; the public vessels are forbidden to come; if they do come, you order them to depart. If they refuse and you are not strong enough to drive them away, you prohibit supplies to them; but you do not subject them to forfeiture.

We do not, however, deny the right of a nation to change the public law as to foreign nations, upon giving notice. We may forbid the entrance of their public ships, and punish the breach of this prohibition by forfeiture; nor do we deny the obligation of a foreign sovereign to conform to pre-existing laws, as to offenses, and as to the acquisition of property; nor his liability for his private debts and contracts. (Vattel, 426; B. 2, c. 18, sect. 340, 344, 346.) So, if a sovereign descend from the throne and become a merchant, he submits to the laws of the country. If he contract private debts, his private funds are liable. So, if he charter a vessel, the cargo is liable for the freight.

But in the present case he appears in his sovereign character; the commander of the national vessel exercises a part of his sovereign power; and in such a case no consent to submit to the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country can be implied. Such implied consent must depend on the act, on the person, and on the subject.

Such consent is implied where the municipal law, previously provides and changes the law of nations; where it regulates trade, where it defines and punishes crimes, and where it fixes the tenure of property, real or personal. But it cannot be implied where the law of nations is unchanged, nor where the implication is destructive of the independence, the equality and dignity of the sovereign. Such a jurisdiction is not given by the constitution of the United States, nor *is it mentioned in [124 the judiciary act. If so important a jurisdiction was intended to be given, it would certainly have been mentioned and regulated by law. It cannot be derived from any practical construction of our laws. In 1794, the public vessels were not seized, but ordered away. The impost law (Laws of U. S., vol. 4, p. 331, sect. 31) excepts public vessels from the obligation to make report and entry. The act of March 3d, 1805, (vol. 7, p. 334, sect. 4), for the preservation of peace in our ports and harbors, gives authority to the President to prohibit the foreign armed vessels from entering our ports, and to order those to depart which may have entered, and if they refuse to depart, to prohibit all intercourse with them, and to drive them away; but not to seize them. Public vessels were excepted from the embargo, in 1807, and in 1808. (Laws of U. S., vol. 9, p. 7, sect. 2, and p. 243, sect. 1, 2 and 3.)

The judicial construction of the law by the courts in Pennsylvania was, that a state could not be subjected to judicial process, unless by the words of the constitution of the United States; and many sound minds were of opinion that even those did not give jurisdiction; and when it was finally decided in the Supreme Court of the United States that a suit might be maintained against a state in the federal courts, the states amended the constitution so as not to admit of that construction.

The case of Nathan v. The Commonwealth of Virginia (1 Dall., 77) was a foreign attachment against some military stores belonging to the state of Virginia, the object of which was to compel an appearance; and the court refused to compel the sheriff to return the writ; being of opinion that Virginia, being a sovereign state, could not be compelled to appear in a court in Pennsylvania. The present process against the vessel is to compel an appearance. It is true the master may give security; but to compel him to do so is to bring the Emperor into court, and to subject him, in his sovereign character, to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

The Cassius (in the case of United States v. 125] Judge Peters*, 3 Dall., 121, and Ketland, qui tam v. The Cassius, 2 Dall., 365) had violated a municipal law of the United States; yet, being a public vessel of France, the government of the United States directed the Attorney General to file a suggestion, stating the character of the vessel, which it was supposed would have taken the case out of the jurisdiction of the court. But the case went off upon another objection to the jurisdiction.

There is then no municipal law, nor any practical construction by the executive, the legislative, or the judicial department of our government, which authorizes the jurisdiction now claimed; we can only have recourse to the law of nations to try the validity of that claim. That law requires the consent of the sovereign, either express or implied, before he can be subjected to a foreign jurisdiction. (2 Rutherford, 163 to 170.) There is no express assent of a foreign sovereign to the jurisdiction over his prerogative. The distinction is between his private acts, and his acts as sovereign, and between his private and his public property. (Vat. B., 2, p. 343, ch. 14, § 213, 216; 2 Ruth., 536; Vat., 707, B., 4, c. 7, § 108, Martyn, 181; Ruth., 54; Galliani B., 1, c. 5.)

The cases of implied assent are: 1. Trade, when his goods are liable for freight, or liable to his factor for advances, &c., or liable to pay duties. In all which cases there is a specific lien on the goods. 2. In case he acquire property in the country, whether real or personal. 3. In case of offenses against existing laws, such as entering when prohibited, or breaking the peace when in port. But the law of nations excludes the implication and presumption in every case where the sovereignty is concerned; as, 1. In the case of an ambassador. 2. Of the sovereign himself. 3. The passing of his armies through the country, in which case he retains all his rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction over his army. 4. In case of his navy passing through our waters.

The British government, although it authorizes the search of private ships for their seamen, disclaims the right to search ships of war, even on the ocean, the place of common jurisdiction.

Bynkershoek (p. 39, c. 4) for the first time asserts a *principle not recognized by [126 any prior writer, viz., that the goods of the sovereign, however acquired, whether of a public or private nature, are liable to process to compel an appearance. But he does not cite one adjudged case, nor one writer upon the law of nations to support him. The only case he cites is from Huber, and that denies the jurisdiction. The exima which he cites is only a kind of chronicle or journal, like the annual register.

It is a book of no authority. The case of the Queen of Spain's ship arrested at Flushing, and the Queen of Bohemia's in 1654, which were released by the states general, are against him. His book clearly shows that the practice of nations is against his doctrine. It is evident that he alludes to a practice of citation in the states of Holland, or among the members of the Germanic body.

The general principle is against him. He is opposed by other writers and supported by none. He is opposed by the practice of nations and supported by no judicial decision.

If the courts of the United States should exercise such a jurisdiction it will amount to a judicial declaration of war. There is already a case before this court in which it will be called upon to decide whether St. Domingo be an independent nation; and another in which it is to determine whether the crown of Spain belongs to Ferdinand the 7th or Joseph Bonaparte. If this court is to exercise jurisdiction upon subjects of this nature, it will absorb all the functions of government, and leave nothing for the legislative or executive departments to perform.

Hare, contra.

The position which we are to meet, is understood to be this, That the possession of property by a foreign sovereign, without the limits of his jurisdiction, and within the limits of the United States, precludes all inquiry into the title of the thing within his possession.

This principle, we say, is unfounded. The general rule is that all sovereignty is strictly local, and cannot *be exercised beyond [127 the territorial limits. This flows from the nature of sovereignty, which being supreme power, cannot exist where it is not supreme. (4 Cranch, 279, Rose v. Himely.) There is no instance of its actual extra-territorial operation, except where by fiction of law it is supposed to be territorial; or at most where it exclusively operates upon its own subjects. The household of an ambassador is supposed to be within the territorial jurisdiction of his sovereign. (Vattel, 448; Martyn, 228, 230.)

In other respects the rights of an ambassador are his own rights, founded in considerations appertaining exclusively to the ambassadorial character. In the vessels belonging either to his nation or to himself, he may exercise, on the high seas, a limited jurisdiction. The same principle operates here. The ship is considered as part of his territory. But in this case his jurisdiction extends over his own subjects only. His armies abroad are also subject to his jurisdiction, but this is the result of positive compact, without which they cannot go abroad.

The general principle then being in our favor, our adversaries must show the exception.

Whatever is within the extent of a country is within the authority of its sovereign; and if any dispute arises concerning the effects within the country or passing through it, it must be decided by the judge of the place. (Vat. 446.)

Unless the case now before the court be an exception, this rule is universal. It grows out of the first principles of government, which, in giving security assumes jurisdiction.

The general authority, over the property of foreigners is as absolute as over the property of subjects.

The arguments in favor of the exception are drawn rather from inconvenience than from principle, but cannot be supported upon either ground.

As it regards the private property of the sov-
128*] ereign, *why not assume jurisdiction? Because, it is said, it would violate his dignity, inasmuch as it is to be presumed that he will never do wrong. Such a presumption, contrary to the fact, may be calculated to give him weight at home, but can be of no use abroad. It is not universally adopted even at home. The king of England may be sued by monstrans de droit. States may prescribe the mode in which they shall be sued. This is a matter of internal regulation. Will you then respect a foreign sovereign more than his own subjects are bound to respect him?

If the sovereign of any free country should unlawfully seize the goods of one of his subjects, he would be liable in his private capacity like any other person. As regards the public property of a foreign sovereign, why should there be any distinction, where the only object of the suit is merely to ascertain the right?

His public service may suffer, but will you respect that service at the expense of the rights of your own citizens?

But it is said, if you arrest this vessel you may arrest a fleet. This is true. And when a foreign fleet shall have been created by the plunder of our own citizens, let it be arrested.

But the danger of such a case is remote and improbable. The libel must be supported by oath and probable cause. A judge would not hastily direct process against a fleet.

But consider the inconveniencies on the other side. Your own citizens plundered. Your national rights violated. Your courts deaf to the complaints of the injured. Your government not redressing their wrongs, but giving a sanction to their spoliators.

The argument of our opponents allows no remedy to the citizen although dispossessed of his property within the limits of our own territory. Although the ship should have been seized in the Delaware, and converted into a public armed vessel, we are supposed to have no redress. It does not appear upon the face of the present proceedings, that this was not the case.

The argument of inconvenience is [
129 equally applicable to cases in which our own laws authorize process to issue. Thus, under the act of June 5th, 1794, (§ 3, vol. 3, p. 89), if any ship shall be armed in any of the waters of the United States, with intent to be employed in the service of any foreign state to cruise against the subjects of another foreign state with whom the United States are at peace, such ship shall be forfeited. So also in case a foreign armed ship should be found smuggling. In cases of tort, then, there is a remedy against the public armed ship of a foreign sovereign. It is obvious also that there must be such remedy in cases of contract. As in the case of material men for repairs—bottomry and mortgage—wreck and pledges. If he may pledge, the pledge may be proceeded against. If, then, there are cases both of tort and contract in which there is a remedy, why not in this?

It is in vain to urge against the right of proceeding, the inconveniences that may result from the mode.

On principle, then, there is no foundation for the exception. Nor is it warranted by authority.

Vattel (B. 2, § 83) says: "Many sovereigns "have fiefs, and other properties, in the lands "of another prince; they therefore possess "them in the manner of other individuals." Thus the kings of England did homage for the lands they held in France.

Martins (p. 85, 182, Book 5, sect. 9) says that the supreme police extends over the property of a sovereign.

The cases of Glass v. Sloop Betsy (3 Dall., 6), Rose v. Himely and Hudson v. Guestier (4 Cranch, 279); The Cosmopolite (3 Rob., 269), and the authority of Azuni (245, 246), affirm the right, in certain cases, of examining the legality of the prizes of foreign sovereigns.

Prizes are made for account of the sovereign. In England they are distributed according to the prize act; but if made by a non-commissioned vessel, they are droits of the admiralty.

The possession of the captors is the [ 130 possession of the sovereign. In these cases, therefore, the right of the sovereign to the thing in his possession is subjected to judicial investigation.

Bynkershoek upon Ambassadors (40 to 46), expressly states that the property of the sovereign, public and private, is subject to the authority of the judge of the place. (2 Rutherford, 476, 382.) The case of the Swedish convoy is also an authority to the same effect.

The Constitution of the United States (art. 3, sect. 2) expressly gives the courts of the United States jurisdiction in cases between citizens and foreign states.

The cases cited on the other side refer only to suits brought directly against a sovereign, or to compel his appearance. But such cases are wholly inapplicable, because not brought in consequence of your jurisdiction over the thing within your territory, but to create a jurisdiction over the person which is without it.

In Massachusetts suits between foreigners by process of attachment cannot be sustained; but the right to the thing in dispute, whether between foreigners or others, will be ascertained there.

You cannot draw to your jurisdiction those who owe you neither a local nor an absolute allegiance; but you may inquire into the validity of every claim to a thing within your jurisdiction.

This doctrine is peculiarly applicable to sovereigns:

In the case of Olmstead v. Rittenhouse's executors (5 Cranch, 115), under the name of United States v. Judge Peters, the state of Pennsylvania contended that the Dirtrict Court had not jurisdiction, because she, as a sovereign state, claimed the money in the hands of the executors, and was really the party interested; but this court decided that, as the state was not ostensibly a party, and as the thing was within the jurisdiction of the court, the District Court should proceed to enforce its sentence; thereby clearly marking the distinction between a suit against a sovereign, and a process against a thing claimed by a sovereign.

131*] Harper*, on the same side.

Two questions are raised in this case.

1. Whether this be a case of admiralty jurisdiction, and

2. Whether a judicial remedy can be given for a wrong done by a foreign sovereign.

1. The libel states the seizure to have been made "during the voyage," and the answer to the claim denies that she was seized in port; it follows, therefore, that she must have been seized upon the high seas.

2. As to the general power to interfere in case of an illegal seizure made by a foreign sovereign.

Sovereignty is absolute and universal. This is the general rule. But it is contended that there is an exception in four cases.

1. As to the person of a foreign sovereign.

2. As to his ambassadors.

3. As to his armies; and,

4. As to his property—which last is said to be an inference from the three former cases. But the three former cases are all founded upon consent, and the latter is not; consequently there can be no analogy between them. Besides, these cases are not exceptions to the sovereignty, but merely exemptions from the ordinary judicial process, by consent of the sovereign. If a foreign sovereign comes secretly into the country, he is not protected from ordinary process; but when he comes openly in his character as a sovereign, an assent is implied, and he comes with all the immunities incident to his dignity, according to the common understanding of the word. All the cases supposed to be against us are founded upon consent. Bynkershoek also places it upon the ground of consent, and he is supported by Barbeyrac and Galliani.

132*] *The positive authorities against the exemption of the property of the sovereign from the ordinary judicial process, are Bynkershoek, 25; Martins, 182; and 2 Rutherford, 476. The constitution of the United States takes for granted the inability of the states, and merely provides the means of carrying the principle into effect. The exemption of the sovereign himself, his ambassador and his armies, depends upon particular reasons which do not apply to his property, nor to his ships of war.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, in reply.

When wrongs are inflicted by one nation upon another, in tempestuous times, they cannot be redressed by the judicial department. Its power cannot extend beyond the territorial jurisdiction. However unjust a confiscation may be, a judicial condemnation closes the judicial eye upon its enormity. The right to demand redress belongs to the executive department, which alone represents the sovereignty of the nation in its intercourse with other nations.

The simple fact in this case is, that an individual is seeking, in the ordinary course of justice, redress against the act of a foreign sovereign. But the rights of a foreign sovereign cannot be submitted to a judicial tribunal. He is supposed to be out of the country, although he may happen to be within it.

An ambassador is unquestionably exempt from the ordinary jurisdiction; but if he commit violence it may be lawfully repelled by the injured individual; so, if he commit public violence he may be opposed by the nation. This right arises from the necessity of the case. But as to ordinary cases he is to be referred to the tribunals of his own country. In cases where those tribunals cannot interfere to prevent the injury, the jurisdiction of the country, for that purpose, may interfere; but when the act is done, and prevention is too late, he must be referred to his own tribunals.

We claim for this vessel, an immunity from the ordinary jurisdiction, as extensive as that of an ambassador, *or of the sovereign [133 himself; but no further. If she attempt violence, she may be restrained.

The constitution of the United States, decides nothing; it only provides, a tribunal, if a case can by possibility exist.

The statutes of the United States, are in hostility to the idea of jurisdiction. Private vessels are made liable to confiscation, but public vessels are to be driven away. The remedy is by opposing sovereign to sovereign, not by subjecting him to the ordinary jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction over things and persons is the same in substance. The arrest of the thing is to obtain jurisdiction over the person.

A distinction is taken between civil and territorial jurisdiction, civil jurisdiction is referred to consent; it binds all who have consented. Territorial jurisdiction goes farther; it operates upon those who have not assented—such as aliens—but the alien must do something; he must come within the territory whereby he submits to the jurisdiction; so, if he purchases property within the country, or sends property into the territory, in ordinary cases, his assent is implied. But if the property of an alien be forcibly or fraudulently carried within the territory, no consent is implied, and consequently there is no ground for jurisdiction.

If a foreign sovereign be found in the territory, he is not liable to the ordinary jurisdiction. Vattel places his exemption on the ground that he did not intend to submit to it; Rutherford, on the ground of the assent of the other sovereign.

The case of the ambassador is precisely in point—his immunities depend upon the implied assent. The reason is, that he may be independent. Grotius, places it upon the conventional, and Rutherford, upon the natural law of nations.

So in the case of the passage of troops through a neutral territory, the permission to pass implies a compact, that they should enjoy all 134] necessary immunities. *From the nature of the case, they cannot be subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the country, through which they pass. To suffer one of the soldiers to be arrested for a debt due to a citizen of that country, would be inconsistent with the permission to pass.

We are asked, whence we infer the immunity of the public armed vessel of a sovereign. We answer from the nature of sovereignty, and from the universal practice of nations from the time of Tyre and Sidon.

Sovereigns are equal. It is the duty of a sovereign not to submit his rights to the decision of a co-sovereign. He is the sole arbiter of his own rights. He acknowledges no superior, but God alone. To his equals, he shows respect, but not submission.

This vessel is not the ordinary property of a sovereign. It is his national property; a public ship of war duly commissioned. There is no difference in principle between such a vessel and an army passing through the territory. She has the same rights. She has your permission to pass, and you are bound to give her all necessary immunities. You gave her an asylum as the property of a great and powerful nation, you must not suffer her to be thereby entrapped in the fangs of a municipal court. She was charged with public despatches; she visited your ports in itinere. It was a deflexion merely, that she might more effectually perform her voyage. It was a mere passage through your jurisdiction. Her commander had an unquestionable right to exclusive jurisdiction over her crew. In the eye of the law of nations, she was at home, whether in your ports or upon the high seas. The exemption from delay is more necessary than the exemption from final condemnation.

By the usage of states, no other evidence is required of the property of a sovereign than his commission and flag. This is strong evidence that such property is not subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the country. Otherwise other documents would be required and would be furnished. No others are required at sea, nor on shore. This usage of nations is universally known, and as the vessel sailed 135] upon the faith of such a usage, *good faith requires that you should receive the flag and commission as evidence of the character of the vessel.

This court will not decide this case upon the authority of the slovenly treatise of Bynkershoek, or the ravings of that sciolist Martins, but upon the broad principles of national law, and national independence. One would as soon consult Gibbons or Hobbs, for the doctrines of our holy religion as Martins for the principles of the law of nations. Bynkershoek, upon this point, draws his authorities from Dutch courts, and Dutch jurists. Not one of his cases was adjudged, except that cited from Huber. And in one of the cases, the states general requested that the vessel should be discharged, which had been arrested in Zealand, for a debt due from Spain, saying that they would write to the Queen of Spain, to pay her debts, or they would be obliged to issue letters of marque and reprisal; which was the proper course. The other cases were only abortive attempts to subject national property to the ordinary jurisdiction of the country.

The case of the Swedish convoy was upon the ground that the convoy resisted by force the right of search. It was war quoad hoc; and the seizure was made as prize of war. But that case was never decided.

In the case of Glass v. The Sloop Betsy, the privateer's commission was to capture the property of an enemy, but she had captured that of a friend. The court did not subject the privateer to their jurisdiction, but the prize which she had wrongfully made.

March 3d. All the Judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case involves the very delicate and important inquiry, whether an American citizen can assert, in an American court, a title to an armed national vessel, found within the waters of the United States.

The question has been considered with an earnest solicitude, that the decision may conform to those principles *of national [136 and municipal law by which it ought to be regulated.

In exploring an unbeaten path, with few, if any, aids from precedents or written law, the court has found it necessary to rely much on general principles, and on a train of reasoning founded on cases in some degree analogous to this.

The jurisdiction of courts is a branch of that which is possessed by the nation as an independent sovereign power.

The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction.

All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories, must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.

This consent may be either express or implied. In the latter case, it is less determinate, exposed more to the uncertainties of construction; but, if understood, not less obligatory.

The world being composed of distinct sovereignties, possessing equal rights and equal independence, whose mutual benefit is promoted by intercourse with each other, and by an interchange of those good offices which humanity dictates and its wants require, all sovereigns have consented to a relaxation in practice, in cases under certain peculiar circumstances, of that absolute and complete jurisdiction within their respective territories which sovereignty confers.

This consent may, in some instances, be tested by common usage, and by common opinion, growing out of that usage.

137*] *A nation would justly be considered as violating its faith, although that faith might not be expressly plighted, which should suddenly and without previous notice, exercise its territorial powers in a manner not consonant to the usages and received obligations of the civilized world.

This full and absolute territorial jurisdiction being alike the attribute of every sovereign, and being incapable of conferring extraterritorial power, would not seem to contemplate foreign sovereigns nor their sovereign rights as its objects. One sovereign being in no respect amenable to another; and being bound by obligations of the highest character not to degrade the dignity of his nation, by placing himself or its sovereign rights within the jurisdiction of another, can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign station, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication, and will be extended to him.

This perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns, and this common interest impelling them to mutual intercourse, and an interchange of good offices with each other, have given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction, which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation.

1st. One of these is admitted to be the exemption of the person of the sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory.

If he enters that territory with the knowledge and license of its sovereign, that license, although containing no stipulation exempting his person from arrest, is universally understood to imply such stipulation.

Why has the whole civilized world concurred in this construction? The answer cannot be mistaken. A foreign sovereign is not understood as intending to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity, and the dignity of his nation, and it is to avoid this 138*] subjection *that the license has been obtained. The character to whom it is given, and the object for which it is granted, equally require that it should be construed to impart full security to the person who has obtained it. This security, however, need not be expressed; it is implied from the circumstances of the case.

Should one sovereign enter the territory of another, without the consent of that other, expressed or implied, it would present a question which does not appear to be perfectly settled, a decision of which is not necessary to any conclusion to which the court may come in the cause under consideration. If he did not thereby expose himself to the territorial jurisdiction of the sovereign, whose dominions he had entered, it would seem to be because all sovereigns impliedly engage not to avail themselves of a power over their equal, which a romantic confidence in their magnanimity has placed in their hands.

2d. A second case, standing on the same principles with the first, is the immunity which all civilized nations allow to foreign ministers.

Whatever may be the principle on which this immunity is established, whether we consider him as in the place of the sovereign he represents, or by a political fiction suppose him to be extraterritorial, and, therefore, in point of law, not within the jurisdiction of the sovereign at whose court he resides; still the immunity itself is granted by the governing power of the nation to which the minister is deputed. This fiction of extraterritoriality could not be erected and supported against the will of the sovereign of the territory. He is supposed to assent to it.

This consent is not expressed. It is true that in some countries, and in this among others, a special law is enacted for the case. But the law obviously proceeds on the idea of prescribing the punishment of an act previously unlawful, not of granting to a foreign minister a privilege which he would not otherwise possess.

The assent of the sovereign to the very important and extensive exemptions from territorial jurisdiction *which are admitted [*139 to attach to foreign ministers, is implied from the considerations that, without such exemption, every sovereign would hazard his own dignity by employing a public minister abroad. His minister would owe temporary and local allegiance to a foreign prince, and would be less competent to the objects of his mission. A sovereign committing the interests of his nation with a foreign power, to the care of a person whom he has selected for that purpose, cannot intend to subject his minister in any degree to that power; and, therefore, a consent to receive him, implies a consent that he shall possess those privileges which his principal intended he should retain—privileges which are essential to the dignity of his sovereign, and to the duties he is bound to perform.

In what cases a minister, by infracting the laws of the country in which he resides, may subject himself to other punishment than will be inflicted by his own sovereign, is an inquiry foreign to the present purpose. If his crimes be such as to render him amenable to the local jurisdiction, it must be because they forfeit the privileges annexed to his character; and the minister, by violating the conditions under which he was received as the representative of a foreign sovereign, has surrendered the immunities granted on those conditions; or, according to the true meaning of the original assent, has ceased to be entitled to them.

3d. A third case in which a sovereign is understood to cede a portion of his territorial jurisdiction is, where he allows the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions.

In such case, without any express declaration waving jurisdiction over the army to which this right of passage has been granted, the sovereign who should attempt to exercise it would certainly be considered as violating his faith. By exercising it, the purpose for which the free passage was granted would be defeated, and a portion of the military force of a foreign independent nation would be diverted from those national objects and duties to which it was applicable, and would be withdrawn from the control of the sovereign whose power and whose safety might greatly depend on retaining *the exclusive command and dis- [*140 position of this force. The grant of free passage therefore implies a waiver of all jurisdiction over the troops during their passage, and permits the foreign general to use that discipline, and to inflict those punishments which the government of his army may require.

But if, without such express permit, an army should be led through the territories of a foreign prince, might the jurisdiction of the territory be rightfully exercised over the individuals composing this army?

Without doubt, a military force can never gain immunities of any other description than those which war gives, by entering a foreign territory against the will of its sovereign. But if his consent, instead of being expressed by a particular license, be expressed by a general declaration that foreign troops may pass through a specified tract of country, a distinction between such general permit and a particular license is not perceived. It would seem reasonable that every immunity which would be conferred by a special license, would be in like manner conferred by such general permit.

We have seen that a license to pass through a territory implies immunities not expressed, and it is material to inquire why the license itself may not be presumed?

It is obvious that the passage of an army through a foreign territory will probably be at all times inconvenient and injurious, and would often be imminently dangerous to the sovereign through whose dominion it passed. Such a practice would break down some of the most decisive distinctions between peace and war; and would reduce a nation to the necessity of resisting by war an act not absolutely hostile in its character, or of exposing itself to the stratagems and frauds of a power whose integrity might be doubted, and who might enter the country under deceitful pretexts. It is for reasons like these that the general license to foreigners to enter the dominions of a friendly power is never understood to extend to a military force; and an army marching into the dominions of another sovereign may justly be considered as committing an act of hostility; and, if not opposed by force, acquires no privi-
141*] lege by its irregular and improper *conduct. It may, however, well be questioned whether any other than the sovereign power of the state be capable of deciding that such military commander is without a license.

But the rule which is applicable to armies, does not appear to be equally applicable to ships of war entering the ports of a friendly power. The injury inseparable from the march of an army through an inhabited country, and the dangers often, indeed generally, attending it, do not ensue from admitting a ship of war, without special license, into a friendly port. A different rule therefore with respect to this species of military force has been generally adopted. If, for reasons of state, the ports of a nation generally, or any particular ports be closed against vessels of war generally, or the vessels of any particular nation, notice is usually given of such determination. If there be no prohibition, the ports of a friendly nation are considered as open to the public ships of all powers with whom it is at peace, and they are supposed to enter such ports and to remain in them while allowed to remain, under the protection of the government of the place.

In almost every instance, the treaties between civilized nations contain a stipulation to this effect in favor of vessels driven in by stress of weather or other urgent necessity. In such cases the sovereign is bound by compact to authorize foreign vessels to enter his ports. The treaty binds him to allow vessels in distress to find refuge and asylum in his ports, and this is a license which he is not at liberty to retract. It would be difficult to assign a reason for withholding from a license thus granted, any immunity from local jurisdiction which would be implied in a special license.

If there be no treaty applicable to the case, and the sovereign, from motives deemed adequate by himself, permits his ports to remain open to the public ships of foreign friendly powers, the conclusion seems irresistible, that they enter by his assent. And if they enter by his assent necessarily implied, no just reason is perceived by the court for distinguishing their case from that of vessels which enter by express assent.

*In all the cases of exemption which [142 have been reviewed, much has been implied, but the obligation of what was implied has been found equal to the obligation of that which was expressed. Are there reasons for denying the application of this principle to ships of war?

In this part of the subject a difficulty is to be encountered, the seriousness of which is acknowledged, but which the court will not attempt to evade.

Those treaties which provide for the admission and safe departure of public vessels entering a port from stress of weather, or other urgent cause, provide in like manner for the private vessels of the nation; and where public vessels enter a port under the general license which is implied merely from the absence of a prohibition, they are, it may be urged, in the same condition with merchant vessels entering the same port for the purposes of trade who cannot thereby claim any exemption from the jurisdiction of the country. It may be contended, certainly with much plausibility if not correctness, that the same rule and same principle are applicable to public and private ships; and since it is admitted that private ships entering without special license become subject to the local jurisdiction, it is demanded on what authority an exception is made in favor of ships of war.

It is by no means conceded, that a private vessel really availing herself of an asylum provided by treaty, and not attempting to trade, would become amenable to the local jurisdiction, unless she committed some act forfeiting the protection she claims under compact. On the contrary, motives may be assigned for stipulating, and according immunities to vessels in cases of distress, which would not be demanded for, or allowed to those which enter voluntarily and for ordinary purposes. On this part of the subject, however, the court does not mean to indicate any opinion. The case itself may possibly occur, and ought not to be prejudged.

Without deciding how far such stipulations in favor of distressed vessels, as are usual in treaties, may exempt private ships from the jurisdiction of the place, it may safely be asserted, that the whole reasoning upon which such exemption has been implied in other cases, 143*] *applies with full force to the exemption of ships of war in this.

"It is impossible to conceive," says Vattel, "that a prince who sends an ambassador or any other minister can have any intention of subjecting him to the authority of a foreign power; and this consideration furnishes an additional argument, which completely establishes the independency of a public minister. If it cannot be reasonably presumed that his sovereign means to subject him to the authority of the prince to whom he is sent, the latter, in receiving the minister, consents to admit him on the footing of independency; and thus there exists between the two princes a tacit convention, which gives a new force to the natural obligation."

Equally impossible is it to conceive, whatever may be the construction as to private ships, that a prince who stipulates a passage for his troops, or an asylum for his ships of war in distress, should mean to subject his army or his navy to the jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign. And if this cannot be presumed, the sovereign of the port must be considered as having conceded the privilege to the extent in which it must have been understood to be asked.

To the court, it appears, that where, without treaty, the ports of the nation are open to the private and public ships of a friendly power, whose subjects have also liberty without special license, to enter the country for business or amusement, a clear distinction is to be drawn between the rights accorded to private individuals or private trading vessels, and those accorded to public armed ships which constitute a part of the military force of the nation.

The preceding reasoning has maintained the propositions that all exemptions from territorial jurisdiction must be derived from the consent of the sovereign of the territory; that this consent may be implied or expressed; and that when implied, its extent must be regulated by the nature of the case, and the views under which the parties requiring and conceding it must be supposed to act.

144*] *When private individuals of one nation spread themselves through another as business or caprice may direct, mingling indiscriminately with the inhabitants of that other, or when merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the government to degradation, if such individuals or merchants did not owe temporary and local allegience, and were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption. His subjects thus passing into foreign countries, are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently there are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no one motive for requiring it. The implied license, therefore, under which they enter can never be construed to grant such exemption.

But in all respects different is the situation of a public armed ship. She constitutes a part of the military force of her nation; acts under the immediate and direct command of the sovereign; is employed by him in national objects. He has many and powerful motives for preventing those objects from being defeated by the interference of a foreign state. Such interference cannot take place without affecting his power and his dignity. The implied license, therefore, under which such vessel enters a friendly port, may reasonably be construed, and it seems to the court, ought to be construed, as containing an exemption from the jurisdiction of the sovereign, within whose territory she claims the rights of hospitality.

Upon these principles, by the unanimous consent of nations, a foreigner is amenable to the laws of the place; but certainly in practice, nations have not yet asserted their jurisdiction over the public armed ships of a foreign sovereign entering a port open for their reception.

Bynkershoek, a jurist of great reputation, has indeed maintained that the property of a foreign sovereign is not distinguishable by any legal exemption from the *property of [145 an ordinary individual, and has quoted several cases in which courts have exercised jurisdiction over causes in which a foreign sovereign was made a party defendant.

Without indicating any opinion on this question, it may safely be affirmed that there is a manifest distinction between the private property of a person who happens to be a prince, and that military force which supports the sovereign power, and maintains the dignity and the independence of a nation. A prince, by acquiring private property in a foreign country, may possibly be considered as subjecting that property to the territorial jurisdiction; he may be considered as so far laying down the prince, and assuming the character of a private individual; but this he cannot be presumed to do with respect to any portion of that armed force which upholds his crown, and the nation he is entrusted to govern.

The only applicable case cited by Bynkershoek, is that of the Spanish ships of war seized in Flushing for a debt, due from the King of Spain. In that case, the state's general interposed; and there is reason to believe, from the manner in which the transaction is stated, that, either by the interference of government, or the decision of the court, the vessels were released.

This case of the Spanish vessels is, it is believed, the only case furnished by the history of the world of an attempt made by an individual to assert a claim against a foreign prince by seizing the armed vessels of the nation. That this proceeding was at once arrested by the government, in a nation which appears to have asserted the power of proceeding in the same manner against the private property of the prince, would seem to furnish no feeble argument in support of the universality of the opinion in favor of the exemption claimed for ships of war. The distinction made in our own laws between public and private ships would appear to proceed from the same opinion.

It seems, then, to the court, to be a principle of public law, that national ships of war, entering the port of a friendly power open for their reception, are to be *considered [146 as exempted by the consent of that power from its jurisdiction.

Without doubt, the sovereign of the place is capable of destroying this implication. He may claim and exercise jurisdiction either by employing force, or by subjecting such vessels to the ordinary tribunals. But until such power be exerted in a manner not to be misunderstood, the sovereign cannot be considered as having imparted to the ordinary tribunals a jurisdiction which it would be a breach of faith to exercise. Those general statutory provisions, therefore, which are descriptive of the ordinary jurisdiction of the judicial tribunals, which give an individual, whose property has been wrested from him, a right to claim that property in the courts of the country in which it is found, ought not, in the opinion of this court, to be so construed as to give them jurisdiction in a case in which the sovereign power has impliedly consented to waive its jurisdiction.

The arguments in favor of this opinion which have been drawn from the general inability of the judicial power to enforce its decisions in cases of this description, from the consideration that the sovereign power of the nation is alone competent to avenge wrongs committed by a sovereign, that the questions to which such wrongs give birth are rather questions of policy than of law, that they are for diplomatic, rather than legal discussion, are of great weight, and merit serious attention. But the argument has already been drawn to a length which forbids a particular examination of these points.

The principles which have been stated, will now be applied to the case at bar.

In the present state of the evidence and proceedings, the Exchange must be considered as a vessel, which was the property of the libelants, whose claim is repelled by the fact that she is now a national armed vessel, commissioned by, and in the service of, the Emperor of France. The evidence of this fact is not controverted. But it is contended, that it constitutes no bar to an inquiry into the validity of the title by which the Emperor holds this vessel. Every person, it is alleged, who is entitled to property brought within the jurisdiction of 147] our courts, has a *right to assert his title in those courts, unless there be some law taking his case out of the general rule. It is therefore said to be the right, and if it be the right, it is the duty of the court to inquire whether this title has been extinguished by an act, the validity of which is recognized by national or municipal law.

If the preceding reasoning be correct, the Exchange, being a public armed ship, in the service of a foreign sovereign, with whom the government of the United States is at peace, and having entered an American port open for her reception, on the terms on which ships of war are generally permitted to enter the ports of a friendly power, must be considered as having come into the American territory under an implied promise, that while necessarily within it, and demeaning herself in a friendly manner, she should be exempt from the jurisdiction of the country.

If this opinion be correct, there seems to be a necessity for admitting that the fact might be disclosed to the court by the suggestion of the attorney for the United States.

I am directed to deliver it, as the opinion of the court, that the sentence of the Circuit Court, reversing the sentence of the District Court, in the case of the Exchange be reversed, and that of the District Court, dismissing the libel, be affirmed.

ARCHIBALD FREELAND
v.
HERON, LENOX & COMPANY.

An account current sent by a foreign merchant to a merchant in this country and not objected to for two years, is deemed an account stated and throws the burden of proof upon him who received and kept it without objection.

THIS cause having been argued by Winder, for the appellant, and P. B. Key, for the appellees.

All the Judges being present,

DUVALL, Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*This case comes up by appeal from [148 the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.

The record presents the following state of facts: A bill in equity was filed by Heron, Lenox & Company against Archibald Freeland, the appellant, in the Circuit Court, in the month of December, 1798. It states that the company consisted of Nathaniel Heron, a subject of Great Britain, Samuel Lenox, also a subject of Great Britain, and James Freeland and William Gillin. That articles of copartnership between the said company and Archibald Freeland, of Virginia, were entered into on the 15th of February, 1789, to commence on the first day of April following, and to continue for five years, unless sooner dissolved by mutual consent. It is stipulated by the articles that the business of the copartnership should be managed and carried on in the town of Manchester, in Virginia, by Archibald Freeland, under the firm of James Freeland. That there should be no advance put on the goods furnished but the charges and commissions in Britain, and that all bounties, discounts and abatements which might be received, should be credited. The complainants in their bill further state that Archibald Freeland had the sole management of the affairs of the company, and the care and custody of the books and funds.

That during the existence of the copartnership, Heron, Lenox & Company remitted to James & A. Freeland goods, wares and merchandise, to the amount of several thousand pounds sterling, and had received some payments, but that a considerable balance remained due to them on account of those remittances; that J. & A. Freeland had been frequently called on to account and pay the balance due. That the firm of J. & A. Freeland had been long since dissolved by mutual consent; and that A. Freeland, retaining all the books and effects of the company, had refused to account and pay the balance due; and they pray relief.

To this bill A. Freelaud filed his answer, admitting the copartnership, as stated, and that the business of the concern had been conducted by him at Manchester, until the 10th day of April, 1795, when by contract the whole of the property of the copartnery was vested in 149] *him for his own use and benefit upon the conditions therein expressed; and he insists that upon a fair settlement of the accounts between the complainants and him agreeably to the custom of merchants in London, as stipulated by the said contract, he owes nothing.

It further appears that shipments of merchandise by Heron, Lenox & Company were made from time to time, during the first four years of the concern, amounting in the whole to more than £19,000 sterling, and that remittances were made by A. Freeland in bills of exchange and country produce during the same period to a large amount; and that in the year 1793 the partnership was dissolved by mutual consent. A. Freeland continued to settle and liquidate the accounts of the firm at Manchester; and in September, 1796, wrote a letter to Freeland and Gillin, of which the following is an extract: "Your claim will be among the first of my debts that is paid; for the indulgence I have met with, I have to thank you, and mean to exert myself in order to pay off the whole as early as possible."

During the pendency of this suit in the Circuit Court, a cross bill was filed by A. Freeland against Heron, Lenox & Company for discovery, which they answered by denying the allegations in the bill without disclosing the evidence sought for. No exception, however, was taken to the answer.

An order had passed directing an account to be stated by a commissioner appointed for the purpose, who reported that there was due from A. Freeland to Heron, Lenox & Company a balance of one thousand one hundred and sixty pounds seventeen shillings and tenpence sterling, to which report various exceptions were taken by the defendant.

On the 14th of December, 1809, the cause came on to be heard in the Circuit Court upon the bill, answer and exhibits, and the report of the commissioner, when it was adjudged, ordered and decreed that the defendant, A. Freeland, pay to the plaintiffs, Heron, Lenox & Co., the sum reported to be due by the commissioner, at certain specified periods, with interest from the first day of June, 1798, and costs; 150] and the cross bill was *dismissed with costs. From which decree the defendant appealed.

The exceptions taken to the report of the commissioner in the court below have been urged on the part of the appellant in this court, and may be comprised under the following heads:

1. That he has not given the defendant credit for all the bounties, drawbacks and duties which were allowed to the complainants on the purchase and shipment of the goods in England, which he ought to have allowed agreeably to the contract of copartnership.

2. That the commissioner adopted a mode of calculating interest contrary to the agreement of the parties in April, 1795, and prejudicial to the defendant.

3. That he allowed the complainants a commission on the sales of produce shipped directly to Cadiz, Lisbon and other places, where the property was consigned directly to persons residing in those several places; by them sold, and who charged the ordinary commission, and who remitted the proceeds to the complainants in London.

4. That he has not given credit to the defendant for 25 hogsheads of tobacco.

There was another exception, but as it was abandoned in the argument by the counsel it will not be noticed.

With respect to the first, third and fourth exceptions, the record does not furnish the evidence necessary to enable the court to form a correct decision from the facts. The positive assertions of the appellant are denied by the appellees; and in proof both are equally defective.

The appellant claims a credit of 764*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.* sterling on account of bounties, drawbacks and discounts: he has been allowed upwards of £300 sterling, and the appellees deny that he is entitled to more credit than is given, averring that more has not been received by *them. [151 Each insists that the onus probandi ought to be thrown on his adversary.

It is proper to observe that it appears by the record that Heron, Lenox & Company furnished A. Freeland with an account current annually for the four first years of their transactions, and that no objection was made to them. This circumstance, combined with the promise contained in A. Freeland's letter of September, 1796, to pay the whole balance due, affords room for the application of a rule of the chancery court and of merchants to decide the controversy. It is thus: When one merchant sends an account current to another residing in a different country, between whom there are mutual dealings, and he keeps it two years without making any objections, it shall be deemed a stated account, and his silence and acquiescence shall bind him, at least so far as to cast the onus probandi on him.

The same rule is applicable to the third exception. After an acquiescence of several years the account is considered as binding upon him, as he has failed to falsify the allegations of the appellees that the shipments of produce to Cadiz, Lisbon and Bourdeaux were made pursuant to their orders and under their superintendence.

He has failed also to prove that he is entitled to the credit insisted on in his fourth exception. To be entitled to the credit it is incumbent on him to prove that the 25 hogsheads are exclusive of the 80 hogsheads of tobacco shipped in the Mercury. The record affords no testimony whatever.

With respect to the second exception, it is considered by this court that the Circuit Court erred in sustaining the report of the commissioner as to the manner of stating the account between the parties. The commissioner adopted the mode established in Virginia, and which it is believed prevails generally throughout the United States: but by the written agreement of the parties in April, 1795, it is stipulated that the interest shall be charged agreeably to the custom and manner of settling accounts in London. In all other respects the opinion of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

*It is therefore the opinion of this [152

court that the decree of the Circuit Court with respect to the second exception be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court, in order that an account may be taken pursuant to the written agreement of the parties—agreeably to the custom and manner of settling accounts in London.

WELCH v. MANDEVILLE.

Present—All the Judges.

The refusal of the court below to re-instate a cause which has been legally dismissed, is no ground for a writ of error. The nominal plaintiff may dismiss a suit brought in his name by a creditor who has not an assignment of the cause of action.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

An action of covenant was brought in that court, in the name of James Welch, the plaintiff, but really for the use and by the sole orders of Allen Prior, against Mandeville and Jamesson, upon a contract for the sale of land to them by Welch. At the second term after an office judgment had been entered against Welch at the rules, the defendant, Mandeville, who alone had been taken, produced to the clerk a release under the seal of Welch and an order from him to dismiss the suit; whereupon the clerk made an entry on the minutes of the court that the action was dismissed by agreement of the parties. Afterwards, at the same term, the attorney who brought the suit in the name of Welch, moved the court to re-instate it, and grounded his motion upon his own affidavit and the papers mentioned therein. The affidavit stated, that in the autumn of 1799, Prior, brought to the attorney 3 bills of exchange, drawn by Welch upon Mandeville and Jamesson, for 2,500 dollars each, and an account in the handwriting of Mandeville, acknowledging a balance due to Welch on the 31st of January, 1798, of 8707 dollars and 9 cents to be paid in the times and manner therein stated. Prior, at the same time, stated that Welch was indebted to him, and that he had taken those bills in payment, which Mandeville and Jamesson refused to accept, say-

153*] ing that Welch *had deceived them in the sale of the lands. Prior left the papers with his attorney, and requested him to take the best measures to obtain the money from Mandeville and Jamesson; whereupon he brought two suits in the County Court of Fairfax, in Virginia, the one was a suit at law in the name of Welch against M. and J. founded upon their acknowledgement of the balance of account. The other was a chancery attachment, in the name of Prior against Welch, as an absent debtor, and charging M. and J. as garnishees.

Upon the trial of the suit at law, the defendants produced the original contract respecting the sale of land, whereupon the attorney for Welch suffered a non-suit, and having obtained an office copy of the contract brought the present suit thereon, for the use of Prior, in the name of Welch, but without his directions, which was known to Mandeville. There had been no decision in the chancery attachment. The attorney never had any communication with Welch upon the subject of this suit; but he had reason to believe that Welch knew of the suits in Fairfax county and did not interfere with them. The attorney corresponded solely with Prior on the subject of this suit, who had directed the application of the money when recovered. That the attorney did not know of the release and order to dismiss the suit until after the entry was made on the minutes, and that the suit had been dismissed without his consent or that of Prior, who had been at all the expense of the suit. That he had been informed that Welch was in the prison bounds, and that when Prior put the papers into his hands he informed him that it was his only prospect of receiving payment of the debt due to him by Welch.

Whereupon the defendant, Mandeville, produced the affidavit of Welch, stating that he drew the bills in favor of Prior, merely for him to get them accepted, and negotiate them for account of Welch and as his agent. That Prior never gave value for them, and instead of being the creditor of Welch, was his debtor; and that he (Welch) never made a transfer or assignment of the contract with Mandeville and Jamesson to Prior or any other person.

duced a paper purporting to be the answer of Welch to the chancery attachment in Fairfax county (but which had not then been filed in the suit), which contained the substance of his affidavit, and also a letter written by Welch to Mandeville and Jamesson, and sent by Prior at the time he presented the bills, corroborating the fact that Prior was only his agent in that business.

In this state of the case the court below continued the motion to re-instate the cause until the next term, to give an opportunity to Prior to produce evidence of an assignment of the contract and of his right to bring suit upon it; at which term he produced his own affidavit stating that Welch was indebted to him upwards of 14,000 dollars, and that Welch gave him the 3 drafts on Mandeville and Jamesson for his (Prior's) own use and benefit, for and on account of a tract of land sold to Welch, and which Welch sold to another person. He produced also certain other documents tending to corroborate his affidavit.

But the court below refused to re-instate the cause and ordered it to be dismissed according to the agreement of the parties; to which refusal Allen Prior took a bill of exceptions which the court signed.

Upon the opening of the case,

MARSHALL, Chief Justice, inquired whether the question, whether a refusal to re-instate a cause, be ground of error, had not been decided by this court.

E. I. Lee, for plaintiff in error, said that it had not been directly decided.

The clause of the act of Congress which gives this court appellate jurisdiction of causes decided in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia (Laws United States, vol. 5, p. 270, § 8), differs from that clause of the general judiciary which gives this court its appellate jurisdiction in other cases. The expression of the former clause is "any final judgment, order or decree;" but the expression in the general law (vol. 1, p. 62, § 22) is "final judgments and decrees." The word order must mean something different from a judgment or a decree. It seems peculiarly applicable to a final 155*] order *dismissing a suit. This peculiar phraseology was relied upon to give jurisdiction to this court in the case of Custiss v. The Georgetown Turnpike Company (Cranch, vol. 6, p. 233).

Swann, contra.

This case is within the principle of the cases already decided by this court—such as the refusal of the court below to grant a new trial, or to continue a cause. To re-instate a cause, after it has been once legally decided, is a matter of mere discretion.

E. I. Lee, in reply.

If the clerk had dismissed it at the rules, and the plaintiff had applied to the court at the next succeeding term to re-instate it, and the court had refused, it would not have been an exercise of discretion, but denial of right. It would have been error in law. (1 Strange, 235, Newell v. Pidgeon.)

C. Lee, on the same side.

There is a difference between dismissing a cause without trial and refusing a new trial. It cannot be possible that the court may dismiss every suit upon the docket and yet the injured parties have no remedy; which would be the case if the dismissing of a suit be matter of discretion which this court cannot control.

March 5th. All the Judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. Justice. The majority of the court is of opinion that the motion to re-instate the cause was an application to the discretion of the court, and its refusal is not a ground for a writ of error.

After the court had delivered this opinion it became a question whether the writ of error should be dismissed, or the judgment affirmed.

After consideration of the case again,

On the 7th of March,
156*] *MARSHALL, Ch. Justice, stated it to be the opinion of the court, that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. The writ of error is to the judgment generally. The refusal to re-instate the cause being no error in law, the court can see no error in the principal judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

MARSTELLER AND OTHERS v. M'CLEAN.

Present—All the Judges.

In order to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations to an action by joint tenants, it is necessary to show that all the plaintiffs were under a disability to sue.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This was an action of trespass for mesne profits after a recovery in ejactment by the present plaintiffs against the present defendant, who pleaded the statute of limitations, to which the plaintiffs replied, in substance, that Christiana, the wife of one of the plaintiffs, and Elizabeth, the wife of another of the plaintiffs, in whose rights they sue, "were femes covert "when the cause of action accrued, and have ever "since continued femes covert," and "that "Kitty Hunter," one of the plaintiffs, "was a "feme covert," and that the other plaintiffs, in whose right the suit was brought, were infants at the time the cause of action accrued, and also at the commencement of the action. To this replication there was a general demurrer and joinder, on which the court below rendered judgment for the defendant.

C. Simms and R. I. Taylor, for the defendant in error, contended,

1. That the replication was bad, because it did not show that all the plaintiffs were entitled to sue, notwithstanding the statute of limitations. It did not state that Kitty Hunter continued a feme covert until less than five years next before the commencement of the suit. If *her disability of coverture was removed [157 five years before bringing the action, she was barred by the statute; and the replication being joint, if bad as to one, is bad as to all.

2. That upon a demurrer the court will give judgment against that party who commits the first fault in pleading. The declaration states all the material allegations under a "whereas"—a quod cum. It is all recital, which is fatal upon a general demurrer, or upon a motion in arrest of judgment.

The courts of Virginia follow the practice of the king's bench in England, where this exception has always been held good. (1 Str., 621, Amyon v. Shore; 2 Hen. and Mun., 595, Hord. v. Dishman; 3 Hen. and Mun., 134, Moore's Admr. v. Dauney; Id. 271, Lomax v. Ford; 4 Hen. and Mun., 277, Sym v. Griffith.)

E. I. Lee, contra.

The objection to the declaration is only an objection to form. The statute of jeofails in Virginia does not justify the cases cited from the Court of Appeals. Upon a demurrer to the replication the defendant cannot take advantage of an error in the declaration.

As to the objection that the replication does not state that Kitty Hunter continued a feme sole, it is sufficient for us if we show that some of the plaintiffs are not barred by the statute. Those who were under a disability are not to be prejudiced by the negligence of those who were not disabled. Joint tenants cannot sue severally, they must join. (1Tidd. Prac., 7; 1 Sanders, 291; note 4, Cobel v. Vaughan, 2 W. Bl., 1077.) If the plea is bad as to some of the plaintiffs it is bad as to all. (2 Sand., 49, 50; 1 Sand., 28.)

Taylor, in reply.

The case of Perry v. Jackson (4 T. R., 516) was the first in which it was decided that the statute runs against all the joint plaintiffs if any of them were free from disability. In that case it was replied to the plea of limitations, that one of the plaintiffs was beyond seas, and the replication was adjudged bad.

E. I. Lee.* The declaration states [*158 that some of the plaintiffs are infants; the plea was no bar to those plaintiffs. In the case of Perry v. Jackson the plaintiffs were partners in trade. It was a voluntary association; but here the plaintiffs are joined by act of law.

March 13th. All the Judges being present, STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The plaintiffs in error brought an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, to which the defendant in error pleaded the statute of limitations. The replication in substance states that, at the time when the cause of action accrued, Christiana, wife of one of the plaintiffs, and Elizabeth, wife of another of the plaintiffs, "were femes covert, and ever since have continued femes covert;" and "that Kitty "Hunter," one of the plaintiffs, "was a feme "covert;" and that the other plaintiffs in whose right the suit was brought, at the time when the action accrued, and also at the commencement of the suit, were infants. To this replication there is a general demurrer and joinder on which the court below gave judgment for the defendant.

It is contended by the defendant that this replication is insufficient, inasmuch as it does not allege that Kitty Hunter continued a feme covert until within five years, the time prescribed by the statute of limitations for the pursuit of this remedy. And it is further contended, that, even if the replication be good, yet the plaintiffs ought not to recover, because the declaration charges the trespass by way of recital—"for that whereas the defendant with force and arms," &c.—and not by positive and direct allegations as the law requires. On this last exception the court do not intend to give any opinion; but unless the point were fully settled by authority, they would feel little inclination to sustain an objection which would seem directed more to the form than the merits of the action.

The objection to the replication deserves more consideration. It is certainly a rule of pleading that a replication should of itself contain a full and complete answer to the bar, and that a joint plea which is bad, affects with its consequences all the parties joining in it. [159*] *In the present case it may be true that Kitty Hunter was a feme covert at the time when the action accrued; and yet it may be equally true that five years have elapsed since the disability was removed. It was therefore incumbent on the plaintiffs, not barely to show a coverture, but, by a proper averment, to show its continuance to a time within which it would have been a perfect avoidance of the bar. The objection then would have been fatal in a several action brought by Kitty Hunter.

But it is said that though the replication be bad as to one of the plaintiffs, yet it can only bar her; that the infancy or coverture of the other plaintiffs entitles them to a recovery in this action for the injury done to them; and that, as parceners and tenants in common are compellable to join in actions of this nature, it would be hard to affect them with the disability of a co-tenant.

It seems, however, to be a settled rule that all the plaintiffs in a suit must be competent to sue, otherwise the action cannot be supported; and the case of Perry v. Jackson, cited from 4 Term Reports, 516, decides that a plea of the statute of limitations, which is good as to one partner, bars them both in a joint action. When once the statute runs against one of two parties entitled to a joint action, it operates as a bar to such joint action.

It is therefore the opinion of the court that as this answer to the objection fails, the replication must be adjudged insufficient, and of course the bar must prevail.

Judgment affirmed.

WELCH v. LINDO.

Present—All the Judges.

The mere possession of a promissory note by an indorsee, who had indorsed it to another, is not sufficient evidence of his right of action against his indorser, without a re-assignment or receipt from the last indorsee. An indorsement "without recourse," is not evidence of money had and received by the indorser to the use of the indorsee.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria.

*Welch brought an action of assumpsit against Lindo, upon his indorsement of a promissory note. The declaration contained two counts. The 1st count stated, that one John Kercheval, on the 25th of August, 1796, made and delivered a promissory note to Lindo, payable to his order on demand, for 246 dollars, for value received. That Lindo, on the 24th of January, 1800, indorsed it to Welch (the plaintiff) in these words, viz.: "Pay the within to James Welch, or order, without any recourse whatever on—A. Lindo." That on the 30th of April, 1800, Welch assigned the note to a certain William Hodgsett, by writing on the back thereof the following words, viz.: "I assign the within to William Hodgsett," and signed his name thereto, and delivered it to Hodgsett. That Kercheval failed to pay the money to Hodgsett on demand, whereupon Hodgsett, as assignee of the note, brought suit against Kercheval, the maker thereof, in the Circuit Court of Woodford County, in the state of Kentucky; in which suit Kercheval, pleaded that he had paid the debt to Lindo; upon which plea issue was joined, and the jury found a general verdict thereupon, for the defendant, Kercheval, upon which the court rendered a judgment, which still remains in full force; by reason of which premises the plaintiff, Welch, became liable to pay to Hodgsett the 246 dollars, with interest from the time the suit was brought (viz., the 11th of June, 1803,) until the 2d of November, 1804, the time when he paid the same to Hodgsett, and the costs of that suit, amounting to 11 dollars and 72 cents, and did pay the same; of all which premises the defendant had notice, and by reason whereof, he became liable to pay the said 246 dollars, with interest on the same, and the said 11 dollars and 72 cents, being the costs as aforesaid; and being so liable, the defendant, in consideration thereof, afterwards, &c., undertook, &c., to pay the same sum to the plaintiff, &c. [160*]

The 2d count was for money had and received to the plaintiff's use.

Upon the issue of non assumpsit, there was a verdict in the court below, for the plaintiff, on the first count, and for the defendant, on the second count, but the judgment on the first count was arrested, and judgment was entered for the defendant.

161*] *Upon the trial the plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, which stated, that he offered in evidence a duly authenticated copy of the record of the Circuit Court of Woodford County, in the suit of Hodgsett against Kercheval, which was inserted in the bill of exceptions; and produced the original promissory note, with its indorsements, and proved the handwriting of the defendant, Lindo, to his indorsement, and offered no other evidence; whereupon the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the evidence so offered and produced, is not of itself competent to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action; and the court decided that it was not competent to enable the plaintiff to recover upon the second count, but the judges were divided in opinion, whether the same was competent to support the first count, and therefore refused to give the instruction as prayed. To the opinion that the evidence was not competent to support the action upon the count for money had and received, the plaintiff excepted.

The motion in arrest of judgment was grounded upon the general insufficiency of the first count.

E. I. Lee, for plaintiff in error.

1st. There was sufficient evidence prima facie, to support the count, for money had and received.

The indorsement of the note was evidence of money had and received, and the record showed that the consideration for which it was received had failed. And where a man pays money upon a consideration which fails, he may recover it back by the action for money had and received. (1 Esp., N.P.,3 & 4; Doug., 696; Chitty, 190, 123, 124, 125; 3 Cranch, 318; 2 Burr, 1226; 1 Johnson, 590, Green v. Hart; 2 Johnson, 52, Russell v. Ball; 2 Burr, 1005, 1008, 1010, 1011.)

2d. The first count shows a good cause of action. It was not necessary to avert fraud; but if it was, the want of such an averment is cured by the verdict; for a verdict helps everything which is necessary to be proved upon the trial, and without proof of which no verdict ought to have been given for the plaintiff. (Carthew,389; 10 Mod.,300; 2 Vin.,ab.396; [W. a.] and [W. b.]

162*] Swann* & Jones, contra.

1. The evidence was insufficient even if it had been a common indorsement. The note having been assigned by the plaintiff to Hodgsett, it did not appear but that the right of action was still in the latter; but Lindo having expressly stipulated in his indorsement that he would not be liable, cannot be made liable by an implied assumpsit.

2. The first count was bad because, 1st. It did not aver any consideration for the indorsement. 2d. The defendant expressly excluded his liability. 3d. No fraud is averred; and, 4th. There was no averment of a re-assignment of the note.

E. I. Lee, in reply.

The possesion of the note by the plaintiff was evidence that he had repaid the money to Hodgsett. A re-assignment of the note would have made Welch a remote assignee, and he could not have maintained a suit at law against Lindo. Lindo, by implication, warranted that the money was due from Kercheval, as every vendor warrants his title. The record between Hodgsett and Kercheval shows fraud in Lindo.

March 9th. All the Judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch: J., delivered the following opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, in the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria. The declaration contained two counts. The first was special, and the second for money had and received, by the defendant to the plaintiff's use.

At the trial of the cause, the plaintiff gave, in evidence, the record of the proceedings in a court in the state of Kentucky, in a cause in which William Hodgsett, assignee of James Welch, who was assignee of Abraham Lindo, was plaintiff, and John Kercheval was defendant. This suit was instituted on a promissory note. The defendant pleaded payment to Lindo. Issue *was joined on this plea, and [163 a verdict was found for the defendant. The plaintiff also produced the original note with the indorsements thereon, the last of which was an assignment made by him to Hodgsett.

On the prayer of the defendant, the court decided that this evidence was not, in itself, sufficient to support the action on the second count, and to this opinion the counsel for the plaintiff excepted.

The testimony offered by the plaintiff was certainly incompetent of itself to prove that the defendant had received money to his use. The mere possession of a note which he had assigned to another could not, while that assignment remained, be evidence that the note was his property. Some re-assignment or receipt from the last assignee was necessary while the indorsements remained to prove that the title against the prior indorser was in him, and that he had paid a sum of money which gave him a claim on that indorser. And if the record of the state of Kentucky could prove that Lindo had received the money due upon the note, it would not prove that he had received it to the use of the plaintiff. Nor, under this indorsement, which is an assignment of the note without expressing value received, and that, too, without recourse against the assignor, can it be fairly inferred that the nominal value of the note was actually paid.

There is, then, no error in the direction given by the Circuit Court.

On the first count, there was a verdict for the plaintiff, but judgment was arrested, because that count was insufficient in law.

This count states, that a promissory note was made by John Kercheval, payable to Abraham Lindo; that Lindo indorsed that note to the plaintiff, in these words, "pay the within to James Welch, or order, without any recourse whatever on—A. Lindo." That the plaintiff indorsed the said note to William Hodgsett, who instituted a suit thereon, in which the said Kercheval pleaded that he had paid the debt to Abraham Lindo. A verdict was found for the defendant, on which a judgment was *rendered, which remains in full force. [164 By these proceedings, the plaintiff became liable to pay the said Hodgsett the amount of the said note and costs of suit, which he had actually paid. The declaration then proceeds to state, that, by reason of the premises, the defendant, Abraham Lindo, became liable to pay the plaintiff the amount of the said note and costs of suit, and, being so liable, he assumed, &c.

Under the mere assignment from Lindo to Welch, it is clear that this suit is not sustainable; because it is a part of the contract, that Lindo shall not be liable under his indorsement. The count is also defective, in not stating that the indorsement was made on a valuable consideration, and also in not averring that Lindo had actually received the money for which the note was given.

These are substantial faults, which are not cured by a verdict. The declaration presents a case in which there was no liability on the part of the defendant, to the plaintiff, which can sustain the assumpsit found by the verdict.

There is no error and the judgment is affirmed.

THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY
v.
WILSON.

A legislative act, declaring that certain lands which should be purchased for the Indians, should not, thereafter, be subject to any tax, constituted a contract, which could not be rescinded by a subsequent legislative act; such repealing act being void under that clause of the constitution of the United States which prohibits a state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

THIS case was submitted to this court, upon a statement of facts, without argument.

March 3d. All the Judges being present, MARSHALL, Ch. Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered in the court of last resort in the state of New Jersey, by which the plaintiffs allege they are deprived of a right secured to them by the constitution of the United States.

165*] *The case appears to be this:

The remnant of the tribe of Deleware Indians, previous to the 20th February, 1758, had claims to a considerable portion of lands in New Jersey, to extinguish which became an object with the government and proprietors under the conveyance from King Charles 2d, to the Duke of York. For this purpose a convention was held in February, 1758, between the Indians and commissioners appointed by the government of New Jersey; at which the Indians agreed to specify particularly the lands which they claimed, release their claim to all others, and to appoint certain chiefs to treat with commissioners on the part of the government for the final extinguishment of their whole claim.

On the 9th of August, 1758, the Indian deputies met the commissioners and delivered to them a proposition reduced to writing—the basis of which was, that the government should purchase a tract of land on which they might reside—in consideration of which they would release their claim to all other lands in New Jersey south of the river Rariton.

This proposition appears to have been assented to by the commissioners; and the legislature on the 12th of August, 1758, passed an act to give effect to this agreement.

This act, among other provisions, authorizes the purchase of lands for the Indians, restrains them from granting leases or making sales, and enacts "that the lands to be purchased for the "Indians aforesaid shall not hereafter be subject "to any tax, any law, usage or custom to the "contrary thereof, in any wise notwithstand-"ing."

In virtue of this act, the convention with the Indians was executed. Lands were purchased and conveyed to trustees for their use, and the Indians released their claim to the south part of New Jersey.

The Indians continued in peaceable possession of the lands thus conveyed to them until some time in the year 1801, when, having become desirous of migrating from *the [166 state of New Jersey, and of joining their brethren at Stoekbridge, in the state of New York, they applied for, and obtained an act of the legislature of New Jersey, authorizing a sale of their land in that state.

This act contains no expression in any manner respecting the privilege of exemption from taxation which was annexed to those lands by the act under which they were purchased and settled on the Indians.

In 1803, the commissioners under the last recited act sold and conveyed the lands to the plaintiffs, George Painter and others.

In October, 1804, the legislature passed an act repealing that section of the act of August, 1758, which exempts the lands therein mentioned from taxes. The lands were then assessed, and the taxes demanded. The plaintiffs, thinking themselves injured by this assessment, brought the case before the courts in the manner prescribed by the laws of New Jersey, and in the highest court of the state the validity of the repealing act was affirmed and the land declared liable to taxation. The cause is brought into this court by writ of error, and the question here to be decided is, does the act of 1804 violate the constitution of the United States?

The constitution of the United States declares that no state shall "pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

In the case of Fletcher v. Peck, it was decided in this court on solemn argument and much deliberation, that this provision of the constitution extends to contracts to which a state is a party, as well as to contracts between individuals. The question, then, is narrowed to the inquiry whether in the case stated, a contract existed, and whether that contract is violated by the act of 1804.

Every requisite to the formation of a contract is found in the proceedings between the then colony of New Jersey and the Indians. The subject was a purchase on the part of the government of extensive claims of the Indians, the extinguishment of which would quiet the title to a large portion of the province. A proposition to this effect is made, the terms stipulated, the *consideration agreed upon, which [167 is a tract of land with the privilege of exemption from taxation; and then, in consideration of the arrangement previously made, one of which this act of assembly is stated to be, the Indians execute their deed of cession. This is certainly a contract clothed in forms of unusual solemnity. The privilege, though for the benefit of the Indians, is annexed, by the terms which create it, to the land itself, not to their persons. It is for their advantage that it should be annexed to the land, because, in the event of a sale, on which alone the question could become material, the value would be enhanced by it.

It is not doubted but that the state of New Jersey might have insisted on a surrender of this privilege as the sole condition on which a sale of the property should be allowed. But this condition has not been insisted on. The land has been sold, with the assent of the state, with all its privileges and immunities. The purchaser succeeds, with the assent of the state, to all the rights of the Indians. He stands, with respect to this land, in their place, and claims the benefit of their contract. This contract is certainly impaired by a law which would annul this essential part of it.

Judgment of the Court.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the writ of error of the state of New Jersey, and was argued by counsel on the part of the plaintiffs in error; on consideration whereof, it is the opinion of the court, that there is error in the judgment of the said court of errors in this, that the judgment of the said court is founded on an act passed by the legislature of the state of New Jersey, in December, 1804, entitled "An act to repeal part of an act respecting lands purchased for the Indians;" which act, in the opinion of this court, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it impairs the obligation of a contract, and is, on that account, void. It is therefore considered by the court, that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the said court of errors, that judgment may be rendered therein annulling the assessment in the proceedings mentioned, so far as the same may respect the land in the said proceedings also mentioned.

168*] *KING v. RIDDLE.

Present—All the Judges.

A recital in a deed is good evidence to take a case out of the statute of limitations. A discharge under the insolvent law of the District of Columbia is no bar to an action.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

Riddle brought an action of assumpsit in the court below against King. The declaration contained a general count for money paid, laid out and expended by the plaintiff for the use of the Defendant, and a special count which stated that the defendant, in the year 1798, being taken in execution upon a judgment of the County Court of Fairfax at the suit of Fosters and May, gave a prison-bounds-bond, with sureties, which bond he forfeited, and judgment was obtained against his sureties. That the plaintiff (who was not bound in the bond) did afterwards, at the request of the defendant, advance, settle and pay the one-sixth part of the judgment, amounting to 350 dollars and 52 cents, and that the defendant in consideration thereof undertook, &c.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and non assumpsit infra quinque annos, &c., upon which issues were joined; and upon the trial the defendant took a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that the evidence was not sufficient in law to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action.

The evidence stated in the bill of exceptions was as follows:

1. A paper signed and sealed by the defendant on the 15th of July, 1804, reciting that the plaintiff and others had become his sureties for a large debt due to Mr. John Foster, and having become accountable, had paid the debt, and he, the defendant, being desirous to secure them as far as he could, assigned to Thomas Vowell, one of his sureties, certain bonds in trust to collect the money and distribute it equally among them.

2. The testimony of the said Thomas Vowell that he had never received anything upon those bonds.

*3. The testimony of John M'Donald, [169 that some time in the summer of 1799 he heard the defendant say he owed the plaintiff a sum of money, but he did not state the amount, nor upon what account he owed it.

4. An abstract of the judgment against the sureties amounting to 2,103 dollars and 12 cents; and,

5. A receipt at the bottom thereof signed by Fosters and May, dated September 18th, 1799, as follows: "The above sum of 2,103 dollars and 12 cents has been discharged by the negotiable notes of John Harper, William Harper, Thomas Vowell, Jr., Samuel Harper and Joshua Riddle, at thirty days, and the cash of Charles Harper, which notes, when paid, will stand in full payment of the above judgment and costs."

All the above named persons, except Joshua Riddle, the plaintiff, were bound in the bond.

The writ in the present suit was issued on the 1st of July, 1809.

The defendant offered in evidence a copy of his certificate of discharge from imprisonment, dated August 12, 1805, under the act of Congress for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia. (Vol. 6, p. 294.)

The verdict and judgment being against the defendant, he brought his writ of error.

E. I. Lee, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the plaintiff's evidence did not maintain his action.

If he had any cause of action it was upon the sealed instrument. There was no evidence of the request of the defendant to the plaintiff to pay the money, and he was under no legal obligation to pay it. He was not a party to the judgment on the prison-bounds-bond. The receipt states the judgment to be paid by the notes of the plaintiff and others; but it does not appear that the plaintiff has ever paid this note.

*2. There is no evidence to take the [170 case out of the statute of limitations, except the testimony of M'Donald, which is too vague and indefinite.

3. The defendant having been discharged under the insolvent act, no suit can be maintained against him, without showing that he has acquired new property since his discharge.

Swann, contra.

1. The plaintiff was no party to the sealed instrument. He is only named in the recital. It contained no contract on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff. But it is evidence from which the jury might infer that the plaintiff had paid the money at his request. It is true there was no positive evidence that the note had been paid, but there are circumstances from which the jury might infer it.

2. The recital in the instrument acknowledging the debt was on the 15th of July, 1804, and the suit was brought up on the 1st of July, 1809: so that 5 years had not elapsed.

3. The discharge under the insolvent law, only discharges the person; it is no bar to an action.

March 4th. All the judges (except Duvall, J.) being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

In this case the whole evidence is spread upon the record by the bill of exceptions, and the court below refused to instruct the jury (as requested by the defendant) that it was not sufficient in law to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action.

If the court ought to have given this instruction, their refusal is certainly error.

The evidence shows that a note was given, or money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the 171] defendant; but *it is objected that it was not paid at the request of the defendant. If the plaintiff was not bound to pay it, and if it was paid without the request of the defendant, it is certain that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, but the court thinks that the recital in the deed of assignment is evidence from which the jury might infer a request.

The court is also of opinion that the recital in the deed is sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations. Although the court is not willing to extend the effect of casual or accidental expressions farther than it has been, to take a case out of that statute, and although the court might be of opinion that the cases on that point have gone too far, yet this is not a casual or incautious expression: the deed admits the debts to be due on the 15th of July, 1804, and five years had not afterwards elapsed before the suit was brought.

Then it is objected that there is no evidence of the payment of the money by the plaintiff; but the court thinks that the recital of the deed is evidence from which the jury might infer the payment.

There was no error respecting the discharge under the insolvent act. It was ouly a discharge of the person and could not affect the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVY'S EXECUTORS v. FAW.

An award will not be set aside in equity on account of an omission by the arbitrators to act upon part of the matters submitted, unless that omission shall have injured the complainant.

When the price of land, and not the question of title, is submitted, the submission and award need not be by deed.

THIS case seems to be sufficiently stated in the following opinion, delivered by MARSHALL, Ch. J., on the 9th of March. All the Judges being present:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, sitting in Chancery, by which that court set aside an award made between the parties, and directed an account.

*The bill impeaches the award, be- [172 cause,

1. The arbiters exceeded their power.

2. They made no award with respect to a part of the matter submitted to them.

3. They were partial, and proceeded to make their award without hearing the party against whom it was made.

The arbitration bond binds the parties to submit to the award, order and arbitrament of Francis Peyton, Theophilus Harris and Thomas Herbert, or any two of them, respecting a controversy of several accounts and contracts existing between them.

A judgment at law has been obtained for the amount of the award; for relief against which and against the award itself this suit was instituted.

By the plaintiffs in error it is contended, that excess of power in arbiters is a defense at law, and is therefore not examinable in this court.

That the injured party may avail himself of this defeuse in a court of law, where the excess of power is apparent on the face of the award, is not controverted. But, in this case, it is not shown by the award itself, and the defendant insists that he was not at liberty, in a court of law, to avail himself of evidence dehors the award; and in support of this opiniou the case of Wills v. Maccarmick (2 Wilson, 149) has been much relied upon. Without decidiug that question, the court will proceed to inquire whether the defendant in error has succeeded in proving that, in this case, the arbiters have, in fact, exceeded their power.

It appears that Abraham Faw sold to David Davy a lot of ground, the purchase money for which was payable in four years, in four equal annual payments. Davy conveyed to Faw about the same time a lot which he had purchased from Elisha C. Dick, and which he held on the condition of making certain improvements. Davy becoming insolvent, it was agreed that his contract *with Faw [173 should be annulled, that the bonds he had given Faw for the purchase of the lot should be returned to him, and that he should surrender the bond for a title which Faw had executed. It had been stipulated that, in the event of his failing to pay the purchase money, and of the contract being avoided, the money actually paid by Davy to Faw should be considered as rent so far as rent was allowed. There had been some other dealings between the parties, and there had been a small piece of ground rented to Davy, on which he had put some inconsiderable improvements.

In this state of things they agreed to submit their affairs to arbitration, and the bond was executed which has been stated. The arbiters awarded that Faw should pay Davy £314 4*s*. 11*d*. and it is proved that, in making up the account between the parties, they debited Faw with £300 for the lot which had been conveyed to him by Davy. Faw contends that this was not a contract subsisting between the parties, and consequently is not included within the terms of the submission.

Faw alleges in his bill that this whole transaction was closed; that the lot conveyed to him by Davy formed no part of the consideration given for the lot he had sold, but was conveyed to him because Davy considered the rent reserved on that lot and the conditions of improvement, which were inserted in the deed, as equivalent to its full value. These allegations are denied in the answer; and the defendant avers that the price of the lot purchased by him was £500; that he conveyed the lot he had purchased from Dick at £100, and gave his bonds for £400, the residue of the purchase money; that, when this contract was annulled, he became entitled to his lot or to its value, and that this was one of the subjects submitted to the referees.

In addition to this testimony furnished by the answer, the defendant has produced the testimony of a witness who was present when the arbitration was agreed upon and the bond executed. He says that the lot purchased by the defendant from the plaintiff, and that which had been conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiff as well as other accounts between the parties formed the subjects of conversation.

174*] *Francis Peyton, one of the arbiters, declares that he considered all the transactions between Faw and Davy as submitted to them; that Faw himself laid before them the bond he had given to Davy for a conveyance of the lot he had sold, and that he always understood from Mr. Faw during the arbitration that he was willing to pay £100 for the lot conveyed to him by Davy. Peyton adds that the mode adopted by the arbiters for arranging that part of the subject, was understood by them to be the one which was most agreeable to Mr. Faw.

The court is of opinion that the plaintiff in the court below has failed in showing that the arbiters have exceeded their powers.

2. A second objection to this award is, that the arbiters have not settled the accounts between the parties for flour stored by Faw for Davy, which accounts were clearly within the submission.

The defendant has not shown that he is injured by this omission, and it is, therefore, unneccessary to decide whether, had he been injured, a court of equity could or could not have afforded relief.

3. A third ground on which the application for relief is placed, is the partiality and improper conduct of the arbiters.

That judges chosen by the parties themselves as well as those who are constituted by law, ought to be exempt from all imputation of partiality or corruption; that their conduct ought to be fair, and their proceedings regular, so as to give the parties an opportunity to be heard, and themselves the means of understanding the subjects they are to decide, are propositions not to be controverted. But corrupt motives are not lightly to be ascribed to the arbiter, nor is partiality to be attributed to him on account of difference of opinion with respect to the decision he has made.

The charge made in this case, that the parties were not sufficiently heard, is not supported, and is contradicted by the testimony in the cause. The general *charge of parti- [175 ality is also contradicted and is expressly denied by the arbiters, who have been made defendants, and by the deposition of Francis Peyton who did not sign the award.

Some particular facts have been proved, by which this charge, it is supposed by the counsel for the defendant in error, may be supported.

M'Kinsey Talbot deposes that, after the arbiters had separated, Thomas Herbert, who was one of them, said that David Davy ought to buy his winter's meat for him without making any charge on account of the particular service he had rendered him in the said arbitration.

That such language is unbecoming in a judge will not be denied; and if the circumstances leading to these expressions, and the manner in which they were uttered, had been stated in the record, and there had been reason to believe that the words were spoken seriously, they would have furnished objections to the award not easily to be removed. But nothing is stated which could give these expressions a serious aspect. They appear not to have been delivered confidentially; and as it is difficult to conceive that a man, who could be chosen as an arbiter, would thus wantonly and unnecessarily expose the depravity of his own conduct, the court must consider these words as spoken in sport, with indiscreet levity, but not as seriously indicative of an opinion that he had made an unjust award.

The same witness, in another deposition, states that he was present at a meeting of the arbiters, and heard Thomas Herbert say that they had the hands of Abraham Faw so fast tied that he could not, for his life, get them loose.

It is impossible to consider these expressions in an arbiter without some disapprobation. But what led to the employment of them does not appear; nor is the court informed of the temper in which they were employed. It is worthy of remark that Thomas Herbert does not appear to have had an opportunity of cross-examining this witness, and that this deposition was *taken before the arbiters were made [176 parties to the cause.

There is some testimony respecting some altercations or jealousies between Faw and some of the arbiters at a corporation election, but they were too trivial to be worthy of notice; and as they occurred about the time of the submission, and before the arbiters proceeded on the business, it is supposed that they would have induced Faw, had he thought them of any importance, to make some effort to prevent an award.

Upon a view of the whole case, the court is of opinion that the plaintiff in the court below has not shown sufficient matter to set aside the judgment at law, and doth therefore direct that the decree of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled.

March 13th. After the decision of the cause,

C. Lee for the defendant in error, cited Kyd on Awards, to show that where the dispute is about land the submission and award must be by deed.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. That is where the title is in question. But here the title was conveyed—the dispute was only as to the price. The question of title was not submitted.

LIVINGSTON, J. Although that point was not made in the argument, yet it was considered by the court.

HUGHES v. MOORE.

Present—All the Judges.

A plaintiff may before verdict, discontinue a count in his declaration, and waive the issues joined thereon.

A promise to pay a sum of money as a compensation to the plaintiff for the injury done him by the misconduct of the defendant in obtaining a patent in his own name for land which he ought to have patented in the name of the plaintiff, and in preventing the plaintiff from obtaining a patent in his own name, and in consideration of the defendant's having procured the patent to be issued to himself, is a contract for the sale of land within the statute of frauds, and must be in writing.

Oyer of a deed set forth in the first count does not make that deed part of the record so as to apply it to other counts, in the declaration.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria.

This was a special action of assumpsit, brought by Moore against Hughes. The declaration, after several amendments, contained four counts.

177*] *1. The first count stated, that whereas, on the 16th of June, 1797, it was agreed between the plaintiff, and one John Darby, by a writing under their hands and seals, now here shown to the court, in substance as follows: "Whereas Cleon Moore had located, in his own name, 9922 acres of land in Kentucky, by a treasury warrant No. 19,100," and the said Cleon Moore, hath sold all his right, title and interest of, and in the same, to John Darby, for the consideration of £300 and warrants that no person or persons claiming under John Tebbs, now deceased, or under him the said Cleon Moore, shall interrupt him, the said John Darby, in his said claim to the said lands, but as to all other claims he is to run the risk, and on their account, will never require, that the said Cleon Moore, or any other person or persons, shall refund the said £300 or any part thereof, but if there should be as much land secured by the said location as will bring two thousand pounds or upwards, the said John Darby is to pay the said Cleon Moore £700 in money, over and above the said three hundred pounds, so that he may receive altogether one thousand pounds; otherwise the said Cleon Moore is only to have the said consideration of three hundred pounds." At the bottom of which writing was a receipt in these words: "Received of John Darby the sum of three hundred pounds, the full consideration for the first-mentioned location, in the foregoing agreement, or of his right, title, and interest of, and in the same—Cleon Moore, and a seal. And whereas, on the same day, a memorandum in writing, and under the seals of the plaintiff and the said Darby, was added and indorsed on the said agreement as part thereof as follows: "Memorandum—If a patent or patents have already issued for the first within mentioned location, the said Moore doth agree to assign the same, to the within named John Darby, his heirs and assigns; or if not issued, that they issue in the name of the said Cleon Moore, and he is to assign them to the said John Darby, his heirs and assigns; and if in the opinion of any two respectable men in the neighborhood of the said lands, to be mutually chosen, shall say the said lands will sell for two thousand pounds, or upwards, the said John Darby doth bind himself, his heirs and assigns, to pay unto the said Cleon Moore, his executors,*ad- [178 ministrators and assigns, the sum of seven hundred pounds, as herein mentioned."

"And whereas, the said defendant, afterwards, on the 5th of October, 1799, well knowing the contract and covenants aforesaid, between the said Cleon Moore and John Darby, and more especially well knowing that a patent or grant had not then been issued for the tract of 9922 acres, located in the name of the said Cleon Moore, and well knowing that the patent for that land ought, and could only be issued unto the said Cleon Moore, and well knowing that the said Cleon Moore was entitled to the sum of £700, lawful money of Virginia, of the value of 2,333 dollars and 33 cents, provided, in the opinion of any two respectable men in the neighborhood of the said lands, to be mutually chosen, they should say the said lands would sell for £2,000 or upwards, lawful money of Virginia; and whereas, the defendant, well knowing that the said lands were really and truly worth, on the day and year last mentioned, a much greater sum than £2,000, and well knowing that it would materially injure the plaintiff in his contract aforesaid, and would materially benefit the said John Darby and himself, the said defendant, he the said defendant, on the said 5th day of October, &c., assigned the plat and certificate of survey, made of the said 9922 acres, and a warrant numbered 19605, in the name of the plaintiff, unto himself, the said defendant, and the said John Darby, without any lawful authority so to do from the said Cleon Moore, by making and subscribing the said assignment of the said survey, in the name of him, the said Cleon Moore, by him, the said James Hughes, as attorney in fact for the said Cleon Moore, which assignment, imported a desire of him the said Cleon, that patents might issue in the names of the said Darby and Hughes, intending thereby to defraud and injure the said Cleon Moore, and to benefit himself and the said John Darby, in respect to the premises aforesaid. And whereas, the said James Hughes, by means of the herein before mentioned assignment, had caused and done to the plaintiff, an injury to the value of a great sum of money, to wit, the value of 4,000 dollars, which he was disposed to compensate; the said James Hughes in consideration thereof, afterwards, viz., on the 17th of March, 1806, came to an agreement with *the said [179 Cleon Moore, whereby the said Cleon Moore, promised that he would quit all claim to the said tract of land, and discharge the said James Hughes of, and concerning all damages for, and by reason of his actings and doings aforesaid, in assigning the survey in manner aforesaid; and he, the said James Hughes, promised to the said Cleon Moore, that he would pay to him the sum of £700 when he should be thereafter required; and the plaintiff avers, that he has been always ready to keep, and has always kept his promise aforesaid, in consideration of which premises the defendant became liable to pay to him the said sum of £700, &c., and being so liable, the defendant in consideration thereof, undertook," &c.

2. The second count stated, that whereas, on the 5th of October, 1799, the plaintiff was owner and proprietor of a certain plat, and certificate of survey, of 9922 acres of land in Mason county, in the state of Kentucky, dated the 28th of November, 1796, of the value of 20,000 dollars; and whereas, the defendant well knowing the premises afterwards, viz., on the 5th of October, 1799, without any lawful authority from the plaintiff, and with a view to benefit himself, and a certain John Darby, and to injure the plaintiff, in this particular, assigned the last mentioned plat and certificate of survey unto him, the said defendant, and the said John Darby, by subscribing the name of the said Cleon Moore by the said James Hughes, as attorney in fact, for the said Cleon Moore; and in consequence of the said unauthorized assignment, a grant of the said tract of land was afterwards made to the defendant, and the said Darby, by the commonwealth of Kentucky, styling them assignees of the plaintiff. And whereas, the defendant, by the assignment aforesaid, had caused and done to the plaintiff an injury and loss to the value of a great sum of money, viz., to the value of 4,000 dollars, which he was willing to repair and compensate; in consideration thereof, the said defendant afterwards, viz., on the 7th of March, 1806, at the county of Alexandria, &c., promised to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £700, lawful money of Virginia, as compensation for the said injury and loss of the said land assigned as aforesaid.

The said plaintiff at the same time agreed to the said terms, and to accept of the said compensa-180 tion in full of *all claims and demands for the said land, and for the injury aforesaid. And the plaintiff avers, that he has always kept his promise aforesaid, and has been at all times ready and willing to do everything on his part to be done; and afterwards, viz., on, &c., at, &c., offered to perform the agreement on his part, and the defendant then and there refused to perform, &c., whereby the defendant became liable, &c., and being so liable, promised to pay, &c.

3. The 3d count stated, that whereas, the plaintiff, by virtue of a certain land warrant issued, &c., on the 26th of September, 1783, duly located by entry on the 7th of December, 1783, and duly executed by actual survey, duly made on the 28th of November, 1796, a plat and certificate whereof had been duly made and delivered according to law, was entitled to have a grant from the commonwealth of Kentucky, by patent to be founded on the said survey, and to be completed and issued to him of 9922 acres of land in the county of Mason, &c., bounded, &c. And whereas, the defendant had, on the 5th of October, 1799, (the plaintiff, being so entitled to have the land patented to him aforesaid, and the defendant well knowing the premises,) for his own gain and advantage, and to the great wrong and damage of the plaintiff, without any lawful authority to that effect from the plaintiff, and without his knowledge or consent, but under color and pretense of being attorney in fact for the plaintiff, wrongfully, injuriously and willfully made and executed in the name of the plaintiff a certain indorsement in writing, upon the back of the said plat and certificate of survey, purporting to be an assignment by the plaintiff, of the said plat and certificate, to one John Darby and the said James Hughes, for value received, and purporting to express a desire of the plaintiff, that patents might issue in their names, and purporting to be subscribed with the name of the plaintiff, by the said James Hughes, his attorney in fact. And whereas, the said James, afterwards, viz., on the 5th of April, 1800, (the plaintiff being entitled to have the said land patented to him as aforesaid,) without any authority to that effect from the plaintiff, and without his knowledge or consent, by means of the said pretended assignment, and under color of the same, for his own gain and advantage, and to the great wrong *and damage of [181 the plaintiff, wrongfully, injuriously and willfully caused and procured the land so located and surveyed for the plaintiff as aforesaid, and bounded as aforesaid, to be granted by the commonwealth of Kentucky, to them the said John Darby and James Hughes, by patent, bearing date, &c., founded on the said warrant and survey, and on the said pretended assignment of the plat and certificate, and signed by James Garrard, the governor, and sealed with the seal of the said commonwealth of Kentucky, and in all respects, finally completed and issued to them the said Darby and Hughes, and entered of record in the land-office of Kentucky, aforesaid. And the plaintiff says, that the said land was patented to the said Darby and Hughes by the procurement and pretenses of the said James as aforesaid, without the plaintiff's having ever in any manner authorized, contracted, or consented that the same should be patented in the name of any other person or persons whatsoever, other than himself. And the plaintiff produceth here in court a copy of the said patent, &c.

And whereas, afterwards, on the 13th of March, 1806, at Alexandria, &c., a conversation was had, and propositions for an accord and satisfaction were moved between the said James and the plaintiff, concerning a compensation for the loss and a liquidation of the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the misconduct and wrong-doing of the said James in the premises, and of the vesting them, the said Darby and Hughes, with the legal title to the said land as aforesaid; and it was then and there agreed by the said James on his part, in consideration of the premises, and of the just claims of the plaintiff for compensation and damages as aforesaid, that the said James should pay to the plaintiff in satisfaction of the same, £700 Virginia currency, equal to 2,333 dollars and one-third of a dollar, currency of the United States, to be paid in four equal quarterly installments, the first in three months, &c., each installment to be secured by a bond of the said James; and the plaintiff agreed to accept the said £700 by installments as aforesaid, in full satisfaction of his just claims as aforesaid, and upon the said installments being secured by the bonds of the said James, as aforesaid, to release and quitclaim to the said James, all the plaint-182*] iff's *claims and demands whatsoever, for compensation, redress, or damages arising from the wrong-doing and misconduct of the said James, in the premises, and from the vesting the said Darby and Hughes with the legal title to the said land as aforesaid. The count then states, that the defendant promised to fulfill the agreement on his part, and the plaintiff on his part. That the plaintiff is, and always was ready and willing to perform his part, if the defendant would perform his. That he afterwards required the defendant to perform his part, and offered to accept, and would have accepted of the defendant the £700 in installments as aforesaid, and secured by bonds as aforesaid, in full satisfaction of all the claims and demands of the plaintiff for compensation, redress and damages as aforesaid, and did then and there offer to perfect and execute, and would have perfected and executed to the said James, a good and sufficient quitclaim and release to him, of all the plaintiff's claims and demands for compensation, redress or damages, arising from the misconduct and wrong-doing of the said James, in the premises, and from the vesting of the said Darby and Hughes, with the legal title to the said land as aforesaid, if he, the said James, would have secured by his bonds duly executed, the said £700, &c. But the defendant refused to perform his part of the agreement, &c.

4. The fourth count stated that whereas, on the 5th of October, 1799, the defendant, without any lawful authority to that effect, but for his own gain and advantage and to the great wrong and damage of the plaintiff, with intent to prevent the land hereinafter mentioned, from being patented to the plaintiff, and to cause and procure the same to be patented to the defendant and one John Darby, wrongfully, injuriously and wilfully made and executed in the name of the plaintiff, a certain other indorsement in writing, upon a certain other plat and certificate of survey duly made for the plaintiff, on the 28th of November, 1796, the said survey having been so made in due execution of a certain other warrant duly issued in favor of the plaintiff, from the land-office of Virginia, on the 26th of September, 1783, &c., and in pursuance of a location and entry, &c., which last-mentioned indorsement purported to be an assignment, &c., from the plaintiff to 183*] the said John *Darby and the defendant, for value received, &c., purporting to be subscribed, &c. And whereas, the defendant had, on the 5th of April, 1800, in further pursuance of his said intent to prevent the land from being patented to the plaintiff, and to cause it to be patented to the said Darby and the defendant, wrongfully and without authority, and under color of being attorney in fact for the plaintiff, caused the land to be patented to the said Darby and the defendant, &c. And the plaintiff produceth here a copy of the patent, warrant, survey, &c., &c. And the plaintiff avers, that he never authorized the defendant to make the said assignment, and that the defendant knew he had no such authority; that it was made without the plaintiffs knowledge or consent; that the plaintiff was, until the issuing of the patent to Darby and the defendant, entitled to have the land patented to himself; by which wrong-doing of the defendant, the plaintiff had suffered great wrong and injury and was entitled to be compensated in damages by the defendant, and to be indemnified for being prevented from having the land patented to him, and for the same being patented to Darby and the defendant. And whereas, afterwards, on the 13th of March, 1806, a conversation was had and propositions for a compromise were moved between the plaintiff and defendant, touching the compensation and indemnification of the plaintiff, and the defendant then and there agreed in consideration of the just claims of the plaintiff to be compensated for the damage and injury arising from the misconduct of the defendant in the premises, and in consideration of the defendant's having procured a patent to be issued to him and Darby for the land, that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff another sum of £700 Virginia currency of the value, &c., which the plaintiff agreed to accept in satisfaction of his just claims to compensation arising from the causes and considerations last aforesaid; and the defendant in consideration of his said agreement, assumed and promised to the plaintiff that he, the defendant, would perform his part of the agreement. And the plaintiff in consideration of that promise agreed to accept the £700 in satisfaction, &c., as aforesaid and upon payment of the same or upon its being secured to be paid in four instalments, &c.; that he, the plaintiff, would quitclaim and release to the defendant, all the plaintiff's claims and demands *and rights whatsoever to compensa- [184
tion for being prevented from having the land patented to him, and for and on account of the same being patented to the said Darby and the defendant. And the plaintiff says that he was and hath ever since been willing and ready to perform, &c., and requested the defendant to perform, &c., and offered to accept, &c., the £700, &c., in full satisfaction, &c., and offered to quitclaim, &c., all the plaintiff's claims for compensation, &c., if the defendant would pay, &c., but he refused, &c.

The defendant, having prayed oyer of the agreement and the memorandum, of which a profert was made in the first count, pleaded non assumpsit to that count, and so in like manner to each of the other counts separately; upon all of which pleas issues were joined.

2d. The defendant (without again praying oyer), for further plea to each of the counts, severally, said, that the promise alleged to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff, or any memorandum thereof, was not in writing, signed by the defendant or any other person by him thereunto lawfully authorized, and this he is ready to verify, &c.

3d. The defendant, also, without again praying oyer, for further plea to each of the counts, severally, said, "that after making the agree"ment and memorandum between the plaintiff
"and the said John Darby, in the declaration
"mentioned, viz., on the 29th of August, 1799,
"Alexander D. Orr and John Graham, two "respectable men residing in the neighborhood
"of the lands, in the said agreement mentioned,

"were mutually chosen by the plaintiff and "the said John Darby, to say and determine "whether the said lands would sell for two "thousand pounds, or upwards, and the said "Alexander D. Orr and John Graham, after- "wards, viz., on the 29th of August, 1799, did "say and determine, that the plaintiff's claim "to a survey of 9922 acres, in the county of "Washington, being the land in the said agree- "ment and memorandum mentioned, would "not sell for £2,000 Virginia money, and this "he is ready to verify," &c.

185*] *4. The defendant, also, without again praying oyer, pleaded separately to each count, "that there was not as much land secured by the said location in the agreement mentioned as would bring £2,000 or upwards, and this he is ready to verify, &c. The plaintiff demurred generally to the second plea to all the counts, and to the 3d and 4th pleas to the 2d, 3d and 4th counts.

To the 3d and 4th pleas to the 1st count, there was a general replication and issue.

The court below adjudged all the demurrers in favor of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then entered a noli prosequi upon the first count of his declaration, and waived all the issues joined thereon. Upon the issues of non assumpsit to the 2d, 3d and 4th counts, there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff.

After the jury had retired to consider of their verdict they returned into court and requested the court to determine whether a verdict for the plaintiff would give to the defendant all the right and interest of the plaintiff and his heirs in the patent of land in the declaration mentioned, and the court instructed them that if the plaintiff should recover a judgment in this case, he would be thereby barred in equity from setting aside the patent issued to the defendant and the said John Darby in the declaration mentioned. To this instruction the defendant excepted, and brought his writ of error.

Swann and C. Simms, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the plaintiff had no right to discontinue as to the first count and waive the issues on that count, without the leave of the court, or, the assent of the defendant.

2. That the statute of frauds was a good bar to every count in the declaration, and

3. That if it was not, the court erred in in-

186*] structing *the jury that a recovery in this suit would bar the plaintiff in equity from setting aside the patent.

1. The plaintiff had no right to discontinue as to the first count, after issue (Cro. Jac., 35, 316). The oyer being once prayed and granted, the agreement and memorandum were spread upon the record, and the defendant had a right to avail himself of it in all his pleas. The defendant had a right to show that the title of the plaintiff to those lands was never worth £2,000, and therefore he was never entitled to anything more than the £300, which Darby had paid him; consequently the obtaining a patent in the name of Darby & Hughes, could be no injury to the plaintiff, and if the plaintiff did promise to pay the £700 it was a promise without consideration. This was the real substantial defense in the cause. In order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must not only prove that the defendant did a wrong action, but that it did an injury to the plaintiff. (1, Bac. Ab., 50; 6, Mod., 46.)

2. As to the plea of the statute of frauds. By the act of assembly of Virginia (P. P. 15), which is like that of Kentucky, it is enacted that no action shall be brought, whereby to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, unless the promise or agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorized.

The contract set forth in each count of the declaration is a contract for the sale of land. It is a contract whereby the plaintiff was to part with all his title to the land; and it is immaterial whether that title was legal or equitable.

The first count states expressly, that the plaintiff "promised to quit all claim to the tract of land," and the defendant promised to pay £700.

The 2d count also states, that the defendant was to pay the £700 as compensation for the injury and loss of the land; and the plaintiff agreed to accept it "in full of all *claims and demands for the said land [187 and for the injury aforesaid."

The 3d count says, that a conversation was had concerning a compensation for the loss, and a liquation of the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the misconduct and wrongdoing of the defendant, and of the vesting them, the said Darby and Hughes, with the legal title to the said land, and it was agreed in consideration of the premises, that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff £700 in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claims as aforesaid, and the plaintiff agreed, upon such payment being made, to quitclaim to the defendant all the plaintiff's claims for compensation, &c., arising from the wrong-doing and misconduct of the defendant in the premises "and from the vesting the said Darby and Hughes "with the legal title to the said land.

The 4th count states that the defendant agreed, in consideration of the just claims of the plaintiff, to be compensated for the damage and injury arising from the misconduct of the defendant in the premises, and in consideration of the defendant's having procured a patent to be issued to him and Darby for the land, that he, the defendant, would pay the plaintiff an other sum of £700, &c.

Thus the quitclaim of the plaintiff's title to the land is the consideration of every promise in the declaration; and if the plaintiff had no title, or if no title was to pass from the plaintiff, by the contract, it was nudum pactum.

3. If this was not a contract for the sale of the plaintiff's title to the land, a judgment for him in this suit could not have barred the plaintiff from setting aside the patent in equity. There seems to have been an inconsistency in the opinions of the court below. If the agreement extinguished the plaintiff's equitable title, then it was an agreement for the sale of land, and ought to have been in writing. If it did not extinguish the plaintiff's equitable title, then it could not bar him from setting aside the patent.

Jones and C. Lee, contra.

This was a case of naked tort. There is no 188] evidence *of any authority from Moore to Hughes to make this transfer, but it was done by the latter with a full knowledge that it was contrary to the plaintiff's intention. It was of itself an injury to the plaintiff for which he was entitled to redress. It was actionable per se.

But suppose that a judgment for the plaintiff in this case should prevent him from setting aside the patent, yet it does not follow that it is a case within the statute of frauds. Contracts executed are not within that statute. If there be a verbal agreement for the sale of land, and the vendor executes his part of the agreement by conveying to the purchaser the legal title; which he accepts, and receives the possession and the title papers, it is not necessary that the vendor should have a promise in writing from the purchaser, in order to compel him to pay for it; a court of chancery would decree him to execute the contract.

The plaintiff's subsequent ratification of the act of the defendant, was equivalent to his previous assent. The contract, then, was executed on the part of Moore. The defendant had all his title, and the possession, and the title papers. No further act was necessary on the part of the plaintiff.

Besides, it does not appear that the contract on the part of the plaintiff, if there was any, for the transfer of his right, was not in writing. If it was necessary that it should have been in writing, it will, after verdict, be presumed to have been so. (1 Chitty on pleadings, 133; 1 Sand., 276 (a) note 2, 4 East., 400.)

As to the Noli Prosequi, the plaintiff has a right to enter it at any time before verdict, and even after verdict, before judgment. (Sayer on damages, 113; 12 Mod., 558.)

The defendant could not by oyer of the agreement stated in the first count, make that agreement applicable to other counts which do not refer to it. The 3d and 4th pleas were only applicable to the first count.

It is immaterial whether the plaintiff actually sustained damage to the value of £700. It is 189] sufficient if he sustained *any damage at all. It is an action for liquidated damages, and it is immaterial what was the real injury which the plaintiff suffered. (7 Vin., 300; Tit. Damages, S.; Moore, 419, Colman's case; 4 Burr., 2228, Lowe v. Peers; 1, Lord Raym, 1164.)

The court below was correct in the opinion, that a judgment in this suit would have barred a suit in equity to set aside the patent. It was only an agreement for the extinguishment of an equitable right which need not be in writing. It transferred nothing to the defendant.[1]

March 7th. All the Judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Much of the seeming intricacy of this cause will disappear, if we extricate the questions made by the pleadings before the court, from others which might greatly embarrass and perplex it.

The declaration contains four counts. The first recites an original contract between Cleon Moore and John Darby, for the sale of certain lands, lying in Kentucky, and proceeds to recount in detail those transactions on which the action was founded. The other counts state, in different terms, the several assumpsits which they allege to have been made.

The defendants crave oyer of the written contract, stated in the first count, and file several pleas to that *count. They then, [190 without repeating the oyer, file similar pleas to the remaining counts. After taking issue on some of the pleas, and demurring to others, the plaintiff below discontinues his first count.

By the counsel for Hughes, this has been considered as error. But the court can perceive no reason for this opinion. After this discontinuance, the parties are in precisely the same situation as if all the issues both of law and fact, which were joined upon that count, had been decided in favor of the defendant below. Such decision could not, in point of law, have affected the rights of the parties under the issues joined on the remaining counts, and consequently the discontinuance upon that count must leave those rights unimpaired. Whether this count remain in the declaration, or be stricken out of it, the right of the plaintiff in the Circuit Court, to recover on the other counts, will be precisely the same. The examination of this right must be conducted on the same principles as if the declaration had never contained the first count.

By the plaintiff in error it is contended, that the oyer, which was prayed of the written contract alleged in the first count, spreads that contract on the record, and makes it a part of all his subsequent pleas. This is certainly true with respect to all his subsequent pleas to that count, but not with respect to his pleas to the other counts. Different counts allege different contracts, and different assumpsits. It is upon this idea alone that a verdict can be rendered for the plaintiff, on one count, and for the defendant on another. Now, the oyer of one contract cannot be the oyer of another contract, and cannot spread upon the record a contract supposed to be totally distinct from that which was read. The discontinuance of the first count produces no change in this respect, in the condition of the parties. Had it remained, it could have had no influence on the other counts, nor could the oyer of the written contract it stated have transferred that contract to the other counts.

1.—It is understood that the opinion of the court below was grounded on the idea that this case was to be governed by the principles relative to implied trusts which are not within the statute of frauds. Darby & Hughes having obtained the legal estate without the assent of the plaintiff, were to be considered as holding it in trust to secure to him the payment of £700 in case the land should turn out to be worth £2,000. This was an implied trust, resulting from the circumstances of the case, and which would cease to exist upon payment of the £700. Upon the plaintiff's receiving payment of that sum, his equitable title would cease. It would not be transferred to the defendant; but would be extinguished. If the £700 mentioned in the declaration were to be considered as the compensation for the injury done in depriving the plaintiff of his legal security for £700 to be paid upon a contingency, it is evident that that injury could not have exceeded £700. And whether it were to be paid as compensation for that injury, or as the sum which would be due upon the happening of the contingency, it would equally destroy the implied trust. And as an implied trust can be raised without writing, so, it was thought, it could be extinguished without writing.

The second count states, that Cleon Moore was owner and proprietor of a plat and certificate of survey for lands lying in Kentucky, for which he was entitled to a patent from the gov-
191*] ernment of that state; and that *James Hughes, without authority, transferred that plat and certificate, in the name of Cleon Moore to John Darby and the said Hughes, by which wrongful act a patent for the said land was issued to the said Darby and Hughes to the great injury of the said Moore. That afterwards the said Hughes promised to pay to the said Moore, "the sum of seven hundred pounds for the said injury, and loss of the said land assigned as aforesaid; the said plaintiff at the same time, agreed to the said terms, and to accept of the said compensation in full of all claims and demands for the said land and for the injury aforesaid."

To this count, the defendant pleaded several pleas, one of which was, that neither the promise nor any memorandum thereof was made in writing. To this plea the plaintiff demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer.

The correctness of this decision depends entirely on the application of the statute of frauds to the contract stated in the declaration.

Cleon Moore is averred to have been the proprietor of a plat and certificate of survey on which Hughes and Darby obtained a patent by using his name without authority. This tortious act did not divest Moore of his equitable title. The land, in equity, was his. Did he part with this title by the contract stated in the declaration? The answer must, in the opinion of the whole court, be in the affirmative. He agreed to accept of the said compensation in full of all claims and demands for the said land, and for the injury aforesaid. This, then, was an agreement to sell his equitable title to the land for the sum of seven hundred pounds. The court can perceive no distinction between the sale of land to which a man has only an equitable title, and a sale of land to which he has a legal title. They are equally within the statute.

It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of this court, that the judgment upon the demurrer to this plea, ought to have been in favor of the defendant below. This plea being a complete bar to the second count, it is unnecessary to consider the other pleas.

192*] *The third count states the title of Cleon Moore, and the injury sustained by him, to the same effect with the second count. It then states a conversation between the parties, "concerning a compensation for the loss, and "a liquidation of the damages sustained by the "said Cleon, by reason of the misconduct and "wrong-doing of the said James in the prem-"ises, and of the vesting them, the said Darby "& Hughes, with the legal title to the said land "as aforesaid; and it was then and there agreed "by the said James, on his part, in considera-"tion of the premises, and of the just claims "of the said Cleon, for compensation and "damages as aforesaid, that the said James "should pay to the said Cleon, in satisfaction "for the same, the sum of £700" &c. "And "the said Cleon then and there agreed, on his "part, to accept of the said seven hundred "pounds in full compensation of his just claims "as aforesaid," and, upon the same being secured, &c., to release and quit claim to the said James, all his, the said Cleon's, claims and demands whatsoever, for compensation, redress or damages arising from the wrong-doing and misconduct of the said James in the premises, and from the vesting the said Darby and Hughes with the legal title to the said land as aforesaid.

To this count also, the statute of frauds was pleaded in bar. The plaintiff below demurred to the plea, and the defendant joined in demurrer.

Upon the true construction of the contract stated in this count, there was some contrariety of opinion among the judges. It is, however, the opinion of the majority that the contract must be understood to import a sale of land, and that the sum of money stipulated to be paid was, in contemplation of the parties, to extinguish the title of the said Cleon Moore.

The conversation was "concerning a com-"pensation for the loss and a liquidation of "the damages sustained by the said Cleon," not only "by reason of the misconduct of the "said Hughes, but also by reason of the vest-"ing them, the said Darby and Hughes, with the "legal title to the said land." "And it was "then agreed, in consideration of the just "claims, of the said Cleon, for compensation "and damages, that the said *James, [193 "should pay the said Cleon, in satisfaction for "the same, the sum of £700" To the majority of the court, it seems that a compensation for the loss of the title to the land must be understood to be a compensation for the land itself, and that the receipt of this money by Cleon Moore, would not only have barred an action for damages, but a suit in equity for the title.

If this opinion be correct, then the contract is substantially for the sale of land, and, to be valid, ought to have been in writing. On this plea also the demurrer ought to have been overruled.

The fourth count states the injury more in detail than is done in either the second or third counts. It states the claim of Cleon Moore to be compensated for the loss sustained by his land being granted without his consent to Hughes and Darby. A conversation was then held, and "propositions for a compromise were made, touching the compensation and indemnification of him, the said Cleon," "and it "was then and there agreed by the said James, "in consideration of the just claims of the said "Cleon, to be compensated for the damage and "injury for the misconduct of the said James "in the premises, and in consideration of the "said James having procured and obtained a "patent to be completed and issued to the said "James, and the said John Darby, as last afore-"said, for the said land," that he, the said James, would well and truly pay the said Cleon one other sum of £700. This the "said Cleon "agreed to accept in satisfaction of his just "claims to compensation arising from the "causes and considerations last aforesaid."

The compensation here offered and accepted, is for the injury sustained by Cleon Moore, in consequence of the grant of his land, by the state of Kentucky, to Hughes and Darby. It seems to the court that this compensation was in lieu of the patent itself, and must have been intended to extinguish his right to that patent.

It is difficult to suppose an intention, in this case, to receive a full compensation for the loss of a title, and yet to retain the right to that title. The majority of the court is of opinion that, under the contract as stated in this count also, the payment of the money agreed to be 194*] *paid would have extinguished the right of Cleon Moore to the land in question, and that this contract likewise is substantially a contract for the sale of land. The demurrer, therefore, to this plea, ought to have been overruled.

It is unnecessary to examine other points which were made in the cause. The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff in error.

Judgment reversed.

BARTON v. PETIT AND BAYARD.

Present—All the Judges.

A plaintiff, who has declared jointly against two defendants, as being in custody, when in fact only one of the defendants was taken on the capias, cannot abate his own action against the party not taken, unless authorized so to do by the return of the process against that party.

If the marshal of Virginia return that the defendant is no inhabitant of the District of Virginia, the suit shall abate as to such defendant.

The plaintiff in Virginia is not bound to declare until all the defendants have appeared, or the suit be abated as to such as have not appeared.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.

The transcript of the record which was sent up, began by stating that "Heretofore, to wit, at rules held in the clerk's office of the said court in the month of December, in the year 1807, Andrew Petit and Andrew Bayard, by Philip N. Nicholas, gent., their attorney, appeared and filed their certain bill against Seth Barton and Thomas Fisher, which bill is in the following words, to wit: United States, fifth circuit, District of Virginia, to wit: Andrew Petit and Andrew Bayard, citizens and inhabitants of the state of Pennsylvania, merchants and partners, trading under the firm of Petit & Bayard, plaintiffs, complain of Seth Barton and Thomas Fisher, citizens and inhabitants of the state of Virginia, late merchants and partners trading under the firm of Barton & Fisher, defendants in custody, of a plea that the said defendants render unto the said plaintiffs the sum of four thousand dollars, also one thousand and four pounds of tobacco at twelve shillings and sixpence the hundred weight, being of the value of twenty dollars and ninety-two cents, which to the said plaintiffs the said defendants owe, &c.; stating a judgment of the general court of Maryland.

The record then states, that the defendant, Seth Barton, having been arrested upon the capias ad respondendum, and being called, but 195*] not appearing, it was ordered *that he appear at the next rules and give special bail, &c., which he did and pleaded payment, upon which the issue was joined, and verdict for the plaintiffs. Whereupon the defendant, Barton, moved in arrest of judgment; because,

1. The declaration states a joint cause of action against this defendant and a certain Thomas Fisher, and therefore a judgment ought not to be rendered against this defendant alone.

2. Because the plaintiff has not in and by his declaration made a profert of the judgment stated in the declaration, under the seal of the General Court of Maryland, where the said judgment is stated to have been rendered.

3. Because the said Thomas Fisher ought, upon a joint judgment against him and this defendant (the said Thomas being stated to be in life and a citizen and inhabitant of the district of Virginia), to be a party to the judgment, if one is rendered against the said defendant; and,

4. Because the verdict is insufficient, uncertain, and wants form.

This motion was overruled, and judgment entered upon the verdict against the defendant, Barton, alone, "for 4,000 dollars, also one "thousand and four pounds of tobacco at twelve "shillings and sixpence the hundred weight, "of the value of twenty dollars and ninety-two "cents, and their costs, &c." Whereupon the defendant brought his writ of error.

P. B. Key, for the plaintiff in error.

1. The suit being joint, upon a joint debt, and the declaration being against both, averring both to be in custody, the judgment against one alone is erroneous.

The writ of capias, not being considered as part of the record, according to the practice in Virginia, does not appear in the transcript. The record states, that Barton was arrested, but says nothing as to Fisher. No reason appears upon the record why he was not a *party to the judgment. The declara- [196 tion avers them both to be in custody, and complains against both. That is an averment of a fact upon record which the plaintiffs cannot contradict.

If it appears on the declaration, or in any of the proceedings on the part of the plaintiff, that another was jointly bound with the defendant, and is still living, judgment against one is error and must be reversed. (1 Sand., 291, (C.) note 4; 5 Bur., 2614.)

It is a rule in good pleading that the count must conform to the writ, and the bar and judgment to the count. (Co. Lit., 203, a.)

If this count conforms to the writ, which in good pleading it ought to do, then both were taken, and the judgment is erroneous.

But if both were not taken upon this joint writ for a joint debt, yet there is error. At common law, if there be process against two on a joint cause of action, and one only be taken, the other must be outlawed before there can be any other proceeding. (Strange, 473, Edwards v. Carter.) But if you could proceed against one, you must, upon the return of the writ, count against one, stating that the other was not taken, according to the truth of the case, and this must appear upon the record to justify a judgment against one. To authorize a judgment against one, upon a joint suit against two, there must be a discontinuance, abatement, or outlawry, or death suggested upon the record. You cannot aver anything out of the record to support the judgment. Everything necessary to justify the judgment must be affirmatively shown in the record by the plaintiff.

2. The court below erred in rendering judgment for more money than was authorized by the Maryland judgment, which was filed and declared upon as a judgment of record.

This is not an action of debt upon a simple contract, but technically upon a judgment on record.

The act of Congress of May, 1790, declares the mode of authenticating a judgment; and 197] when so authenticated, *it is to have the same faith and credit in every court within the United States as in the courts of that state in which it was rendered.

It may be declared upon in the same manner as if it were a judgment of a court of the state in which the suit upon it is brought. (2 Dall., 303, Armstrong v. Carson.)

Whenever a judgment or matter of record is the gist of the action, it must be certainly and truly alleged. Any variance is fatal.

The Maryland judgment is for 4,000 dollars, and 1,004 lbs. of tobacco at 12 shillings and 6 pence per hundred. This 12 shillings and 6 pence must be Maryland currency, as the judgment was rendered in Maryland, where the dollar is 7 shillings and 6 pence. The value of the tobacco was only 16 dollars and 73 cents, whereas the judgment of the court below fixes its value at 20 dollars and 92 cents, which was at the rate of 12 shillings and 6 pence, Virginia currency, per hundred.

The court was bound to take notice of the Maryland currency. It was matter of law; and if they have mistaken it, it is error.

But if it was matter of fact, it ought to have been found by the jury; and their not having found it is error. (Cro. Eliz., 536, Bagshaw v. Playn.)

If it is an error, it is not amendable. (1 Cranch, 283, Thompson v. Jameson.) And in such a case there can be no remittitur. (2 Salk., 658, Incledon v. Crips.)

E. I. Lee and Swann, contra.

1. There is no evidence in the record that will authorize the court to take notice of the Maryland currency. Upon the plea of payment it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to produce the record of the judgment in Maryland. Besides, it was a matter for the jury to ascertain, and they have found it. Their verdict was "that the defendant hath not paid the debt in "the declaration mentioned."

198*] *The debt in the declaration mentioned was "the sum of four thousand dollars, "also one thousand and four pounds of tobacco "at twelve shillings and sixpence the hundred "weight, 'being of the value of twenty dollars "and ninety-two cents.'" This was the debt which the defendant pleaded that he had paid, and which the jury found that he had not paid. (2 Wash., 149, Strode v. Head.)

2. The averment in the declaration that the defendants are in custody is only matter of form, and is always made in cases where the defendants are not in custody, and cannot be holden to bail. In this very case (it being debt on a judgment), according to the decisions in Virginia, the defendant cannot be holden to bail. It is an immaterial averment, and if it appear by the record that one of the defendants never was taken, a judgment against the other is not erroneous. (1 Wash., 9, Brown v. Belches.)

The omission of the clerk, at the rules, to enter the suit abated as to Fisher, is not error.

By the statute of Virginia respecting the district courts of that state it is enacted "that where the sheriff or other officer shall return on any writ of capias to answer in any civil action, that the defendant is not found within his bailiwick, the plaintiff may either sue out an alias or a plurias capias, until the defendant shall be arrested, or a testatum capias where he shall be removed into another county; or may at his election sue out an attachment against the estate of the defendant to force an appearance." (Rev. Code, p. 86, § 33.) And "on the return of the pluries, that the defendant is not found, the court, instead of the process of outlawry formerly used, may order a proclamation to issue, warning the defendant to appear at a certain day therein named, or that judgment will be rendered against him, which proclamation shall be published," &c., "and if the defendant fails to appear pursuant to such proclamation, the same proceedings shall be had, and the same judgment given, as in other cases of default." (Rev. Code, p. 87, § 41.)

By the statute of Virginia respecting the county courts, "for the better ascertaining what process may *be sued out, where the [199 sheriff or other officer returns that the defendant is not to be found in his bailiwick, it is enacted that where any sheriff or other officer shall make such return the plaintiff or plaintiffs in any civil action, shall and may sue an attachment, &c., to force an appearance, or an alias or pluries capias, at the election of the plaintiff or plaintiffs;" "and where any defendant shall be a known inhabitant of another county, and not of the county of that sheriff to whom the process shall be directed, such sheriff shall return the truth of the case, but not that the person is not found in his county, and thereupon such process issued from any county court clerk's office, as to such defendant, shall abate and be dismissed." (Rev. Code, 95, § 32.)

By the former act (Rev. Code, p. 86, § 35), rules are to be holden monthly at the clerk's office, and "the plaintiff shall file his declara-"tion in the clerk's office at the succeed-"ing rule day after the defendant shall have "entered his appearance, or the defendant may "then enter a rule for the plaintiff to declare, "which, if he fails or neglects to do, at the suc-"ceeding rule day, he shall be non-suited" and pay costs, &c.

The practice, under these statutes in Virginia, is to enter the suit abated against a defendant who is returned by the sheriff "no inhabitant of his county," and to proceed against the other; and the declaration is always joint, and in the same form as if both had been taken.

After one defendant has appeared, the plaintiff is bound by law to declare against him or to suffer a non-suit.

So, if one suffers judgment to be rendered against him by default, you proceed against the other and file your declaration against both. So one defendant in custody may confess judgment, and you proceed against the other. In the case of Brown v. Belches, cited from Washington's Reports, the declaration was against both, and stated them both to be in custody; and such has been the uniform practice for more than 20 years.

Afterwards, E. I. Lee obtained a certiorari

200*] upon a *suggestion that the transcript of the record did not contain the writ of capias ad respondendum against Barton and Fisher and the marshal's return thereupon.

Upon the return of the certiorari, the clerk sent up a copy of the capias, which was in the usual form, against both defendants, and of the marshal's return, which was "executed on Seth Barton only, and bailed by Thomas R. Rootes."

The clerk also certified "that the said capias "not having been executed upon the said "Thomas Fisher, an alias capias was awarded "against him, which has not been returned; "and the attorney for the plaintiffs having in- "formation that that defendant was no inhabit- "ant of the Virginia district, at rules held at "the clerk's office in the month of June, in the "year 1809, caused the said suit to be abated "as to the said Thomas Fisher."

This was stated by E. I. Lee to be conformable to the practice in Virginia.

March 14th. All the Judges being present, WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was an action of debt brought in the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia by Petit and Bayard against Seth Barton and Thomas Fisher, upon a judgment rendered in the General Court of Maryland. The declaration is against the said Barton and Fisher, late merchants and partners, trading under the firm of Barton & Fisher, citizens and inhabitants of the state of Virginia, both of whom are alleged to be in the custody of the marshal. The record states that Barton, who had been arrested upon the capias, gave bail and put in the plea of payment, on which an issue was joined, and a verdict was rendered against him. He afterwards moved in arrest of judgment, and amongst other reasons, assigned the following, viz.: That the declaration states a joint cause of action against the said Barton and one Thomas Fisher, and that, therefore, a judgment ought not to be rendered against him alone. The 201] *motion in arrest of judgment having been argued and overruled, judgment was rendered against Barton, and the record has been removed into this court by writ of error.

The general rule certainly is, that if two or more persons are sued in a joint action, the plaintiff cannot proceed to obtain a judgment against one alone, but must wait until the others have been served with process, or until the other defendants have been proceeded against as far as the law authorizes for the purpose of forcing an appearance. In England the plaintiff must proceed to outlaw the defendants who have not been served, before he can proceed against those who appear. In Virginia, where this suit was brought, the plaintiff might have taken out an alias and a pluries capias or testatum capias, or, at his election, an attachment against the estate of such defendant; or, upon the return of a pluries not found, the court may order a proclamation to issue, warning the defendant to appear on a certain day, and, if he fail to do so, judgment by default may be entered against him.

But, whatever may be the mode provided by law for forcing an appearance, the plaintiff cannot proceed to obtain a judgment against one defendant in a joint action against two, until he has proceeded against the other as far as the law will authorize, unless the law dispenses with the necessity of proceeding against the other defendant beyond a certain point to force an appearance. Thus, in Pennsylvania, (as is known to one of the judges of this court) if the sheriff return non est as to one defendant, the plaintiff may procced against the other on whom the writ was served, stating in his declaration, the return of the writ as to his companion.

To remove the objection which arises in this case, the plaintiff obtained a certiorari to the Circuit Court of Virginia on a suggestion of diminution, and it now appears, by the certificate of the clerk of that court, that an alias capias issued against Thomas Fisher which was not returned, but the plaintiff's attorney caused the suit to be abated as to the said Fisher, upon information which he had received that the said Fisher was no inhabitant of the District of Virginia. Had the *mar-[202 shal returned the writ and stated this fact, the law would have abated it as to Fisher; in which case the objection to the subsequent proceedings against Barton would have been removed. But since the plaintiff could not have supported his action originally against one defendant on a joint cause of action where it appeared by his own showing, or by a plea in abatement, that there was another person who was jointly bound, and might be sued, he ought not to be permitted, after stating a joint cause of action, to abate or discontinue his action against one, unless authorized to do so by the return of the process against that defendant. If he does so, it furnishes a good ground for arresting the judgment.

It is contended, in support of this judgment, that, as, by the law of Virginia, the plaintiff must file his declaration at the next succeeding rule day after the defendant shall have entered his appearance, or that the defendant may rule him to do so, which if he fails to do, he shall be non-suit, the plaintiff not only may, but is bound to proceed against one defendant alone, after he has appeared. But the court understands this law as applying to a single defendant, or, if there be more, to the appearance of all the defendants.

Judgment reversed.

WILSON v. KOONTZ.

Present—All the Judges.

The defendant to an attachment in chancery in Virginia may plead the statute of limitations without answer.

A defendant who removes from one county to another in Virginia, is not thereby prevented from pleading the act of limitations, unless the plaintiff has been, by such removal, actually defeated or obstructed in bringing or maintaining his action.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, which dismissed the complainant's bill in equity.

Wilson filed a bill in equity, in the nature of an attachment in chancery, against Koontz, surviving partner of Koontz & Ober, as principal debtor, and Thomas Irvine and Joseph 203] Mandeville as garnishees. It *stated that Koontz, a resident of Virginia, as surviving partner of the firm of Koontz & Ober, was indebted to the plaintiff, by note, in the sum of 1,261 dollars, and had in the hands of Thomas Irvine and Joseph Mandeville goods and effects which were liable to be attached for the payment of the debt; and that unless he could make them liable by the intervention of the court below, he would be without any means of recovering his debt. In tender consideration whereof, and for as much as he had no remedy at law, and could only subject the effects and money in the hands of Irvine and Mandeville to the payment of his debt by means of a court of equity, he prays a discovery, and a decree that Koontz may pay the debt, and that Irvine and Mandeville may be restrained from paying away the effects in their hands, and that they may be applied to the payment of the debt, and for general relief.

Koontz having entered his appearance, gave security to perform the decree of the court if it should be against him, thereby discharging the attached effects, and pleaded the statute of limitations in bar of the suit; to which the complainant replied, that on the 4th of August, 1794, a suit was brought by the orders of the complainant, in the name of the president, directors and company of the bank of Alexandria as nominal plaintiffs in the District Court in the town of Winchester, in the state of Virginia, upon the note in the bill mentioned, against Koontz & Ober; and upon the writ the sheriff returned that Koontz was not found, and that Ober was no inhabitant of that county. That in September, 1794, it was agreed that Koontz should place in the hands of the complainant sundry bonds towards the discharge of the note, and that he would pay the balance in 12 or 18 months, in consequence of which the suit was dismissed; in pursuance of which arrangement part of the money was paid, and the residue is still due with interest. That afterwards, in the year 1794, Koontz removed into some other part of the State of Virginia, unknown to the complainant. That in 1803, the complainant having learned the residence of the defendant in Rockingham county, 60 or 70 miles from his former residence, and more remote from the complainant, ordered a suit against him, which was brought, but not prosecuted, because the defendant required 204]*security for costs from the complainant, who did not reside in Virginia.

To this replication there was a general rejoinder and issue, and a general dedimus to take depositions; upon the return of which the cause came to hearing upon the pleadings and evidence. Whereupon the court below decreed that the bill should be dismissed with costs; from which decree the complainant appealed to this court.

E. I Lee, for the appellant.

It was not necessary for the complainant to reply matter to bring himself within an exception to the statute of limitations; because the circumstances which take the case out of the statute are stated in the bill.

Before the defendant can be permitted to plead the statute, he must, by answer, either deny the debt or aver it to be paid. (Gilb. chancery practice, 61.)

The statute of limitations is not properly a plea in equity. The statute does not make it an absolute bar in equity. It is only under the equity (i. e. the reason) of the statute that courts of equity allow it to be pleaded. If it appear clearly that the debt has not been paid, the statute is no bar in equity. The questions put by Koontz upon the examination of the witnesses show that the debt was not paid. Less evidence than this has been held to take a case out of the statute. It would have been no bar for Ober, who never resided in Virginia; and if not a good bar for Ober, it was not for Koontz. The plea does not state that Ober, the other partner, did not promise within 5 years.

Taylor, contra.

There is nothing in the replication or the evidence to take the case of the statute. The only question, then, is whether the statute is a good plea in a suit in chancery. This is not properly a case of equity-jurisdiction. It is simply an action at law upon a promissory note. Nothing gave jurisdiction to the court as a court of equity, but the circumstance that the defendant was a resident of Virginia and had effects in the *hands of residents in this [205 district. The defendant having appeared and given security, so as to discharge the attached effects, nothing remains to be decided but the sheer law of the case; and when a court of equity gets possession of a case which is a mere case at law, if it is allowed to proceed at all, it must decide the case as a court of law would decide it.

If a bill charge fraud or trust, it is admitted that the defendant must answer to the fraud or trust before he can plead the statute of limitations. But this bill charges no fraud nor trust, nor seeks any discovery from the defendant. He is therefore not bound to answer, but may rely entirely on his plea. (3 P. Will., 144, The South Sea Comp. v. Wymondsell; 2 Com. Dig., 261; 2 Atk., 51.) If the complainant thinks the plea bad he may demur, or except. But here is neither exception nor demurrer. (Laws of Virg. Rev. Code, 73, § 40.)

March 10th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect:

This is a suit in chancery, and the defendant pleads the act of limitations. The plaintiff by his replication attempts to bring the case within the exception contained in the 14th section of that act; but it seems essential, under that section, that the complainant should have been actually defeated or obstructed in bringing his action by the removal of the defendant. There is no evidence of his intention of bringing his action sooner than he did, or that he was delayed by the defendant's removal from the county. The court is therefore of opinion that the circumstance of removal is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

It is objected that the plea of the statute of limitations is not good unless the defendant answer also and deny the debt, or aver it to be paid. But if this be a valid objection, it ought to have been taken at the time of offering the plea, and before the issue was joined. It is now too late.

If it be a good objection in cases within the 206] general *jurisdiction of a court of equity, yet it is not valid in a case like the present, which is really a case at law as between the present parties.

The Court is of opinion that the plea is a good bar, and that the decree should be affirmed.

RIDDLE v. MOSS.

Present—All the Judges.

The principal obligor in a bond is not a competent witness for the surety, in an action upon the bond; the principal being liable to the surety for costs in case the judgment should be against him.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This was an action of debt on a joint bond given by John Welch as principal obligor and the defendant Moss as his surety. The suit abated as to Welch by the return of the marshal, that he was no inhabitant of the district. The defendant, Moss, pleaded specially certain facts in avoidance of the bond as to him alone; upon which issue was joined; and upon the trial the defendant, Moss, offered, as a witness, the said John Welch the principal obligor who was permitted by the court below to testify for the defendant, and upon his cross-examination confessed that he had made over to Moss all his property as security to indemnify him against the event of this suit.

The plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, and the verdict and judgment being against him, brought his writ of error to this court.

E. I. Lee and Jones, for the plaintiff in error.

Welch was clearly an interested witness. By relieving Moss from this suit, he would relieve his property from the lien which Moss held upon it. If the plaintiff recovered against Moss, the latter could immediately recover judgment against Welch for the whole debt, together with the costs of this suit. (Laws of Virg. Rev. Code., 292; 5 T. R., 578, Buckland v. Tankard; Bull. N. P., 283; 5 Bur., 2727; 3 Atk., 402; Day., 81.)

207*] *Welch is also interested to the amount of his legal fees for attendance as a witness. It appears upon the record that he was regularly summoned and is by law entitled to demand of Moss one dollar and a quarter per diem. If the plaintiff should be defeated he will retain this to his own use, but if the plaintiff should recover judgment he will have to refund it to Moss.

C. Lee, contra.

The defense set up by Moss did not affect Welch's liability upon the bond. He was bound at all events. He was not a party to this suit. Neither the verdict nor judgment could affect him. He would be obliged to pay either Riddle or Moss and it was immaterial to him which of them should recover against him. If the plaintiff should be defeated by Moss, he would sue Welch and recover judgment with costs—so that it was immaterial to him whether he paid costs to one or the other. He therefore stood indifferent as to interest. In chancery one defendant is a good witness for another, and it would be as good a rule at law.

Courts of law have, of late, inclined to refer all cases of doubtful interest to the credibility, rather than to the competency of the witness. The interest should be immediate and direct, in order to exclude the witness. (3 Esp. Rep., 60.)

The statute of Virginia which gives to a surety a remedy against his principal does not alter the case. He had an equal remedy before.

In the case of Pawling v. The United States, (4 Cranch, 219,) the point was made by a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the District Court of Kentucky to admit a co-obligor as a witness, but was not decided, the judgment having been reserved upon other grounds.

March 10th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court to the following effect.

The court is of opinion that Welch, the co-obligor, was interested, and was therefore an incompetent witness. *It was a con- [208 sideration of some importance that he had given Moss a deed of trust of his effects to indemnify him against this suit; but the principal circumstance was, that Welch's liability would be increased, to the extent of the costs of this suit, if the judgment should be against Moss.[1]

Judgment reversed.

SHEEHY v. MANDEVILLE.

Present—All the Judges.

A note payable at 60 days cannot be given in evidence to support a count upon a note, which count does not state when the note was payable. The variance is fatal.

Upon executing a writ of inquiry in Virginia in an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note, it is necessary to produce a note corresponding with that stated in the declaration; but it is not necessary to prove the note.

The plaintiff cannot give evidence that the variance was the effect of mistake or inadvertence of the attorney, and that the note produced was that which was intended to be described in the declaration.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

This cause having been sent back to the Circuit Court, by the mandate of this court, at February term 1810,[2] commanding that court to render judgment for the plaintiff on his first count and to award a writ of inquiry of damages, upon executing that writ of inquiry the plaintiff produced the following note.

"Alexandria, 17th July, 1804.

"Sixty days after date, I promise to pay to "Mr. James Sheehy, or order, six hundred and

1.—The same point was also decided in the case of the Governor of Virginia v. Evans and others, at this term; which was the case of a bond with collateral condition. It was a joint action; and all the defendants were taken, but pleaded separately.

2.—Ante, vol. 6, p. 253.

"four dollars and ninety-one cents, for value "received, negotiable in the Bank of Alexan- "dria. R. B. JAMESON."

The note was thus described in the declaration, "And whereas the said defendants under "the name, firm and style aforesaid, did on the "said 17th of July, 1804, make their certain "note in writing called a promissory note, sub- 209*] "scribed *by them under the name, "style, title and firm of Robert B. Jameson, "bearing date the same day and year, and then "and there delivered the said note to the plaint- "iff, and by the said note, did, under their firm "aforesaid, promise to pay to the said plaintiff, "or to his order, six hundred and four dollars "and ninety-one cents for value received, nego- "tiable at the bank of Alexandria, by reason "whereof and by virtue of the law in such "cases made and provided, the said defendants "became liable to pay to the said plaintiff the "said sum contained in the said note according "to the tenor and effect of said note," and being so liable, &c.

Which note the court below refused to suffer the plaintiff to read in evidence to the jury, because it varied from that set forth in the declaration. To this refusal the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then contended before the jury that the existence, the execution, the amount, and the validity of the note set out in the declaration, were determined by the judgment of the court upon the demurrer, and claimed damages to the full amount of that note without producing it. But the court, upon the motion of the defendant, instructed the jury that it was necessary for the plaintiff to produce the note, or sufficiently account for its non-production, otherwise the jury may and ought to presume that the note has been paid, or has been passed away by the plaintiff to a third person for value received, and in such case ought to assess only nominal damages. To this instruction the plaintiff also excepted.

The plaintiff, then, in order to rebut the presumption that the note mentioned in the declaration had been paid or passed away to a third person for a valuable consideration, produced and offered to show to the court and jury the record and judgment on the defendant's first and second pleas, which had been adjudged bad upon demurrer, and also the same note in the said pleas mentioned to have been the foundation of the suit and judgment set forth in the said pleas (which was a separate suit and judgment against R. B. Jameson upon the same note as the sole note of Jameson, and which judgment Mandeville had pleaded in bar to the present action, averring the note to be the same, 210*] but which *plea was by this court adjudged bad on demurrer), and also the fieri facias issued against Jameson upon that judgment with the return of nulla bona; and also offered to prove by a competent witness that the promissory note produced to the jury, and in the said record of the suit against Jameson mentioned, is the same promissory note upon which the present declaration was founded, and the same which was intended to have been therein set out and described, and that the omission to state in the declaration the time in which the said note was originally made payable, arose from a mere oversight of the attorney who drew the declaration, and that there was no other note ever intended to have been described in that declaration or answering the description therein contained, but the court rejected the whole of the said evidence as incompetent; to which the plaintiff also excepted.

The jury assessed the plaintiff's damages, and judgment was rendered accordingly at one cent only; whereupon he brought his writ of error.

E. I. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

It being the prime object of courts to do justice, the court will decide in favor of the plaintiff if the justice of the case be with him, unless there be some technical rule so strong as to leave the court no ground in his favor.

1. The first question is, whether there be any variance between the note declared upon and that produced before the jury on the execution of the writ of inquiry.

What is, in law, a variance? The rule is that the allegata and probata must correspond in all material points.

The note produced was payable "sixty days after date." The declaration does not state when it was payable. There is therefore no repugnance, no inconsistency, between them. To have made it a variance, the declaration should have expressly averred that the note was payable on demand. The omission to state a fact, without a direct averment of a different fact, is not a variance. (1 Bos. and Pul., 225.)

*The declaration leaves it uncertain [211 when the note was payable; but the note itself renders that certain which had been left uncertain on the face of the declaration.

An averment is a positive statement; and is used in opposition to argument, or inference. (Cowp., 683, 684.)

From the statement in the declaration, it is only matter of inference that the note was payable on demand. But there is no variance between the assumpsit laid and the note offered. The statement of the note in the declaration is only inducement; but in the assumpsit it does not say when the money was to be paid.

In setting forth the matter of inducement, exact certainty is not required. (5 Com. Dig., 35, C. 30.)

The declaration states what, in law, is considered as a parol agreement—and the action is a general and not a special indebitatus assumpsit. Under the count of general indebitatus assumpsit, any evidence substantially corresponding with the cause of action set forth in the declaration may be given in evidence.

There is no variance whenever the time or date is uncertainly set forth or omitted. It may be supplied by pleading, or by finding, and therefore, in order to render, by finding, that certain which is omitted, or which does not correspond with the statement in the narration, evidence must be heard. (Cromwell v. Grunsden, 1 Lord Ray, 335.) If a patent be pleaded without a date, and the one produced has a date it is not a variance. (5 Com. Dig., 395.) Everything is form, without which the right of action appears to the court. (Hob., 233–5; Com. Dig., 139.) This suit was brought after the note became due, therefore the time of payment was then not material to the plaintiff's right of action. The promise, for a valuable consideration, gives the right of action. The time of payment was not material and could not have been put in issue. (5 Com. Dig., 27.)

The omission is eured by the statute of jeofails. (Virg. Laws, 112, seet. 26.)

If, after verdiet, the plaintiff eould not be re-
212*] quired to *show sueh a note as is set forth in the deelaration—so upon a judgment by confession, nil dicit, or non sum informatus—he is not bound to show sueh a note.

2. If there be a variance, it is not a material one. (1 Wash., 72, Evans v. Smith.) In the bond, in that ease, the obligor was stated to be "of the eounty of Essex," which part of the description was omitted in the deelaration, and it was held to be an immaterial varianee.

It is only neeessary to prove substantially the cause of aetion declared upon. (1 Wash., 199, M' Williams v. Willis.) In that case the agreement was made by Willis, "as treasurer of the joekey club." The declaration omitted this descriptiou, and it was holden no varianee. The reason was that he was equally liable whether he contraeted as treasurer or not. So in this ease the defendant was equally liable whether the note was payable in sixty days or ou demand. the sixty days having expired before the suit was brought.

In the ease of Peter v. Coeke (1 Wash., 257), the suit was upon a bond given to U. P., "of the county of Surrey, on aeeount of Messrs. G. &. P., merehants in Glasgow." The deelaration stated the bond to be given to W. P., without stating on whose aeeouut; yet it was holden no varianee.

In the ease of Wroe v. Washington and others (1 Wash., 357), the deelaration stated an agreement by whieh the appellant was to rent and furnish a house in Leedstown, and entertain one of the appellees, two of their storekeepers and a servant with meat and drink for one year, for whieh the appellees agreed to pay him for the three first, £25 each, and for the last, £8.

The evidenee offered did not show any agreement respecting the renting of a house at Leedstown; but it showed an agreement to pay £83 in gross. Held no varianee.

The date of a deed is not of its substance. (2 Co., 5 [a], Goddard's ease.) Upon the same prineiple the time of payment is not of the substanee of a contract.

A variance between the date of the bond de-
213*] clared *upon, and that cited in the award, is not fatal, if they agree in every other partieular. (3 Call., Ross v. Overton; 3 Hen. and Mun., 237, Lyons v. Gregory.)

In the case of Baptiste v. Cobbold (1 Bos. and Pul., 7). the eontraet stated in the deelaration was for £52 10*s*. 0*d*. for rum money; the evidence was a note by whieh the defendant agreed to allow the plaintiff the above sum; together with a pint of rum per day; and held no varianee.

The grounds upon which the law requires that the probata should agree with the allegata, are, 1. To apprize the defendant of the nature of the eharge; and, 2. To enable him, by a referenee to the record itself, to plead the judgment in bar of another action for the same cause. The deelaration in this case did apprize the defendant of the nature of the charge; for he appeared and pleaded to the aetion, and by his plea identified the note. The second object is obtained by the reeord, by which it appears that the note offered in evidence is that which was deelared upon. If this note had been received in evidence, it would have been filed and formed a part of the proeeedings whieh the clerk is bound, by the statute of Virginia, to retain.

If the reason of the rule requiring the allegata and probata to eorrespond, is attained in this ease, and if there was no danger of a second suit being maintained upon the same cause of action agaiust the defendant, the varianee cannot be material.

3. The plaintiff was not bound to produce, upon the exeeution of the writ of inquiry, the note or the evidenee of the debt.

Where there is judgment by default in an aetion upon the case on a promissory note, the eourt will (without a jury) direct the clerk to aseertain the damages. (1 H. Bl., 252, 529, 541.) These cases were deeided upon the ground that the amount elaimed in the declaration is admitted in the same manner as if the aetion was debt; beeause a sum eertain is demanded, and it is not like the case where the cause of action sounds in damages, and not in eontract, ascertaining on its face the amount elaimed.

*Upon executing a writ of inquiry, [214 the plaintiff is not bound to prove his eause of action, beeause it is admitted as laid. (Cro. Jac., 220.)

If the eause of aetion is admitted, and the note not required to be proved, and it is to be produced for no other purpose than to see whether there is any eredit on it, and there should be a difference in the date; yet it is not a varianee, beeause a varianee can exist only where proof is to be made.

The ease of Green v. Hearne (3 T. R., 301) shows, that upon a writ of inquiry it is not necessary to prove the bill of exehange; that a varianee between that deelared upon and that produeed is not material, and that evidence dehors the bill is admissible to prove that the bill produeed is that whieh was deelared upon. (Bayley on Bills, appendix No. 7, p. 74, Mills v. Lyne; Kyd on Bills, 155; 2 W. Bl., 748; 2 Stra., 1149; Bayley, 66, 67, Bevis v. Lindsell.) All these cases show that after judgment by default a promissory note set out in a declaration need not be produced. Sayer on Damages, 112, 113, says, where there is judgment upon demurrer the justices may award damages; the amount of the damages laid in the declaration is admitted.

4. The eourt erred in directing the jury that they were bound to presume from the non-produetion of the note deelared upon, that it was paid or had been assigned away by the plaintiff to a third person for a valuable eonsideration, unless the non-produetion was sufficiently aecounted for.

The non-production of the note was only a circumstanee to be left to the jury to draw such inference from as they should thiuk proper, under the whole of the eircumstanees attending the case. The eourt undertook to decide on the weight and effeet of this negative kiud of evidenee. Presumptive evidenee is always left to the jury. (Hull v. Horner, Cowp., 109).

5. The court ought to have admitted the evidence offered to show that this was the note intended by the deseription in the declaration—especially the defendant's own pleas, in which

215*] he affirms the note described *in the declaration to be the same note upon which judgment was obtained against Jameson, which is the same note which was produced to the jury in the execution of this writ of inquiry.

In the former opinion, the court admitted the principle that it was competent for the plaintiff to account for the non-production of such a note as is described in the declaration; and yet, when the plaintiff offers evidence to account for its non-production, the court reject it.

A finding by a special verdict, or an admission in former pleadings is good evidence, unless the contrary appears. (Lee v. Booth, 1 Keble, 720, pl. 50).

Swann; contra.

No time of payment being mentioned in the note, it is to be taken as a note payable on demand. The note produced was payable at 60 days. Such a variance is fatal upon an issue. (3 Selwyn's Nisi Prius, 999.)

The principle question is, whether it be necessary to produce the note on the execution of a writ of inquiry.

The practice in Virginia is to produce the note. Such also is the practice in England. (Esp. N. P., 180; Tit. Assumpsit, Str., 1149.)

The cases from Bayley, &c., only show that the note need not be proved; this we admit; but still we contend it ought to be produced. The judgment upon the demurrer does not admit the amount of the damages.

Jones, in reply.

1. There was no material variance. The description of the note in the declaration, as far as it goes, is correct. The time and mode of payment are no part of the substance of the contract necessary to be set forth. It is only necessary to set forth the legal effect of the note, and as the 60 days had expired before the suit was brought, it was in effect a note payable on demand. (Doug., 670, Bristow v. Wright.)

216*] *2. Upon such special counts, for a precise sum, it is not necessary to produce proof upon the writ of inquiry. The judgment by default confesses the whole sum as well as the cause of action. In debt, and indebitatus assumpsit, you could not recover less than the precise sum stated in the declaration; and therefore a judgment by default confessed the whole. And although the courts have relaxed as to those counts, and you may now recover less, yet when the declaration is for a precise sum, a judgment by default carries the whole.

The rule to produce the note is only a matter of discretion—a mere rule of practice intended to prevent injustice.

March 14th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was instituted on a promissory note, executed by the defendant, and made payable to the plaintiff. After describing the note accurately, with the exception of the time when it became payable, which is altogether omitted, the declaration proceeds, in the usual form, to state, that the defendant being so liable, assumed to pay the sum mentioned in the note when he should be thereunto required, &c.

To this count a special plea was filed which, on demurrer, was held insufficient. Judgment, on the demurrer, being rendered for the plaintiff, a writ of inquiry was awarded.

On executing this writ the plaintiff produced a note payable sixty days after date, and offered to prove that it was the note on which the suit was instituted, and that the omission to state the day of payment in the declaration was the mistake of counsel.

The court refused to permit the note to go to the jury; and also instructed them that unless a note conforming to the declaration should be adduced, or its absence accounted for, they must presume it to have been passed away or paid. The jury under these instructions *found one cent damages, for which [217 judgment was rendered. To this judgment the plaintiff has sued out a writ of error.

The errors assigned are, 1st. That the variance was not fatal; 2d. That on a writ of inquiry the production of the note was unnecessary.

Courts, being established for the purpose of administering real justice to individuals, will feel much reluctance at the necessity of deciding a cause on a slip in pleading, or on the inadvertence of counsel. They can permit a cause to go off on such points only when some rule of law, the observance of which is deemed essential to the general administration of justice, peremptorily requires it.

One of these rules is, that in all actions on special agreements or written contracts, the contract given in evidence must correspond with that stated in the declaration. The reason of this rule is too familiar to every lawyer to require that it should be repeated.

It is not necessary to recite the contract in hæc verba, but if it be recited the recital must be strictly accurate. If the instrument be declared on according to its legal effect, that effect must be truly stated. If there be a failure in the one respect, or the other, an exception, for the variance, may be taken, and the plaintiff cannot give the instrument in evidence.

The plea of non assumpsit denies the contract; and an instrument, not conforming to the declaration either in words where it is recited, or according to its legal effect where the legal effect is stated, although proved to be the act of the defendant, is not the same act, and therefore does not maintain the issue on his part.

In this case, the legal effect of the promissory note is stated; and that effect on a note, having no day of payment, would be that it was payable immediately. This declaration goes on that idea, and avers a promise to pay when required. A note payable sixty days after date is a note different from one payable immediately, *and would not support [218 the issue had non assumpsit been pleaded and issue joined on this plea.

Now, what difference is produced by the default of the defendant? He confesses the note stated in the declaration, but he confesses no other note. The necessity, then, of showing a note conforming to the declaration, is precisely as strong on executing a writ of inquiry as on trying the issue. No reason is perceived why a variance which would be fatal in the one case would not be equally fatal in the other.

The cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel have been considered, but they do not come up to this. They are not cases where the legal effect of the written instrument, offered on executing the writ of inquiry, has differed from that of the instrument stated in the declaration.

The court is also of opinion that the production of the note, on executing the writ of inquiry, was necessary. The default dispenses with the proof of the note, but not with its production. In England damages have in some circumstances been assessed without a jury, but it is not stated that those damages have been assessed without a view of the note. The practice of this country is to require that the note should be produced, or its absence accounted for, and the rule is a safe one.

Judgment affirmed.

CONWAY'S EXECUTORS AND DEVISEES v. ALEXANDER.

Present—All the Judges.

If A advance money to B, and B thereupon convey land to trustees in trust, to convey the same to A, in fee, in case B should fail to repay the money and interest on a certain day, and if B fail to repay the money on the day limited, and thereupon the trustees convey the land to A, B has no equity of redemption.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in chancery, at Alexandria.

219*] *Walter S. Alexander, the appellee, son and residuary devisee of Robert Alexander, deceased, filed his bill in equity against the executors and devisees of Richard Conway, deceased, to be permitted to redeem a certain tract of land which his father, Robert Alexander, had, in the year of 1788, conveyed to certain trustees, by a deed which the complainant contended was a mortgage; which land the trustees had conveyed to W. Lyles, who had conveyed the same to the said Richard Conway. The deed was by indenture, dated March 20, 1788, between Robert Alexander of the first part, W. Lyles of the second part, and certain trustees of the third part, whereby Robert Alexander (after reciting his title to an undivided moiety of 400 acres of land, holden in common with Charles Alexander), in consideration of 800*l.* paid to him by W. Lyles, and in consideration of the covenants to be performed by the trustees, bargained, granted and sold, aliened and confirmed to W. Lyles, in fee, twenty acres, being part of the said undivided moiety—and to the trustees the residue of the moiety, except part thereof conveyed to B. Dade on the 1st of January, 1788; which residue was supposed to contain 140 acres. To have and to hold the 20 acres to W. Lyles, his heirs and assigns, to his and their use forever—and the said residue of the said moiety to the trustees and the majority of them, and the survivors and survivor of them, in trust as follows, to wit: "To convey the said residue of the said moiety, "except as before excepted, unto him the said "W. Lyles, his heirs and assigns forever, by "good and sufficient deeds in law for that pur- "pose, at any reasonable time after the first "day of July, which shall be in the year one "thousand seven hundred and ninety, unless "the said Robert Alexander, his heirs, execu- "tors or administrators, shall pay, or cause to "be paid to the said W. Lyles, his heirs, exec- "utors or administrators, the sum of 700*l.* cur- "rent money of Virginia, in gold or silver "coin, with lawful interest thereupon, from "the date hereof, on or before the first day of "July, which shall be in the year of our Lord "seventeen hundred and ninety. And if the "said Robert Alexander, his heirs, executors, "or administrators, shall pay, or cause to be "paid to the said W. Lyles, his heirs, executors "or administrators, the said sum of 700*l.* cur- "rent money of Virginia, in gold or silver coin,

NOTE.—Generally, when a deed or contract is made upon a negotiation for the loan of money, a court of equity will construe the conveyance to be a mortgage, whatever may be the form of the contract, if the person to whom the application for the loan is made agrees to receive back his money, with interest, or a larger amount, within a specified time, and to reconvey the property. Holmes v. Grant, 8 Paige, 243.

But a mere agreement to re-convey the premises within a limited period, upon the repayment of the consideration money, or any other sum, where there is no subsisting debt, or continuing liability of the grantor for the payment of the money, either express or implied, is not sufficient to convert such a conditional sale into a mortgage. Holmes v. Grant, 8 Paige, 243.

Where a creditor cancelled securities of his debtor and loaned him more money, all of which amounted to $2,500, upon the debtor giving him an absolute deed of the land, the debtor taking a lease of the land for five years, agreeing to improve it, and the creditor agreed to re-convey in five years, on receiving $2,800, and took the debtor's indorsed note for $200 as security that $2,800 should be realized from the land. Held, a mortgage and usurious. Brown v. Dewey, 1 Saud. Ch. 56; Barton v. May, 3 Sand. Ch. 450.

A conveyance in consideration of discharge of previous debts, with an agreement to re-convey, for a sum certain, and the value of any improvements made, at end of year, is an agreement of sale and repurchase, and not a mortgage. Robinson v. Cropsey, 6 Paige, 480; Aff'g. S. C. 2 Edw. 138.

Nor where an absolute conveyance is given in payment of the debt, the creditor agreeing to convey within a year, retaining only a certain amount of the debt and interest, and that if the land be not sold within the year, he would pay the debtor such further sum as should be awarded by arbitrators, is not a mortgage, but a sale, and cannot be avoided by proof of usury. Robert Alexander then covenants that he has good title in fee-simple to the land conveyed; and that the 20 acres shall be laid off in a certain situation contiguous to other land of Lyles, and by certain metes and bounds therein described. The trustees then covenant, that they will well and truly execute the trusts reposed in them, by reconveying the land to Robert Alexander, if he should pay the money and interest on or before the 1st of July, 1790, or by conveying it to Lyles, if Robert Alexander should not pay it by that day. Robert Alexander then covenants with Lyles, that he will make further assurance, &c., both as to the 20 acres and as to the residue of the moiety, if the trustees should convey it to him. He then covenants to warrant the 20 acres to Lyles against the claims and demands of all persons whomsoever. This deed did not contain any covenant on the part of Alexander to pay the 700*l.*

On the 19th of July, 1790, the trustees, by deed of that date, reciting the deed of the 20th of March, 1788, and that Lyles had represented that R. Alexander had not paid the money, and had required them to execute the trust, conveyed the residue of the undivided moiety in fee to Lyles, in consideration of the covenants, agreements, and trusts in the former deed contained on their part to be performed, and in consideration of 700*l.* mentioned in the said former deed to have been paid by Lyles to Alexander.

On the 23d of August, 1790, Lyles, by deed of that date, after reciting the title of Robert Alexander to the undivided moiety of the 400 acres of land, and his deed of the 20th of March, 1788, to Lyles and the trustees, and that Alexander failed to pay the 700*l.* on the 1st of July, 1790, and that the trustees, by their *deed [*221 of the 19th of July, 1790, had conveyed the land in question to Lyles, in consideration of 900*l.* paid him by Richard Conway, conveyed the 20 acres, and the residue of the undivided moiety of the 400 acres, and all his right, title, interest, use, trust, property, claim, and demand, in and to the same, by force of the said indenture, and all deeds, evidences and writings in any manner or way touching the same, and the right and privilege of proseeuting in the name of Lyles (if at any time judged necessary by Conway, his heirs or assigns), any actions at law for the breach of any of the covenants in the said indenture contained: To have and to hold all and singular the premises thereby granted, with the appurtenances, and all the estate, right, title, use, trust, interest, property, claim and demand of him, the said W. Lyles, thereto, by force and virtue of the aforesaid indentures to Conway, his heirs and assigns, to his and their use forever; with a special warranty against the claims of Lyles and his heirs and assigns only.

On the 17th of January, 1793, Robert Alexander made his will, and after devising specifically a number of tracts of land and moieties of tracts by name and description, to his son Robert, devised all the rest and residue of his estate, real and personal, to his son Walter, the complainant. Robert Alexander, the testator, died in February, 1793. The land in question was not specifically devised by his will, and Walter, the complainant, obtained title under the will to several other tracts not specifically devised.

The complainant became of full age in November, 1803, and brought this suit in 1807. The deposition of W. Lyles was taken on the part of the defendants. He testified, that Robert Alexander was not indebted to him at the time of the contract for the land. No part of the money was advanecd by him as a loan to be secured by mortgage. He was no lender of money, and would not have lent Alexander the money on mortgage. Alexander was generally reputed not punetual in paying his debts, and rather too fond of law, and at the time of the contract for the land was confined in jail for a large debt, and sent several times to Lyles, and urged him to buy the land. Lyles then resided 222*] *on land adjoining the twenty aeres; and his house was very near the line. He wanted the addition of about 20 acres, and was not anxious to have any more. Alexander was more willing to sell his whole residue of the moiety of 400 aeres than to sell a part, his objeet being to raise a eonsiderable sum to pay the debt for which he was in prison. It was agreed that the 20 acres should be sold absolutely, and the residue should be sold eonditionally, as otherwise Lyles would not advanee the money. The 20 aeres were purehased absolutely, to suit the eonvenienee of Lyles, and the residue was purchased conditionally, to suit Alexander. Lyles was determined to advanee no money on any bargain which should make it necessary to go into eourt to get it baek. The eondition was understood by both to be, that if he paid the money by the time limited, the trustees were to reeonvey the land to Alexander, but otherwise they were to eonvey it to Lyles in fee-simple, and he was to have the land thereafter absolutely to his own use forever. He sold it as soon as he eould after he left Alexandria, to get baek his money. He received from Conway 900*l.* at the date of the eonveyanee, or a few days after. Alexander never made any claim upon Lyles for any part of the land, and never expressed to him any dissatisfaction with the sale although he saw him frequently afterwards. Alexander was not in confinement when the trustees made their deed to Lyles. No part of the land was cultivated, and no formal possession delivered.

The deposition of Ch. Lee, Esq., who drew the deeds of the 20th of March, 1788, and the 19th of July, 1790, stated that Lyles eonsulted him about the bargain with Alexander, and represented that Alexander wanted a eonsiderable sum of money to pay a debt which was pressing, and offered to sell some land, but would not sell the whole of it absolutely, but was willing to sell part of it absolutely, and the residue was to be conveyed to trustees, in trust, to convey the fee to Lyles, if a eertain sum of money was not paid by a certain day; and if it was, the trustees were to reconvey to Alexander. The deponent was asked if such a eontract was lawful, or would be deemed in law only a mortgage; and gave it as his opinion that the parties might make such a eontract, and that it eould not be considered a mortgage. Lyles intimated that if that was 223*] not very clear, he *would not have anything to do in the business. That he would not, on any terms, make a bargain with Alexander, if he should be obliged to go into a court of equity about it, which might be the case if there should be a mortgage; that Alexander was well known to be troublesome and fond of law. The deponent was requested to draw such instruments as would place the eontraet in the state of a conditional purehase of a part of the land, and with this view he drew the writing. He is certain that Lyles consulted him as to the nature and effeet of the contract, and did not intend to have a deed in the nature of a mortgage, but of absolute sale of a part, and of a eonditional sale of the other part of the land, and such was the deponent's intention when he drew the deed. That he afterwards drew a deed of conveyance from the trustees to Lyles, to carry into effeet their trust, and delivered it to Lyles to carry to the trustees. Lyles informed him that one of the trustees refused to exeeute the deed, unless Alexander would signify his eonsent, and asked whether a verbal consent would not do. The deponent sketched a note in writing for Alexander to sign, signifying his consent, and was afterwards informed that the trustees were satisfied, and did execute the deed, but he does not know whether Alexander gave his consent. Lyles was not easy in his pecuniary affairs, and he never knew him lend a large sum upon mortgage. Alexander was a bad manager of his estate, was generally needy of money, and not punetual in payment of his debts, though his landed estate was really of great value.

The answer of the executors does not admit the deed to be a mortgage, and states that Conway began to make expensive and permanent improvements on the land in the summer of 1791; that Alexander had an opportunity of seeing part of them, and probably did see them, and made no objeetion as they believe.

It appeared in evidence that the land had lately been sold for more than 20,000 dollars; but that it was very poor, much broken by gullies and exhausted, when Conway began his improvements. There was also evidenee tending to show that it was then worth more than he gave for it.

The eourt below being of opinion that the deed was *to be considered as a mort- [*224 gage, directed an account to be taken of the value of the permanent improvements, and the original sum advanecd by Lyles and interest, and of the rents and profits, which being done, it appeared that the complainant would have to pay the sum of 4,943 dollars to redeem the land; and the eourt aeeordingly decreed a release upon the payment of that sum.

From this deeree the defendants appealed to this eourt.

C. Lee, for the appellants.

The only question is, whether this is a case of mortgage. The bill does not state fraud or oppression. 1. As to the deed itself, the question is whether it be a defeasible purehase or a redeemable mortgage.

It sets forth the eonsideration of 800*l.* as one entire sum. There was no prior debt due to Lyles. That allegation of the bill is disproved; and unless there was an old debt, or an aetual loan, there eould be no mortgage. It may as well be a mortgage of the 20 acres as of the residue. If both eontraets were not aetual purehases, the parties would have required different instruments. All instruments are to have a reasonable eonstruetion aeeording to the intent of the parties. One distinguishing mark of a mortgage is a eovenant for the repayment of the money. But this deed contains no such eovenant. It was purposely omitted, that it might not be a mortgage. The whole question is as to the intention of the parties. Lyles had no personal remedy. If the land should fall in value, it was his loss. If there had been a valuable house upon the land, which had been destroyed by fire, it would have been the loss of Lyles. It was not reasonable that Alexander should have the chance of gain, but uot of loss. It was in his power to compel Lyles to take the land, by neglecting to pay the money on the day. Another circumstance showing the inteution of the partics is, that Alexander covenanted to make further assurance, if required, whenever the trustees should have conveycd the land to Lyles.

225*] *It was not inteuded as a security for money to Lyles, but a mere right in Alexander to repurchase until a certain day. A court of equity cannot change the agreements of parties.

Iu the case of Tasburgh v. Echlin (4 Br. Parl. Ca., 242), cited in Powell on Mortgages, 174, there had been a bill to foreclose, which clearly showed the intention of the purchaser to consider it as a mortgagc. But the House of Lords decided it to be au irredeemable purchase, and not a mortgage. That was an assignment, by lease and release, of a revcrsion expectaut on a lease for years, of which 43 were yet to come, in consideration of 200*l.* paid by Sir John Eustace to Charles Tasburgh, in trust for John Tasburgh, dated in 1681. In the indeuture of release thcre was a proviso, that if Sir John Eustace should pay Charles Tasburgh, at the cnd of 5 years, 200*l.* with interest, it should be lawful to him to re-enter and enjoy in his former right ; but if he should fail to pay within the time limited, the estate of Charles should be absolute as well in equity as in law, and that Sir John and his heirs should be forever debarred from all right and relief in equity, against the tenor of the said release; and Sir John did thereby, for himself and his heirs, release to Charles Tasburgh, his hcirs and assigns forever, all his right in equity to redeem thc premises, iu case of failure of payment as aforesaid ; and there was no covenant in the deed for the repayment of the money, or the interest by the grantor, as is usual in mortgages.

After the 5 ycars, John Tasburgh exhibited a bill, in 1687, against Sir John Eustace praying payment at a ccrtain day, or that the conditional estate of Charles (in casc it should be adjuged a defeasible or redeemable cstate), should be made absolute, and that Sir John might be foreclosed of all equity of redemption. This bill was takcn for confessed, and a decree in December, 1688, that he should be foreclosed, unless payment were made of principal, interest and costs, before December, 1689.

Sir John acquiesced undcr this dccree for 18 years, when he died. John Tasburgh died in 1691, and Henry Tasburgh succeeded to his 226] estate, and in 1722 demised *the premises to M'Namara. In 1723, the heirs of Sir John Eustace exhibited a bill, alleging that the decree for foreclosure had becn obtained by surprise, fraud and imposition, and praying it might be reviewed and reversed, which was done by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, who decrced that Henry Tasburgh should release to the heirs of Sir John, upon payment of the principal, interest and costs. From this decree Heury Tasburgh appealed to the House of Lords, who reversed it and dismissed thc bill.

The principle upou which this case was decided by the House of Lords is supposed by Powell to be, that the contract was to be considered as a couditional purchase, and not a mortgage.

And in the case of Barrell v. Sabine (1 Vern., 268), the Lord Keeper said, "he thought, that "where there was a clause or provision to re-"purchase, the time limited ought to be pre-"cisely observed."

In the case of Chapman v. Turner, (1 Call. 192,) Judge Pendleton, in delivering his opinion, said: "As on the oue hand the Chancellor "will not permit a real mortgage to be made "irredeemable by the act of the scrivcner, so "neither on the other hand will he suffer real con-"ditional or defeasiblc sales to be changed into "mortgages by the like acts. The real intention "of the parties governs him. Iu a defeasible pur-"chasc, the condition must be strictly per-"formed at the day, or no relief will be granted; "because it docs not admit of compensation "for the risk. If the thing pcrish the next day, "it must be the loss of the purchaser, he having "no covenant, or even implied promise, to re-"turn the money iu that event; and we are "taught by a maxim in equity, that in these "casual cases eventual loss or gain must accrue "to, or fall on him who runs the risks."

In the preseut case, both parties confided in the trustees. Their deed, after the failure of Alexander to pay the ready money, was as valid as if he himself had theu released all equity of redemption, or had made an absolute deed to Lyles.

2. As to the evidence in the case. It appears that *the trustees refused to execute [227 the deed until they had the consent of Alexander. A writing was drawn for him to sign, signifying his assent. The trustees executed the deed. The probability is that they had his assent in writing. He knew that the deed had beeu executed and he acquiesced. He saw the expensive improvements madc by Conway, and he was silent. Conway contiuued makiug substantial and permanent improvements for 17 years, without keeping any account either of the cost of his improvements, the expenses of cultivation, or the value of the crops. It has now become impossible to account. Justicc cannot uow be done. In 2 Eq. ca. ab., 599, it is said, that "Equity will not enlarge the time "for the mortgageor to redeem after six years "acquiescence undcr a forfeiture by his own "consent, especially if there be auy improve-"ment on the estatc." And again, "There "shall be no redcmption after long possession, "settlements made, aud estate improvcd."

In the case of Hollingsworth v. Frye, Judge Patcrson, in delivering his opiuion, said, that the time of payment was material, a cardinal poiut; and the party ought not to be suffered to lay by aud take the chance of the rise of value.

Lyles's giving a special warranty only is no evidencc that he considered it as a mortgage. The boundary was unsettled, and then in a course of litigation, which was a sufficient reason for his not giviug a general warranty. And that Alexauder did not consider it as a mortgage is evident from the circumstance that he did not mention this laud iu his will, although he specified almost every tract of land in which he had any interest, especially that part of this very tract which he had previously contracted to sell to Baldwin Dade.

This deed, therefore, was neither a mortgage per se, nor was it the intention or understanding of either of the parties that it should be so considered; but conveyed a good, absolute, and indefeasible estate, both at law and in equity, to W. Lyles, and his heirs and assigns.

Taylor, contra,

Admitted the distinction between an agree-
228*] ment to *repurchase, and a mortgage. But in this case, if it be not a mortgage, it was a most unconscionable bargain. The evidence shows that at the time of the bargain, other land less advantageously situated, and not better in quality, was worth three or four times the price which Lyles paid for this.

As to the question of mortgage. "Every "contract for the receiving of money, by the "conveyance of a real estate to the lender, not "made in contemplation of an eventual arrange-"ment of property, is, in equity, deemed a "mortgage." (Mellor v. Lees, 2 Atk. 495.) And all provisos and stipulations between the parties, tending to alter, in any subsequent event, the original nature of the mortgaged interest, or prevent the redemption of the estate pledged, upon payment of the money borrowed, with interest, are void. For were any such agreement suffered to prevail, they would put it in the power of every mortgagee to take advantage of the necessities of the mortgageor by inserting restrictive clauses to prevent a redemption of the estate pledged, unless upon terms injurious to the latter. In equity, therefore, the right of redemption is considered as inseparably incident to every contract founded on a mortgage, and can no more be restrained than the power of tenant in fee-simple to alien generally, or of tenant in tail, to suffer a recovery; it being a maxim in equity, that the same estate or interest cannot be a mortgage at one time, and at another time cease to be so. (Powell on Mortgages, 146). Nor will an agreement to make the conveyance absolute upon payment of a further sum, if the money lent be not paid at the day appointed, alter the case; such stipulations being deemed unconscionable; because a man ought not to have interest for his money and a collateral advantage besides; nor may he clog the redemption by any bye agreement. (1 Vern., 488, Willet v. Winnel; Powell, 152.)

Powell, in concluding his observations upon the case Tasburgh v. Echlin (p. 183), says: "But in all these cases where the equity of redemption is rebutted by agreements of this kind, and the transaction is considered as a conditional purchase, the intention of the parties at the time of contracting must, I apprehend, be clearly proved or necessarily implied from the circumstances 229*] *attending it; otherwise the general rule will not be departed from."

It is not necessary, to constitute a mortgage, that it should contain a covenant for the repayment of the money. 3 Atk. 280, Lawley v. Hooper; where the Lord Chancellor says that all Welch mortgages are without this covenant, and so are most copyhold mortgages. So in the case of King v. King (3 P. Will. 358), it was decided that every mortgage, although there be no covenant nor bond to pay the money, implies a loan, and every loan a debt; as in the case of the mortgage of a ship, which was taken at sea, although there was no covenant to pay the money, yet the executors of the mortgagor were decreed to pay the money for which the ship was mortgaged. And the Lord Chancellor said it was so in the case of Welch mortgages, where no day certain is appointed for the payment, but the matter left at large. The case of Howell v. Price (1 P. Will. 291), was upon a Welch mortgage, viz.: conveyance in fee of an estate in Wales, worth 52*l* per annum, under a proviso to be void if the mortgageor, his heirs or assigns should pay to the mortgagee or his heirs, 300*l*. on any Michaelmas day, giving six months' notice, and the mortgagee to have the rent which should then be in arrear; but there was no bond or covenant to pay the money. Yet it was decreed that it was a debt which the executors should pay. The case of Ross v. Norwell (1 Wash. 14) shows that a covenant to pay is not essential.

A deed of trust is a modern invention by which the equity of redemption is supposed to be foreclosed, without the aid of a court of chancery. But the present differs from the modern deed of trust. In that there is a public sale, and the surplus is paid to the mortgageor, which, if the sale is fairly and judiciously made, may be considered as the fair value of his equity of redemption. Yet the efficacy of such a sale as that to pass an irredeemable estate is doubted. (Powell, 19.) But here, the trustees were the mere instruments to convey. They had no powers to do anything but convey, upon the payment or non-payment of the money. Here was no provision made, to ascertain the value of the equity of redemption, or mitigate the severity of the contract. The intervention of the trustees did not alter the case, *or make [*230 it more or less a mortgage than it would have been without them.

It is in effect the same as if the deed had been directly from Alexander to Lyles, with a proviso that it should be void if Alexander should pay the money on the day appointed. Such a deed would unquestionably have been considered as a mortgage. It has been shown above, that a covenant to pay was not necessary; and a covenant for further assurance is usual in mortgages, and is therefore no evidence that this conveyance is not to be considered a mortgage. If, then, it is to be considered as a mortgage upon the face of the instrument, is the extrinsic evidence so clear as to rebut the equity of redemption?

Why was there a distinction made between the conveyance of the 20 acres and that of the 140? Why were the 20 conveyed to Lyles, and the 140 to the trustees? The answer apparent upon the face of the transaction, and expressly avowed by Lyles himself in his deposition, is, that Lyles did not want to purchase, and Alexander did not want to sell, more than 20 acres. Lyles says that the 20 acres were conveyed absolutely to suit his convenience, and the residue was conveyed to the trustees to suit Alexander. As to the 140 acres, then, Lyles did not wish to purchase them, nor Alexander to sell them. If a sale and disposition of the land were not the object of the transaction, it could be nothing but a loan of money by Lyles, and a security upon the land by Alexander. This was evidently the substance of the negotiation. And wherever there is a loan of money upon the seeurity of land, however, the transaetion may be disguised by the writings, it is substantially a mortgage. Lyles indeed admits his object to have been a loan of money, but says his intention was to have the means of getting back his money without going into a eourt of chaneery; that is, he wished to loan his money upon a real seeurity without allowing his debtor the right of redemption. It was an attempt to do that whieh eourts of equity have uniformly diseountenaneed; to devise a mode to defeat the equity of redemption where the transaction was really a loan of money upon a mortgage.

231*] *It is said Lyles had no personal remedy against Alexander, beeause there was no eovenant to repay the money. But the authorities already cited show that wherever the transaetion is really a loan, and the seeurity is inadequate, there is a personal remedy.

That Lyles eonsidered the land as a seeurity only, is evident from the eireumstanee that he received from Conway only his prineipal and interest, and assigned to Conway his right and title only, together with the title papers, and expressly assigned all his right of aetion against Alexander.

There is no evidence of acquieseence on the part of Robert Alexander, in the idea that this was an absolute sale. He died in January, 1793. Mr. Lyles himself states that he does not know whether Alexander knew of the deed of the 19th July, 1790. Conway's agreement with Charles Alexander respeeting a division of part of the land which they held in common, was in April, 1791. No improvements eould have been made before that date. One of the witnesses states that he began to diteh the land in March, 1791. It is probable he meant Mareh, 1792. If so, there were only ten months in which Alexander eould have seen any improvement on the land; and what he did see was not ineonsistent with the nature of the estate of a mortgagee in fee in possession. The buildings, &e., were not ereeted until after Alexander's death. The digging of a ditch and ereeting of a post and rail fenee upon a part of the land was not decisive evidence that Conway elaimed an irredeemable estate; and there is no evidence that even that small improvement was seen by Alexander. It is only stated by the witnesses that he might have seen it at a distance as he passed along the road from his house to Alexandria. The complainant did not become of full age until November, 1803, and brought suit in 1807. His guardian did not know the nature of Conway's title. The length of time is no bar to the eomplainant because he has been under a legal disability. (Powell, 407, 8, 11, 12.)

It is said that Robert Alexander did not speeify this land in his will, although he mentioned that part of the traet which was in the pos-

232*] session of Baldwin Dade; *and from this circumstance an infcrenee is drawn, that he eonsidered it as an absolute sale, and not a mortgage. But the reason why he mentioned that part of the land which was in possession of B. Dade was, that he devised it to his son Robert—and it will be perceived by his will, that he specified everything by name whieh he devised to Robert, but nothing whieh he devised to Walter, the complainant—for after making speeifie devises to Robert, he says: "I "give to my son Walter, and his heirs, forever, "all the rest and residue of my estate both real "and personal." So that if his not specifying this land be evidenee that he thought he had no interest in it, his not specifying the half of his estate which he intended for his son Walter, is evidence that he thought he had no interest therein. No sueh inferenee can be drawn from his silenee as to this land, which would not apply to one half of his estate.

There is no evidenee of Alexander's understanding of this transaetion. His eireumstanees were embarrassed up to the very time of his death, so that he never had it in his power to make an offer to redeem, It is evident from the deed itself that he expeeted to be able to redeem in about two years from the date of that instrument; and the insertion of sueh a clause was evidently intended for his benefit, and shows that he did not wish to sell. He was in prison for debt. His objeet was to get money to relieve him from eonfinement; and the stipulation for a time of payment is evidenee that he meant to borrow.

There is no evidence that this was not a negotiation for a loan of money. Mr. Lyles, in his deposition, does not say that the money was not advanced by him as a loan; but says it was "not advaneed as a loan to be seeured by mortgage;" and that he would not have loaned him money "on any mortgage by him." That he "was determined to advance no money on any "bargain whieh should make it neeessary to go "into court to get it back." That he sold the land as soon as he eould after he left Virginia, "for the purpose of getting baek his money." All this shows that he had no objection to lend the money, but he wished to get real security without any equity of redemption. And it appears he employed eounsel to devise a plan for that purpose; a *purpose which is never [233 eountenaneed in a eourt of equity.

The ease of Chapman v. Turner, which has been eited, was a eontract respecting personal property, and depended upon its own peeuliar circumstanees, none of whieh resemble the present.

The ease of Tarsburgh v. Echlin was a sale or mortgage of a reversion. There had been a decree of forelosure, and a long aequieseenee under it. It does not appear upon what grounds the House of Lords refused to review that deeree; whether it was beeause it had been so long acquiesced under, or whether upon the eonstruction of the original conveyanee. But the decision of the Court of Chaneery in Ireland was elearly upon the ground of its being a mortgage.

In the case of Robertson v. Campbell & Wheeler (2 Call., 428), Judge Pendleton, in delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, says: "It must often happen, in disquisitions "of this sort, that there will be a difficulty in "drawing the line betweeu these two sorts of "eonveyances" (mortgage and conditional sale.) "The great desideratum which this court has "made the ground of their decision is, whether "the purpose or the parties was to treat of a "purchase, the value of the commodity con-templated, and the priee fixed? Or, whether "the objeet was the loan of money and a secur-"ity, or pledge, for the repayment, intended."

The cases cited from 2 Eq. ca. ab. only show that a court of chancery will not decree a redemption after a forfeiture by consent of the mortgageor, and improvements by the mortgagee, and acquiescence by the mortgageor.

Upon the whole, then, this case appears to have been originally a loan of money upon real security, with an attempt to defeat the equity of redemption; and not a real bargain, with a view to the purchase of the land. The want of a covenant to repay the money does not alter the nature of the original transaction, and the same evidence which appears in this case would 234] have *supported a personal action by Lyles against Alexander upon the loan of the money, in case the title of the land had failed, or it had by any other means become an inadequate security.

Jones, in reply.

It must be admitted, that it was competent for the parties to make a conditional sale, and the only question is, whether they have done so. The depositions of Mr. Lyles and Mr. Lee show, that it was their intention to make a conditional purchase, and not a mortgage. If the instrument does not create a conditional sale, it must have been the mistake of the person who drew the deed.

It is true that no covenant in a mortgage can clog the equity of redemption. But if the transaction be not a mortgage, that principle does not apply. Wherever a deed is as collateral security, there must be a personal remedy. And it is no mortgage, unless it contain a personal obligation, or show it to be a loan. In the present deed there is no recital acknowledging a debt, and no covenant to pay; but the money is expressly acknowledged to be received as purchase money. It was entirely within the discretion of Alexander to pay the money or not at the time.

The evidence justifies the inference that the deed from the trustees to Lyles was made with the consent of Alexander; and being by consent, it is equivalent to a foreclosure by a court of equity. Even if it were a mortgage originally, it might by subsequent assent become absolute. And if at the time of the release of the equity of redemption, a note be given that the releaser should have the lands conveyed to him, upon payment of what was given for the lands within a year, such payment having been neglected for several years, there shall be no redemption. (Endsworth v. Griffith, 2 Eq., ca. ab. 595, c. 6.)

In all the cases cited to show that a covenant to pay the money is not necessary in a mortgage, there is some other circumstance showing a loan 235] of money, or designating *the instrument to be a mortgage. But in the present case there is no such circumstance.

March 14th. All the Judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was brought by Walter S. Alexander, as devisee of Robert Alexander, to redeem certain lands lying in the neighborhood of Alexandria, which were conveyed by Robert Alexander, in trust, by deed dated the 20th of March, 1788, and which were afterwards conveyed to William Lyles, and by him to the testator of the plaintiffs in error.

The deed of the 20th of March, 1788, is between Robert Alexander of the first part, William Lyles of the second part, and Robert T. Hooe, Robert Muire and John Allison of the third part. Robert Alexander, after reciting that he was seized of one undivided moiety of 400 acres of land, except 40 acres thereof previously sold to Baldwin Dade, as tenant in common with Charles Alexander, in consideration of eight hundred pounds paid by William Lyles, and of the covenants therein mentioned, grants, bargains and sells twenty acres, part of the said undivided moiety, to William Lyles, his heirs and assigns forever, and the residue thereof, except that which had been previously sold to Baldwin Dade, to the said Robert T. Hooe, Robert Muire and John Allison, in trust, to convey the same to William Lyles at any reasonable time after the first day of July, 1790, unless Robert Alexander shall pay to the said William Lyles, on or before that day, the sum of 700*l.* with interest from the said 20th of March, 1788. And if the said Robert Alexander shall pay the said William Lyles, on or before that day, the said sum of 700*l.* with interest, then to reconvey the same to the said Robert Alexander. Robert Alexander further covenants, that, in the event of a reconveyance to him, the said twenty acres sold absolutely shall be laid off adjoining the tract of land on which William Lyles then lived. The trustees covenant to convey to William Lyles, on the non-payment of the said sum of 700*l.*; and to re-convey to Robert Alexander in the *event of payment. Rob- [236 ert Alexander covenants for further assurances as to the 140 acres, and warrants the twenty acres to William Lyles and his heirs.

On the 19th of July, 1790, the trustees, by a deed in which the trust is recited, and that Robert Alexander has failed to pay the said sum of 700*l.*, convey the said land in fee to William Lyles.

On the 23d of August, 1790, William Lyles, in consideration of 900*l.*, conveyed the said 20 acres of land and 140 acres of land to Richard Conway with special warranty against himself and his heirs.

On the 9th day of April, in the year 1791, a deed of partial partition was made between Richard Conway and Charles Alexander. This deed shows that Charles Alexander asserted an exclusive title in himself to a considerable part of this land.

Soon after this deed of partition was executed, Richard Conway entered upon a part of the lands assigned to him, and made on them permanent improvements of great value and at considerable expense.

In January or February, 1793, Robert Alexander departed this life, having first made his last will in writing, in which he devises the land sold to Baldwin Dade, but does not mention the land sold to William Lyles.

The plaintiff, who was then an infant, and who attained his age of twenty-one years in November, 1803, brought his bill to redeem in 1807. He claims under the residuary clause of Robert Alexander's will.

The question to be decided is, whether Robert Alexander, by his deed of March, 1788, made a conditional sale of the property conveyed, by that deed, to trustees, which sale became absolute by the non-payment of 700*l.* with interest on the 1st of July, 1790, and by the conveyance of the 19th of that month, or is to be considered as having only mortgaged the property so conveyed.

To deny the power of two individuals, capa-
237*] ble of *acting for themselves, to make a contract for the purchase and sale of lands defeasible by the payment of money at a future day, or, in other words, to make a sale with a reservation to the vendor of a right to repurchase the same land at a fixed price and at a specified time, would be to transfer to the Court of Chancery, in a considerable degree, the guardianship of adults as well as of infants. Such contracts are certainly not prohibited either by the letter or the policy of the law. But the policy of the law does prohibit the conversion of a real mortgage into a sale. And as lenders of money are less under the pressure of circumstances which control the perfect and free exercise of the judgment than borrowers, the effort is frequently made by persons of this description to avail themselves of the advantage of this superiority, in order to obtain inequitable advantages. For this reason the leaning of courts has been against them, and doubtful cases have generally been decided to be mortgages. But as a conditional sale, if really intended, is valid, the inquiry in every case must be, whether the contract in the specific case is a security for the repayment of money or an actual sale.

In this case the form of the deed is not, in itself, conclusive either way. The want of a covenant to repay the money is not complete evidence that a conditional sale was intended, but is a circumstance of no inconsiderable importance. If the vendee must be restrained to his principal and interest, that principal and interest ought to be secure. It is, therefore, a necessary ingredient in a mortgage, that the mortgagee should have a remedy against the person of the debtor. If this remedy really exists, its not being reserved in terms will not affect the case. But it must exist in order to justify a construction which overrules the express words of the instrument. Its existence, in this case, is certainly not to be collected from the deed. There is no acknowledgment of a pre-existing debt, nor any covenant for repayment. An action, at law, for the recovery of the money, certainly could not have been sustained; and if, to a bill in chancery praying a sale of the premises, and a decree for so much money as might remain due, Robert Alexander had answered that this was a sale and not a 238*] mortgage, clear proof to *the contrary must have been produced to justify a decree against him.

That the conveyance is made to trustees is not a circumstance of much weight. It manifests an intention in the drawer of the instrument to avoid the usual forms of a mortgage, and introduces third persons, who are perfect strangers to the transaction, for no other conceivable purpose than to entitle William Lyles to a conveyance subsequent to the non-payment of the 700*l.* on the day fixed for its payment, which should be absolute in its form. This intention, however, would have no influence on the case if the instrument was really a security for money advanced and to be repaid.

It is also a circumstance which, though light, s not to be entirely disregarded, that the 20 acres, which were admitted to be purchased absolutely, were not divided and conveyed separately. It would seem as if the parties considered it as at least possible that a division might be useless.

Having made these observations on the deed itself, the court will proceed to examine those extrinsic circumstances which are to determine whether it is to be construed a sale or a mortgage.

It is certain that this deed was not given to secure a pre-existing debt. The connection between the parties commenced with this transaction.

The proof is also complete that there was no negotiation between the parties respecting a loan of money; no proposition ever made respecting a mortgage.

The testimony on this subject is from Mr. Lyles himself and from Mr. Charles Lee. There is some contrariety in their testimony, but they concur in this material point. Mr. Lyles represents Alexander as desirous of selling the whole land absolutely, and himself as wishing to decline an absolute purchase of more than twenty acres. Mr. Lee states Lyles as having represented to him that Alexander was unwilling to sell more than twenty acres absolutely, and offered to sell the residue conditionally. There is not, however, a *syllable in [*239 the cause intimating a proposition to borrow money or to mortgage property. No expression is proved to have ever fallen from Robert Alexander before or after the transaction, respecting a loan or a mortgage. He does not appear to have imagined that money was to be so obtained; and when it became absolutely necessary to raise money, he seems to have considered the sale of property as his only resource.

To this circumstance the court attaches much importance. Had there been any treaty—any conversation respecting a loan or a mortgage—the deed might have been, with more reason, considered as a cover intended to veil a transaction differing in reality from the appearance it assumed. But there was no such conversation. The parties met and treated upon the ground of sale and not of mortgage.

It is not entirely unworthy of notice that William Lyles was not a lender of money, nor a man who was in the habit of placing his funds beyond his reach. This, however, has not been relied upon, because the evidence is admitted to be complete that Lyles did not intend to take a mortgage. But it is insisted that he intended to take a security for money, and to avoid the equity of redemption; an intention which a court of chancery will invariably defeat.

His not being in the practice of lending money is certainly an argument against his intending this transaction as a loan, and the evidence in the cause furnishes strong reason for the opinion that Robert Alexander himself did not so understand it. In this view of the case the proposition made to Lyles, being for a sale and not for a mortgage, is entitled to great consideration. There are other circumstances, too, which bear strongly upon this point.

The case, in its own nature, furnishes intrinsic evidence of the improbability that the trustees would have conveyed to William Lyles without some communication with Robert

Alexander. They certainly ought to have known from himself, and it was easy to procure the information, that the money had not been paid. If he had considered this deed as a mort-240*] gage, he would *naturally have resisted the conveyance, and it is probable that the trustees would have declined making it. This probability is very much strengthened by the facts which are stated by Mr. Lee. The declaration made to him by Lyles, after having carried the deed drawn by Mr. Lee to Mr. Hooe, that the trustees were unwilling to execute it until the assent of Alexander could be obtained, and the directions given to apply for that assent, furnish strong reasons for the opinion that this assent was given.

It is also a very material circumstance that, after a public sale from Lyles to Conway, and a partition between Conway and Charles Alexander, Conway took possession of the premises, and began those expensive improvements which have added so much to the value of the property. These facts must be presumed to have been known to Robert Alexander. They passed within his view. Yet his most intimate friends never heard him suggest that he retained any interest in the land. In this aspect of the case, too, the will of Robert Alexander is far from being unimportant. That he mentions forty acres sold to Baldwin Dade, and does not mention one hundred and forty acres, the residue of the same tract can be ascribed only to the opinion that the residue was no longer his.

This, then, is a case in which there was no previous debt, no loan in contemplation, no stipulation for the repayment of the money advanced, and no proposition for or conversation about a mortgage. It is a case in which one party certainly considered himself as making a purchase, and the other appears to have considered himself as making a conditional sale. Yet there are circumstances which nearly balance these, and have induced much doubt and hesitation in the mind of some of the court.

The sale, on the part of Alexander, was not completely voluntary. He was in jail and was much pressed for a sum of money. Though this circumstance does not deprive a man of the right to dispose of his property, it gives a complexion to his contracts, and must have some influence in a doubtful case. The very fact that the sale was conditional, implies an expectation to redeem.

241*] *A conditional sale made in such a situation at a price bearing no proportion to the value of the property would bring suspicion on the whole transaction. The excessive inadequacy of price would, in itself, in the opinion of some of the judges, furnish irresistable proof that a sale could not have been intended. If lands were sold at 5*l.* per acre conditionally, which, in fact, were worth 15*l.* or 20*l.* or 50*l.* per acre, the evidence furnished by this fact, that only a security for money could be intended, would be, in the opinion of three judges, so strong as to overrule all the opposing testimony in the cause.

But the testimony on this point is too uncertain and conflicting to prevail against the strong proof of intending a sale and purchase, which was stated.

The sales made by Mr. Dick and Mr. Hartshorne of lots for building, although of land more remote from the town of Alexandria than that sold to Lyles, may be more valuable as building lots, and may consequently sell at a much higher price than this ground would have commanded. The relative value of property in the neighborhood of a town depends on so many other circumstances than mere distance, and is so different at different times that these sales cannot be taken as a sure guide.

That twenty acres, part of the tract, were sold absolutely for 5*l.* per acre; that Lyles sold to Conway at a very small advance; that he had previously offered the property to others unsuccessfully; that it was valued by several persons at a price not much above what he gave; that Robert Alexander, although rich in other property, made no effort to relieve this, are facts which render the real value, at the time of sale, too doubtful to make the inadequacy of price a circumstance of sufficient weight to convert this deed into a mortgage.

It is, therefore, the opinion of the court that the decree of the Circuit Court is erroneous and ought to be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to that court with directions to dismiss the bill.

Decree reversed.

*DUNLOP v. MUNROE. [*242

Present—All the Judges.

When the issue is taken upon the neglect of the postmaster himself, it is not competent to give in evidence the neglect of his assistant. When it is intended to charge a postmaster for the negligence of his assistants, the pleadings must be made up according to the case; and his liability then will only result from his own neglect in not properly superintending the discharge of their duties in his office. In order to make a postmaster liable for negligence, it must appear that the loss or injury sustained by the plaintiff was the consequence of the negligence.

Parol evidence cannot be given that one set of written instructions from the Postmaster-General, superseded another set of written instructions.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington, in an action wherein James and John Dunlop were plaintiffs, and Thomas Munroe, the deputy-postmaster at Washington, was defendant.

The declaration, after having been several times amended, contained nine counts.

1. The first count was as follows: Thomas Munroe, late of Washington county, gentleman, was attached to answer unto James Dunlop and John Dunlop in a plea of trespass on the case, &c., whereupon the said James and John, by Francis S. Key, their attorney, complain, that whereas, by the laws of the United States of America, relative to the post-office establishment of the United States, and of the post-roads within the United States, it was enacted, that there should be established, at the seat of the government of the United States, a general post-office, under the direction of a Postmaster-General, and that post-offices should be established; and that postmasters should be appointed by the said Postmaster-General, at all such places as should appear to him expedient, on the post-roads which then were, or might thereafter be established, and the carriage of the mail on all such post-roads provided for; and that every postmaster, so appointed by the said Postmaster-General, should keep an office, in which one or more persons should attend for the purpose of performing the duties thereof; and a post-road was directed to be established from Passamaquoddy, in the District of Maine, to St. Marys, in Georgia, within the said United States; and the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, and the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and the town of Petersburg, in the state of Virginia, were places through which the said post-road was directed by law to pass. And whereas, in pursuance of the said laws, a general post-office was established at the seat of government of the United States, under the 243] *direction of a Postmaster-General, duly appointed and qualified, and a post-road established within the United States from Passamaquoddy, in the District of Maine aforesaid, to St. Marys, in Georgia aforesaid; and the said city of Philadelphia, and the said city of Washington, and the said town of Petersburg, were places through which the said road did pass, and post-offices were duly established at the said places, so as aforesaid on the said post-road, by the said Postmaster-General; and postmasters by him duly appointed and qualified to attend to the duties of the said post-offices, and the carriage of the mail of the United States on the said post-road provided for by the said Postmaster-General agreeably to law; and the said Thomas Munroe was, by the said Postmaster-General, duly appointed and qualified the postmaster at the said office, so as aforesaid established at the said city of Washington on the said post-road, and between the city of Philadelphia and the town of Petersburg aforesaid, also on the said post-road, and as such was bound to attend to and perform all the duties thereof, and to receive, make up, and distribute and forward the mails of the said United States, and all the letters and packets contained therein which should arrive or come to his said post-office so by him kept as aforesaid at the said city of Washington, to all such places on the said post-road to which the same were directed and addressed; and the said Thomas so being, as aforesaid, postmaster at the said post-office, so as aforesaid lawfully established at the said city of Washington, on the post-road so as aforesaid also lawfully established, and post-offices being, also, in like manner, lawfully established at the said city of Philadelphia, and the said town of Petersburg, on the said post-road, and postmasters duly appointed and qualified, and attending to the duties of the said post-offices, on the thirtieth day of July, in the year eighteen hundred and six, the said James and John being possessed of a large sum of money, to wit: the sum of two thousand dollars current money of the United States of their own proper money, and being so possessed thereof, on the same day and year, did inclose the same in bank notes by means of their agents in that particular, (a certain Walker and Kennedy,) in a letter sealed, and directed to the said James and John at Petersburg, in Virginia aforesaid, on the post-road aforesaid, and the said sum of money, so sealed and inclosed in *said letter so directed, did place in the [244 post-office in the said city of Philadelphia, so as aforesaid established on the said post-road, to be forwarded on the said post-road, in the mail of the United States to the said town of Petersburg on the post-road aforesaid, and the said letter, directed as aforesaid, and the money in bank notes as aforesaid, to the said amount, inclosed in the same, were accordingly, by the said postmaster at Philadelphia, and from the office there established as aforesaid on the said post-road, sent on and forwarded in the mail of the United States, on the day and year aforesaid; and did afterwards, to wit: on the first day of August, in the year aforesaid, arrive at the post-office of the said Thomas, postmaster, as aforesaid, in the said city of Washington, on the said post-road, in the mail of the United States, on the route to the post-office at Petersburg aforesaid, on the post-road aforesaid, and was, on the day and year last mentioned, at the county of Washington aforesaid, received by the said Thomas to be by him sent on and forwarded in the mail of the United States, on the said post-road, to the said James and John, at Petersburg, to whom the same was directed and addressed; yet the said Thomas, regardless of his said duty as postmaster, and wholly neglecting the same, did not send on the said letter, and the sum of money contained and inclosed in the same, to the said town of Petersburg, on the said post-road, in the mail of the United States, to the said James and John to whom the same was directed, as it was his duty to do; but the same letter and the said sum of money therein contained as aforesaid, were fraudulently and improperly secreted, withheld, and taken, in the said post-office, at the city of Washington aforesaid, by the said Thomas, or some other person employed by him, in his said office, so that the said James and John were prevented from receiving the same, and the same letter, and sum of money, have been wholly lost to the said plaintiffs.

2. The 2d count was like the first in every particular, except that it states that the plaintiffs placed the letter inclosing the money in the post-office at Philadelphia, to be forwarded "without delaying the same a single post," and that it was received by the defendant at his office in Washington on the 1st of August, 1806, to be by him sent on and forwarded, without 245] delaying the same a single *post, in the mail of the United States, &c., "yet the said "Thomas, regardless of his said duty as post-"master, and wholly neglecting the same, did "not, on the first day of August in the year "aforesaid, send on the said letter and the sum "of money contained and inclosed in the same, "to the town of Petersburg on the said post-"road, in the mail of the United States, which "left the city of Washington on the said first "day of August, in the year aforesaid, for "Petersburg aforesaid, as it was his duty and "in his power to have done; but the same let-"ter, and the said sum of money therein con-"tained as aforesaid, were by the negligence, "carelessness, and misconduct of the said "Thomas, in his said office aforesaid, utterly, "afterwards to them, the said James and John, "lost; by reason whereof the said James and "John, the sum of money so as aforesaid, con-"tained and inclosed in the said letter directed "and addressed as aforesaid, and the use and "possession of the same, have entirely lost; to "the great damage," &c.

3. The third count was like the first in every respect, except that instead of averring that the plaintiffs were possessed of a large sum of money, it avers that they were possessed of "certain property of great value, to wit: of "certain bank notes for the payment of money "to the amount of the value of two thousand "dollars, current money of the United States, "as their own property, and inclosed the same bank notes," &c., using the words "bank notes," in lieu of the words "sum of money" in the residue of the count. It contains also an averment of a demand and refusal of the defendant to deliver the letter and bank notes, whereby the same have been totally lost to the plaintiffs, whereof the defendant had notice.

4. The fourth count was like the first, except that it uses the terms "bank notes," instead of "sum of money in bank notes;" and instead of averring, that the letter and sum of money were "fraudulently and improperly secreted, "withheld and taken, in the said post-office," it avers that "the same letter and bank notes "were, by the negligence, carelessness, and mis-"conduct of the said Thomas in his said office, "lost," &c., and avers a demand and refusal to deliver them, whereby they have been totally lost to the plaintiffs, whereof the defendant had notice, &c.

246*] *5. The fifth count varied from the others considerably in the recital, respecting the establishment of post-roads and post-offices; but the principal difference consisted in an averment, that the postmasters, appointed by the Postmaster-General, were to perform their duties according to law, "and to the instructions of the Postmaster-General relative to their duty." That the post-office at Washington was a distributing office, and that it was the duty of the defendant, according to the instructions of the Postmaster-General then in force, to open the mail addressed "Southern;" and to distribute and re-mail the letters and packets into proper mails before the departure of the mail; and on no account to delay them a single post, by which it was in his power to send them in the regular course of the mail. It then avers, that the letter and post-notes were put into the post-office at Philadelphia on the 30th of July, and were from thence forwarded in the mail on the 31st, and arrived at Washington on the 1st of August, and were in the usual manner delivered and placed in the post-office at Washington, kept by the defendant, to be, by him, re-mailed, and sent on and forwarded in the mail of the U. S. to Petersburgh, to the plaintiffs; and were delivered and placed in the usual and regular course of the mail at and in the post-office at Washington aforesaid, "in time to be "re-mailed and sent on, according to the in-"struction and direction aforesaid of the Post-"master-General aforesaid, in the same day of "the arrival aforesaid, and by the same mail "which thereafter, and on the same day, de-"parted from the post-office aforesaid, in the city "of Washington aforesaid, with letters for the "town of Petersburgh aforesaid; by virtue of "which premises it was the duty of the defendant "on the said 1st day of August, in the year 1806, "at," &c., "to have distributed, re-mailed, and "sent on, or caused to have been distributed," "&c., "the said letter, containing the said bank "notes, to the town of Petersburgh aforesaid, in "the mail of the U. S. aforesaid, on the same 1st "day of August, in the year aforesaid, which "it was in the power of the defendant to have "done in the usual and regular course of the "business of his said office; nevertheless, the "said defendant, on the 1st day of August, in "the year aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, "regardless of his duty as postmaster as afore-"said, did not send on or forward, or cause to "be sent on or forwarded, *on the said [247 "first day of August, in the year aforesaid, "the said letter containing the bank notes "aforesaid, to the town of Petersburgh afore-"said, in the mail of the U. S. aforesaid, which "left the said city of Washington on the said "first day of August, and which ought to have "received and carried the said letter, and bank "notes inclosed therein, to the post-office in the "said town of Petersburgh, but by reason of "his negligence and misconduct aforesaid, in "his said office on the said first day of August, the "said letter, and the said bank notes inclosed "therein as aforesaid have been afterwards "utterly, and ever since, lost to the plaintiffs."

6. The sixth count was like the fifth, excepting that it averred that the letter with the bank notes inclosed was received at the post-office in Washington, on the 1st of August, "by Henry "Whetcroft, then and there agent and clerk of "the defendant, duly authorized to perform "the duties of the said office for the defendant, "to be re-mailed and sent on," &c. "By vir-"tue of which premises, it was the duty of the "said defendant, postmaster as aforesaid, by "himself, his said agent, or some other per-"son, on the first day of August aforesaid, to "have distributed, re-mailed, and sent on the "said letter," &c., "in the mail of the U. S. "on the same 1st day of August, which it was "in the power of the defendant, by himself or his "said agent and clerk, to have done,"&c. "Nev- "ertheless, the said defendant, on the said 1st "day of August," "regardless of his said duty "as postmaster, as aforesaid, did not by himself, "or his said servant and clerk, or any other per- "son, send on and forward, on the said 1st day "of August, the said letter," &e. "But by "reason of the negligence and miseonduet "aforesaid, in transacting the business of the "said offiee on the said 1st day of August," &c., "the said letter," &c., "have been afterwards "utterly, and ever sinee, lost to them, the said "plaintiffs," &c.

7. The seventh eount was like the sixth, excepting that it averred that the letter, &e., were received at the post-offiee in Washington, by William Hewitt, another agent, servant or clerk of the defendant.

8. The eighth eount charged, that the letter, 248] &c., was *duly, by the earrier of the mail, plaeed in the office of the defendant at Washington, on the 1st of August, 1806, in time to be re-mailed and sent on by the mail of the same day, and that it was his duty, by himself or by his agents, or some of them, to have re-mailed and sent it on aeeordiugly by that mail, which he did not do, or cause to be done; but by reason of the negligenee and miseonduct aforesaid, iu his said offiee, on the said first day of August, the letter, &c., have been afterwards utterly, and ever sinee, lost to the plaintiff.

9. The niuth eount was like the eighth, excepting that it averred that the mail whieh left Washington for Petersburgh on the 1st of August (and which ought to have carried the plaintiff's letter), arrived safely at Petersburgh with all its letters, &e., "but the said defend- "ant did unduly, improperly, and negligently "delay, detain, and keep the letter aforesaid, "eontaining," &e., "in his said post-office uu- "til and after the departure of the mail afore- "said, whieh ought, as aforesaid, by the laws "and Postmaster-Geueral's instruetions afore- "said, to have earried and eontained the same "on the said 1st day of August; and the let- "ter and bank notes aforesaid, so as aforesaid "unduly detained, the said defendant did de- "lay, and keep in his said office for a long "spaee of time, to wit, until the departure of "the mail, whieh thereafter, to wit, on the 3d "day of August next following, left his said "office for the town of Petersburgh aforesaid, "but which never did arrive at the post-office "in the said town of Petersburgh, but was, "together with the letters and paekages con- "tained therein, and with the letter and bank "notes aforesaid of the said plaintiffs, thus im- "properly delayed and unduly forwarded, whol- "ly and entirely lost on its said route to the town "of Petersburgh aforesaid, and before its ar- "rival at the said post-office in the said towu of "Petersburgh; by reason of which said uudue, "improper and unlawful delay and detention, "negligence and miseonduet of the said Thomas "Munroe in his said post-offiee, the letter and "bank notes contained therein as aforesaid, "have been then, and ever since, utterly lost "to the plaintiffs."

To these nine eounts, there were eighteen pleas in bar.

249*] *1. The 1st plea was the general issue of not guilty, pleaded to all the counts.

2. The 2d plea was also pleaded to all the counts, and was, "that the said letter eontaining," &c., "was not brought to and delivered, "nor in any manner given in charge at the "said post-office at Washington, in the mail "of the United States, which, on the 31st of "July, 1806, left the post-offiee at Philadelphia, "and which, on the first of August uext en- "suing, arrived at the post-offiee in Washing- "ton, in manner and form," &c.; and of this he puts himself on the country, and the plaintiffs likewise.

3. The 3d plea was to the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th counts, and denied that the letter, &c., was received by the defendant, in manner and form, &e. Upon this plea issue was joined.

4. The 4th plea was to the 1st and 3d eounts, and denied that the letter, &e., was fraudulently seereted, withheld and taken, by the defendant, in manner and form, &c. Upon this plea also the plaintiffs joined issue.

5. The 5th plea was also to the 1st and 3d counts, and averred, that as to the defendants having personally received the said letter, &c., and as to his having fraudulently secreted, withheld, and taken the same, &c., he was not guilty; and of this he put himself upon the country, and the plaintiffs likewise. And as to the residue of the allegations, charges, and complaints of fraud and misconduct, in the two last-mentioned counts of the said declaration above, supposed to have been committed in the said post-office at Washington by some other person employed by the defendant in the said office, he says that the plaintiffs, their action aforesaid, to have, &e., ought not, because he says, that at the time when, &c., and always before and ever since, the defendant, in pursuanee of regulatious and instruetions duly made and issued by the Postmaster-General, took due precaution and exercised all reasonable eare, diligence and eireumspeetion, to eause all mails, letters and packets brought to the said office, to be duly sent on and forwarded aeeording to the destination of the same, and to prevent all frauds and embezzlements in the said *office, by selecting, [250 appointing, and employing as clerks and assistants in the said offiee, and to attend in the said offiee at the regular hours directed by the Postmaster-General, for the purpose of perforuing the duties of the same, none but persons of competent skill and knowledge, of fair character, of known good repute for fidelity and honesty, and who, upon beiug so appointed and employed, and previous to entering upon the duties assigned them as aforesaid, or the execution of their trust aforesaid, had in pursuance of the act of Congress in such case made and provided, and in obedienee to the express instructions of the Postmaster-General, respectively taken and subseribed, before a magistrate, in due manner and form, the oath prescribed by the said aet of Cougress, and also the oath, in due mauner and form, as direeted by the Postmaster-General aforesaid; that is to say, an oath to support the eonstitution of the United States, and had respeetively transmitted to, and caused to be duly filed in the general post-office certificates, iu due form, of the said oaths so taken and subscribed as aforesaid. Aud the said defendant in fact says, that at the time when, &c., and for a long time before and after, he had with due precaution and circumspection, and with all reasonable care and diligence, and in pursuance of regulations and instructions duly made and issued by the Postmaster-General of the U. S. selected and duly appointed and employed, two persons of competent skill and knowledge, of fair character and of known good repute for fidelity and honesty; that is to say, one Henry Whetcroft and one William Hewitt, as clerks and assistants in the said post-office, and to attend regularly, &c., for the purpose of performing the duties of the said office, and to whom, and to no other person or persons, were then and there entrusted, by the said defendant, the duties of receiving and opening the mails brought to the said office for distribution or delivery, and of receiving, distributing, re-mailing, and sending on, according to the proper destination of the same, all mails, letters, &c., there being then and there no other person or persons employed in the said office, to whom the defendant had entrusted any agency in the duties of the said office, or who were suffered by the defendant to inspect or handle any letters, newspapers, or other articles constituting a part of any mail brought, &c.; they, the said H. W. and W. H. 251] upon being appointed and *employed as aforesaid, and previous to entering upon the duties, &c., having, in pursuance of the said act of Congress, and in obedience to the instructions and directions of the Postmaster-General aforesaid, respectively and duly taken and subscribed the oaths aforesaid, and duly transmitted to and caused to be filed in the general post-office, certificates, in due form, of the said oaths respectively so taken and subscribed as aforesaid; and the said defendant says, that if the said letter, &c., was in fact delivered and received, or in any manner given in charge at the said post-office, or was in fact fraudulently secreted, withheld, and taken by any person employed and entrusted by the defendant to attend in the said office, for the purpose of performing the duties of the same, then such fraudulent embezzlement was without any participation or connivance whatsoever of the defendant, and without any fraud, collusion, or other misdemeanor in office whatsoever, on the part of the defendant, or by him done or permitted, but altogether without his consent or knowledge, and against his will, and this he is ready to verify, &c.

To the latter part of this plea, there was a special demurrer and joinder. Because, 1. The plea is argumentative in this, that it states that the defendant has appointed competent and honest men to do the duties of the said office, and therefore infers that he himself is not liable for their negligence; and further, in this, that he states what acts he did in relation to his office, and reasons from them in his exculpation. 2. Because the plea does not confess and avoid, nor deny the allegations of the said counts or of any of them. 3. Because it does not state the nature and circumstances of error or mistake supposed to be made by his said clerks and assistants, so as to show that it did not proceed from a want of reasonable care and diligence. 4. Because the plea amounts to the general issue. 5. Because it does not set forth any matter of law proper for the decision of the court, but states facts proper to be given in evidence upon the general issue joined between the parties. 6. Because the plea tends to draw from the consideration of the jury to that of the court, matters of evidence proper to be shown only to the jury on the general issue; and is immaterial, insufficient and informal.

*6. The 6th plea was to the said 4th [252 and 9th counts, and denies that the letter was lost by the negligence, carelessness, or misconduct of the defendant in his office; upon which the plaintiffs joined issue.

7. The 7th plea was to the 1st and 3d counts, and stated that the bank notes mentioned in those two counts were notes of the bank of Virginia, "which was a bank duly established "under a charter from the government of the "state of Virginia, and if the same were in fact "fraudulently taken, withheld and secreted by "the defendant or any person employed and en- "trusted in the said post-office at Washington, "then, according to the form of the several "statutes in force within the county of Wash- "ington aforesaid, every person so acting and "doing became guilty of a felonious embezzle- "ment of the same letter and bank notes, and "liable to suffer the pains and penalties of "felony, and ought to have been prosecuted "for such crime accordingly; yet the defend- "ant in fact saith, that no criminal prosecution "whatsoever has been commenced, nor any "conviction had against any person or persons "whatsoever, in the said two counts of the said "declaration, supposed to be guilty as aforesaid "and this he is ready to verify," &c.

To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder.

8. The 8th plea was to the 6th count, and denied that the letter, &c., were received by Henry Whcteroft at the post-office in Washington, in manner and form, &c.; upon which issue was joined.

9. The 9th plea was to the 7th count, and denies that the letter was received by William Hewitt at the post-office, &c., in manner and form, &c.; upon which issue was also joined.

10. The 10th plea was to the 9th count and averred that the defendant did not unduly, improperly, and negligently, delay, detain and keep in the post-office at Washington, nor anywhere else, the said letter, &c., in manner and form, &c.; upon this plea also the plaintiff's joined issue.

*11. The 11th plea was to the 5th, [253 6th, 7th, and 8th counts, and averred that the loss of the letter, &c., was not caused or produced by reason of the same not having been re-mailed and sent on, at and from the said post-office at Washington, on the same day of the supposed arrival of the said letter and bank notes at the said post-office, to wit, on the 1st day of August, 1806, and by the same mail which, after the said supposed arrival, and on the same day departed from the said post-office at Washington, with letters for the said town of Petersburgh, and by the said letter and bank notes being delayed by the said Thomas in the post-office at Washington, until the departure of the next succeeding mail of the 3d of August, in manner and form, &c. Issue was also joined upon this plea.

12. The 12th plea was to the 9th count, and was precisely like the 11th plea.

13. The 13th plea was to the 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th counts and stated that the defendant, as to his having received the letter, &c., and having wilfully and negligently omitted to forward and send on the same, in the mail, according to the proper destination of the same; and as to his having unduly kept and detained the same in his office, and as to his having disregarded the duties of his said office, and as to the negligence and misconduct in office imputed to him the defendant, he is not guilty; and of this he puts himself upon the country, and the plaintiffs likewise.

And as to the residue of the allegations, charges and complaints of negligence and misconduct in the several counts last aforesaid above supposed to be committed and suffered in the said post-office at Washington, the defendant (protesting that he has in all things demeaned himself, in his said office of postmaster, as a good and faithful officer of the United States, and that he has always exercised all practicable care and diligence to have the business and duties of the said office, regularly, duly and faithfully transacted, performed and executed) says that at the time when, &c., he took due precaution, &c., by selecting and appointing proper persons, &c., &c., (as in the 5th plea), and if the said letter, &c., were delivered at his office at Washington, and if the 254] *same were, by reason of any casual negligence, misconduct, inadvertence, oversight, error or mistake of any person or persons so employed and entrusted in the said office, not in fact duly re-mailed, forwarded and sent on, &c., such the delivery of the said letter, &c., at the said office at Washington was entirely unknown to the defendant, and every such misconduct, &c., was likewise entirely unknown to the defendant, and was not caused or produced by any misdemeanor in office of the defendant, nor willingly or knowingly suffered or permitted by him, but was caused and produced by the casual, inadvertent and unintentional mistake, error and oversight of some person or persons so appointed, &c., and altogether without the consent or knowledge of the defendant, and against his will. And so the defendant says that he took due precaution and used all reasonable care, diligence and circumspection to cause the said supposed letter, &c., (if ever in fact delivered and given in charge of the said post-office), to be duly sent on and forwarded, &c.; and this he is ready to verify, &c.

To the latter part of this plea, as pleaded to the 5th and 9th counts, the plaintiffs, by way of replication (protesting that the defendant did not use due care in selecting proper persons, &c.; and that the loss of the letter, &c., did not happen without the knowledge, consent and authority of the defendant), say, &c., that the letter, &c., regularly arrived at the post-office of the defendant on the 1st of August, 1806, and were received by him, and ought to have been sent on or caused to have been sent on by him on that day in the mail, &c., which regularly arrived at Petersburgh, and that he did not do so; and did not use due care and diligence in re-mailing and forwarding the same, and did delay and detain the same unduly, negligently and improperly, whereby the same have been lost, &c., without this, that the loss of the said letter, &c., was caused or produced by any act without the control, knowledge or authority of the defendant in his office, and which, by using due and reasonable diligence in his said office, he could not have prevented. And this they are ready to verify, &c.

To this replication the defendant demurred.

*To the latter part of the 13th plea, [255 as pleaded to the 2d, 4th, 6th, 7th and 8th counts, the plaintiffs demurred.

14. The 14th plea was to the same counts, and was the same in substance as the 13th; and the plaintiffs demurred to it as a plea to the 2d, 4th, 6th, 7th and 8th counts, and replied to it as a plea to the 5th and 9th counts; to which replication the defendant demurred.

15. The 15th plea was to the same counts as the 13th plea, and was like it, except that it averred that if there was any error or omission, &c., it was without the defendant's knowledge and consent, and without any fraud, or wilful, or gross negligence of any person by him employed.

To this plea were the same replication and demurrer as to the 13th.

16. The 16th plea was to the 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th counts, and, after protesting as in the 13th plea, and admitting that the letter, &c., were not duly re-mailed and sent on by the mail of the 1st of August as it ought to have been, avers that it was sent on by the next mail, which left Washington on the 3d of August, and after departing from the post-office at Washington, and being entirely without the care and custody of the defendant, and of every person employed in his post-office, were taken and embezzled by some person or persons as yet undiscovered and unknown, and so lost to the plaintiffs without any participation, connivance, procurement, consent, or knowledge of the defendant, or of any person employed or entrusted in his post-office.

To this plea as pleaded to the 2d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th counts the plaintiffs demurred; and as pleaded to the 8th and 9th counts they replied in substance that by reasonable care and diligence the letter, &c., might have been sent on by the mail of the 1st of August, and was not, and that the loss happened thereby; and concluded to the country.

To this replication the defendant demurred.

*17. The 17th plea was to the 2d, [256 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th counts, and was like the 16th plea in all respects, except that it concluded with the following traverse, viz.: "Without this, that the loss of the said letter "and bank notes aforesaid was caused or pro- "duced by reason of the same not having been "re-mailed and sent on, as aforesaid, in the "mail of the 1st of August, as aforesaid, ac- "cording to the Postmaster-General's instruc- "tions as aforesaid, instead of having been "delayed for the next succeeding mail of the "3d of the same August as aforesaid, and re- "mailed and sent on in that mail as aforesaid."

On this plea as pleaded to the 9th count, the plaintiff took issue upon the traverse, and demurred to the plea as pleaded to all the other counts.

18. The 18th plea was to the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th counts, and, after protesting as in the 13th plea, averred, that according to the duly-established regulations of the post-office, and the instructions of the Postmaster-General in the declaration mentioned, and then in full force, all letters, &c., put into the post-office at Philadelphia directed to Petersburgh, ought to have been put up in a separate and distinct mail, directed to Petersburgh, which mail ought to have been sent on through the several intermediate post-offices, from Philadelphia to Petersburgh, and which, according to the regulations and instructions aforesaid could not have been properly opened either at the post-office in Washington, nor at any other intermediate post-office on the route from Philadelphia to Petersburgh, for any purpose whatever; and no such letters, &c., ought, according to the said regulations and instructions, to have been put up and sent on in any mail, which, according to the direction of the same, and the said regulations and instructions, could have been properly opened at the post-office in Washington to be there distributed and re-mailed previous to being sent on and forwarded to Petersburgh; and that the letter, &c., ought not to have been put up and sent on from the post-office at Philadelphia in any mail to be opened, distributed and re-mailed at the post-office at Washington, but in a separate and distinct mail, directed to Petersburgh, and to be sent on through the post-office at Washington, 257] *without being there opened, distributed or re-mailed. Whereas the said letter, &c., was not, &c., but together with all the other letters sent by the same post, and directed and destined for Petersburgh, was, contrary to the said regulations, &c., sent on from Philadelphia in a mail, which, according to the direction of the same, and the said regulations, &c., was to be opened at the post-office in Washington for the purpose of being distributed and re-mailed, &c.; and the defendant says that if the said letter, &c., had been put up in a distinct and separate mail directed to Petersburgh, it would have been duly sent on in the mail of the 1st of August, and so the delay was occasioned by the erroneous and irregular manner in which the letter was put up and sent on from Philadelphia, and not by the negligence, carelessness or misconduct of the defendant in his office: "without this that the said letter was put and forwarded in the mail at and from Philadelphia, and delivered at the said post-office in Washington in any other manner than as aforesaid, and this he is ready to verify," &c.

To this plea, as pleaded to the 5th count, the plaintiffs demurred; and as pleaded to the other counts, they replied, and (after protesting that the postmaster at Philadelphia was not bound to send on the letter in a separate mail directed to Petersburgh, &c., and protesting that the loss of the letter or the delay, &c., was not occasioned by the supposed erroneous manner in which it was put up and sent on from Philadelphia) for replication said, that the letter, &c., was put up and forwarded by the postmaster at Philadelphia, according to the said instructions of the Postmaster-General, in a mail addressed "Southern," containing the letters addressed to places in Virginia, and was thereafter duly and regularly placed in the post-office in Washington on the 1st of August to be re-mailed and sent on in the mail of that day, and that the delay and loss were not occasioned by any error or irregularity in the manner in which it was put up and sent on from Philadelphia, but was occasioned by the want of due and reasonable care and diligence in the performance of the duties of the post-office at Washington on the 1st of August; and concluded to the country.

*To this replication the defendant [258 demurred.

All the demurrers were decided by the court below in favor of the plaintiffs.

Upon the trial of the issues of fact the plaintiffs took seven bills of exception.

1. The first bill of exception stated that the plaintiffs offered evidence to the jury that the defendant was deputy-postmaster at the city of Washington from the 1st of January, 1806, until the time of trial, and had under his management and direction the affairs and business of the post-office at that place; and the plaintiffs produced and read to the jury the printed instructions of the Postmaster-General of the United States; and proved by a witness that those were the instructions delivered to the defendant for his government in the duties of his office as deputy-postmaster in the city of Washington. The plaintiffs further produced to the jury evidence that they had $2,000 in bank notes in the hands of Walker and Kennedy, merchants at Philadelphia, and that that sum of money, in bank notes, was inclosed in a sealed letter and directed to the plaintiffs, at Petersburgh, in Virginia, the place of their residence, and put into the post-office at Philadelphia, and was by the postmaster at that place forwarded in the mail addressed to the state of Virginia on the 31st of July, 1806. That it arrived in due course of post at the post-office, in the city of Washington, under the care and management of the defendant. That it was the duty of the office at Washington, as a distributing office, to open the said mail so addressed, and to forward to Petersburgh in Virginia the said letter according to its address. That the said letter was lost and never arrived at the post-office in Petersburgh nor came to the hands of the plaintiffs, and that the same was demanded of the defendant, who denied he was liable for it. It was admitted that the course of conveying the mail from Philadelphia to Petersburgh is as follows: The Virginia mail, tied with a string and wrapped in papers, is, with many other mails similarly secured, inclosed in a locked portmanteau, and sent by stage to the city of Washington, distant 144 miles. No person or post-office between Philadelphia and Washington is legally authorized *to [259 open the mail addressed to Virginia; but the portmanteau is unlocked and opened at the Baltimore post-office, and the various mails are there taken out of the portmanteau, in order to select the Baltimore mail. When the mail arrives at the post-office in Washington the mail addressed to Virginia is opened in said office as a distributing office, and the letters addressed to Petersburgh assorted, tied and wrapped as aforesaid, and put into a mail addressed to the post-office at Petersburgh. The said Petersburgh mail so tied and wrapped is, with many other mails, put into the portmanteau, which is locked and opened on the route only at Fredericksburgh and Richmond. But the said Petersburgh mail, wrapped in paper and tied with a string as aforesaid, though it may properly be taken out of the portmantcau with the other mails at Fredericksburgh and Richmond as aforesaid, cannot be legally opened at any office betwcen Washington aud Petcrsburgh. Whereupon the plaintiffs' counsel prayed thc court to instruct thc jury, that if they should find the above facts to be true the plaintiffs were entitled to recover iu this case on their 2d count, unless the defendaut should prove the said letter to have been forwarded from his office in the time and mauner prescribed by law and the said instructions of the Postmaster-General; which opinion the court refused to give.

2. The 2d bill of exceptions stated the same facts, aud that thereupou the plaintiffs' counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they should find those facts to be true, then the plaintiffs wcre cntitled to recover in this case upon their 4th and 5th counts, unless the plaintiff should provc the said letter to have been forwarded from his office in reasonable time, and in the manner prescribed by law and the instructions of the Postmaster-Geueral; which instruction the court refused to give.

3. The 3d bill of exeeption stated, that, in addition to thc above facts, the plaintiffs offercd evidence, under the issues joined on the 6th and 10th pleas, to prove that the letter and bank notes were lost by the negligence and carelessness of Henry Whetcroft and William Hewitt, sworu clerks and assistants employcd by the defendant in his said post-office; and also certain 260] acts *of omission, undue delay and detention of the said letter and bank notes by such clerks and assistants of the defendant; to the competency of which evidenee to support the issues joincd on the 6th and 10th pleas on the part of plaintiffs, the defendant objccted; and the court was of opinion that under those issues such evidence was incompetent, and refused to suffer the same to be given to thc jury under thosc issues; and instructcd the jury that the dcfendant was not liable under those issues for any acts or omissions of his said clerks and assistants; to which rcfusal and opinion the plaintiffs excepted.

4. The 4th bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiffs offered evidence of the facts stated in their 5th and 8th counts, aud moved the court to instruct the jury that if they should believe from the evidence that the letter and bank notes were duly deliverod into the defendant's post-office, then it was incumbent on the defendant to prove that the same were duly forwarded. And if the jury should further believe that the same were not so forwarded and had become lost, then it was incumbent on the defendant to prove that the same werc not lost by any undue negligence or unreasonable detention of himself or any person employed by him in his office; which instruction the court refused to give, but instructed them that if the jury should believe from the evidence that the letter and bank notes were duly delivered into the defeudant's office, then it was incumbent on the defendant to prove that the same were duly forwarded; and if the jury should further believe that the samc were so delivcred and were not so forwarded, aud had become lost in consequence thereof, then it was incumbent on the defendant to prove that the same were not lost by any undue negligence and unreasonable detention of himself or any other person employed by him in his office. To which refusal the plaintiffs excepted.

5. The 5th bill of exceptions stated, iu addition to the facts before stated, that the plaiutiffs offered in evidence a copy of a post-bill from Philadelphia, of the 31st of July, 1806, (showing that a letter whose postage was one dollar and 20 cents, corrcsponding with the postage upon the letter in question, was charged in the post-bill from Philadclphia to the state of Virginia,) *and offcred to prove [261 that the post-bill, of which it was a copy, was received at thc defendant's post-office with letters in the mail from Philadelphia. And the defendant offered evidence to prove that it never was the custom, until after the report of thc loss of the letter and bank notes in question, for the actual contents of the mails, scnt to the said office for distribution, to be compared with the contents noted iu the accompanying post-bills; except that it was customary to examine the column of paid letters in order to see whether as many paid letters, and of the same amount of postage, came on in the mail; that this was done because the deputy-postmaster had to account to the Postmaster-General for all letters sent on from his office and marked paid; whether originally put into his office, or coming there in mails for distribution; and according to the routine of office, any deficiency, appearing on the arrival of the mail, in the amount of postage marked in his post-bill as "paid," would be chargeable to him; that in no other respect was any atteution paid, or notice taken, whether the actual contents of the mail, as to any letters not marked " paid," corresponded, or not, with the post-bill. That if, by accident, any variance between the post-bill and the actual contents of the mail received for distribution, was discovercd, it would never be noted in the office, inasmuch as the printed forms, furnished to the defendant and other deputy-postmasters, from the Postmaster-Geueral for the account of mails for distribution, contained no columu for noting letters either overcharged, or undercharged, or misseut, such as are to be found in the form furnished for account of mails for delivery, and marked No. 1, in the schedule annexed to the instructions of 1804.

Whereupon the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the copy of the post-bill produced was a true copy of the post-bill sent on from Philadelphia to the Washington Post-Office, and that the same was rceeived with letters in thc mail from Philadelphia at the defendant's office, then the jury ought to presume that the letters accompanying the said post-bill corresponded therewith, unless the defendant should prove the contrary; which instruction the court refused to give as prayed, but instructed the jury that it is competent for them, from *those circumstances, so to presume, [262 and to decide upon the force of such presumption from all the circumstances proved in the case; to which refusal and instruction the plaintiffs excepted.

6. The 6th exception was to thc refusal of the court to suffer a witness to be asked whether the printed general instructions from the Postmaster-General given to the deputy-postmasters in 1804, superseded those before given to the postmaster in Philadelphia in 1800; both instructions having been produced and read in evidence to the jury.

7. The 7th bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiffs offered evidence to "prove the several allegations in the said declaration; and "further offered in the evidence the several "printed instructions of the Postmaster-General (thereto annexed) and also the desposi- "tions (thereto annexed and which tended to "prove the delivery of the letter and bank "notes into the post-office at Philadelphia, and "their arrival at the post-office in Washington). "And the defendant offered evidence to prove "that Petersburgh, ever since the 1st of November, 1804, was a distributing post-office as "established by the said instructions; that after "the said instructions it was the practice of "post-offices (except that of Philadelphia), in "which letters were deposited for Petersburg, "to put the same up in a separate mail address- "ed to Petersburg, and not in the Virginia "state mail. That the Philadelphia Post- "Office, since the said 1st of August, 1806, and "not before, has adopted the same practice. "That the Virginia state mail above mentioned "contained the letters directed to the several "post-offices in Virginia, except Norfolk and "Richmond, and also the letters directed to the "states of Ohio and Kentucky; and that before "the letters for Petersburgh, contained in the "said mail, could be distributed and re-mailed, "it was necessary to assort and distribute the "whole contents of the said mail.

"The plaintiffs then moved the court to in- "struct the jury, that if they should believe "from the evidence, that the letter and the "bank notes in the declaration mentioned, were "put, at the post-office in Philadelphia, in a "bundle superscribed "Virginia state mails," 263] "and that it *had been, since the year "1800, and was the practice, in the said Phil- "adelphia post-office during the months of July "and August, 1806, to send letters for delivery "at Petersburg, Virginia, in that manner; and "that all letters in the Virginia state mail, for "Petersburgh, Virginia, brought to the de- "fendant's office, had been usually remailed, "distributed, and sent on from the post-office "kept by the defendant, to Petersburgh afore- "said; and should be further of opinion that "the said letter, containing the said bank notes, "was delivered in the said bundle superscrib- "ed "Virginia state mail," on the first day of "August, 1806, in the said office of the defend- "and, and in due time be re-mailed, distributed "and sent on by the defendant on the first day "of August, 1806, from his aforesaid office, in "a bundle addressed to Petersburgh, Virginia, "then it was the duty of the said defendant to "have re-mailed, distributed, and sent on the "said letter by the mail which left the Wash- "ington post-office on the said first day of Au- "gust, 1806; and if they further believe that "this was not so done, or caused to be done by "the said defendant, that it is incumbent on "the defendant to make out a just, reasonable "and sufficient excuse for the omission," which instruction the court refused to give as prayed; and the plaintiffs excepted.

The act of Congress of March 2d, 1799, (vol. 4, p., 505), establishes a general post-office at the seat of government of the United States, under the directions of a postmaster-general; and enacts that he shall establish post-offices, and appoint postmasters at all such places, as shall appear to him expedient, on the post-roads that are or may be established by law. And that he shall give the postmasters instructions relative to their duty; and shall obtain from them their accounts and vouchers, &c., once in three months, &c. That all persons employed in the care of the mails shall take an oath faithfully to perform the duties required of them, and abstain from everything forbidden by the laws in relation to the establishment of the post-office and post-roads within the United States. That every postmaster shall keep an office in which one or more persons shall attend at such hours as the Postmaster-General shall direct, for the purpose of performing the duties thereof, and all letters brought to any post-office half *an hour before the time of making up [264 the mail of such office, shall be forwarded therein; except at such post-offices where, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, it requires more time for making up the mail, and which he shall accordingly prescribe; but this shall in no case exceed one hour.

That if any person employed in any of the departments of the general post-office shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter with which he shall be entrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note, &c., he shall, on conviction, be publicly whipped not exceeding forty stripes, and be imprisoned not exceeding ten years.

That the Postmaster-General be authorized to allow to the postmasters, respectively, such commission on the moneys arising from the postages, as shall be adequate to their respective services and expenses; not exceeding, &c.

The instructions of the Postmaster-General, issued, in pursuance of this act, to the postmasters in 1804, required that every person employed in a post-office as assistant or clerk should take the oath, and send a certificate thereof to the general post-office. That every postmaster should be responsible "for the care "and fidelity of every person so employed." That "the postmasters at distributing offices "are to distribute and re-mail all letters and "packages before the departure of the mail, "and on no account delay them a single post."

The verdict and judgment of the court below being for the defendant, the plaintiffs brought their writ of error.

F. S. Key and C. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

The 3d bill of exceptions brings into view the question, whether the negligence of the defendant's clerks can be given in evidence to prove an allegation of negligence of the defendant himself; which necessarily involves the question whether the defendant is liable for the negligence of his clerks. This bill of exceptions *arose upon the issues joined on [265 the 6th and 10th pleas. The 6th plea was, that the letter was not lost by the negligence or misconduct of the defendant in his office; and the 10th was, that the defendant had not negligently or improperly delayed or detained the letter in the office.

The law in respect to the liability of the Postmaster-General is admitted to be the same here as it is stated in Ld. le Despencer's case (Cowp., 754), to be in England. But the opinion of Lord Mansfield, in that case, clearly shows that the action lies in the present. In the case of Brucker v. Fromont (6 T. R., 659), it is decided that a declaration which charges the defendant with negligence, is supported by proof of the negligence of his servant. Where the negligence is in a post-office, it is scarcely possible, in any case, for a plaintiff to know exactly to which of the persons, employed in the office, the negligence is to be attributed. If, as the court below decided, the defendant is liable for the negligence of his clerks, it seems to be immaterial whether the declaration state the neglect to be on the part of the defendant or of his clerks; or state it in the alternative. A collector of the revenue is liable for his deputies, although they are sworn officers. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury is not liable for the collectors. So the marshal is liable for his deputies, who are also sworn officers, and who give bond for the faithful discharge of their duty. Why should there be a difference in the case of a postmaster?

The 4th exception is, that the court refused to instruct the jury, that proof of negligence and loss raised a presumption that the loss was a consequence of the negligence, unless the contrary be shown. Or, in other words, the court below decided, that proof of negligence and loss did not throw the burden of proof on the defendant, to show that the loss was not a consequence of the negligence. To oblige the plaintiffs to prove that the loss was a consequence of that negligence, was to impose upon them an impossibility in the nature of things.

The 5th exception is to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, that they ought to 266*] infer that the contents *of the mail from Philadelphia corresponded with the post-bill when it was received at the Washington office, unless the defendant should prove the contrary.

What a jury may infer from the facts proved, is a question of law for the court to decide. And what a jury may thus infer, they are bound in law to infer, unless the contrary be proved. The court, therefore, ought not to have left the matter entirely to the jury, but to have given the instructions thus prayed.

Presumptions are inferences of law. Thus, from long possession, the court will instruct the jury that they ought to presume a deed. So, from evidence of payment of the last ten years' rent, the jury ought to presume all the former rents were paid. So in trover, from evidence of a demand and refusal, the jury ought to presume a conversion. So, if stolen goods are found in possession of a man, the jury ought to presume that he stole them, unless the contrary be shown.

The 7th exception raises the question whether the defendant was not bound to re-mail and send on the letter, according to law, and the instructions of the Postmaster-General, although the mail arrived at his office in an irregular manner.

Upon this point the 5th section of the post-office law (vol. 4, p. 507), and the instructions, are decisive. These instructions being given in conformity with the law, become part thereof, and are equally binding.

Jones and Morsell, contra.

All the questions in this case are resolved into one, viz.: On which side was the burden of proof in certain stages of the trial? All the exceptions are grounded upon the idea, that it was only necessary for the plaintiffs to show negligence in the office, and a loss of the letter, without showing that the loss was a consequence of the negligence.

We admit that the defendant is liable for any loss happening by his own negligence, but we deny that he *is liable for that [267 of his clerks. The act of Congress requires that the defendant should employ clerks, and that they should be sworn, and imposes specific penalties upon each person employed in the office for his own misconduct. They are all public officers, and liable to be charged ex delictu officii. The postmaster is only bound to use due care and circumspection in selecting proper clerks. He is not like a common carrier, who receives hire in proportion to the risk, and the value of the article. He has only a compensation for his trouble in the office. The liability of a master arises from his supposed assent, arising from the fact that the servant is employed for the benefit of the master. But here the clerk does not act for the postmaster, but for the public. The servant must be employed in the business of the master and for his benefit, or the latter will not be liable.

JOHNSON, J. It has never been attempted to assimilate him to a common carrier. He has nothing to do with the carrying of the mail.

JONES. It is decided in England, that the Postmaster-General in England is not liable for his deputies. (Lane v. Cotton, 1 Ld. Ray., 647; 1 Salk., 17.)

The instructions from our Postmaster-General to the postmasters, that they should be liable for their deputies or clerk, &c., only means that they shall be liable in accounting with him officially for the revenue. He could not make them liable to individuals.

In the case of Rowning v. Goodchild (2 W. Bl., 906; 3 Wils., 443), the principal question was, whether the postmaster was bound to send out the letters to the inhabitants; but a question incidentally arose whether the action, which was brought against the deputy-postmaster, should not have been brought against the Postmaster-General. The court, however, was of opinion, that in all cases, deputies are answerable for their own personal misfeasance, such as detaining the letter in question. And in that case the deputies were made, by act of parliament, ex necessitate rei, substantive officers, and their duty pointed out as such.

But if the defendant was liable for the default of his *clerks, yet the declaration [268 ought to have shown, whether the defendant was called upon to account for his own negligence, or that of his clerks. The case of Brucker v. Fromont (6 T. R. 659), was reluctantly decided upon the authority of Turberville v. Stampe (Ld. Ray., 264), but which does not support the case of Brucker v. Fromont, which is evidently against principle; and at all events is confined to the case of master and servant. In the following cases, a discrimination is made in the declaration between the act of the master and that of his servants. (Turner v. Hawkins,

1 Bos. & Pull., 472; Ogle v. Barnes, 8 T.R., 188; Savignac v. Roome, 6 T. R., 125.)

Presumptions arising from circumstantial evidence are always to be left to the jury. Such a positive inference as will justify the court in directing the jury, that they ought to make it, can arise only from some solemn act. In the present case there was other evidence, showing that no such inference could be drawn as the plaintiffs had supposed; and therefore the court did right to leave the whole to the jury.

The 7th exception required the court to say, that the defendant was bound to send on the letter on the 1st of August, or to show a reasonable excuse for not sending it on, although the mail was made up in an irregular manner in Philadelphia. The idea of reasonable diligence is excluded, and it supposes the defendant bound at all events to send the letter on by that mail, or to give a sufficient excuse for not doing so, although he sent it by the next mail, and although the loss was not the consequence of not sending it on the 1st of August.

The defendant was not bound to show that he sent it on; it would be impossible in the course of the business of the office to prove the sending on of every particular letter. Sworn officers are presumed to have done their duty, until the contrary is proved. (3 East., Williams v. E. I. Company.

March 14th. All the judges being present,

JOHNSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

269*] *It is necessary to dissipate the cloud of pleading in which this case is enveloped, in order to form a distinct idea of the questions intended to be brought to the view of the court below.

The object is to charge the postmaster with the loss of money sent by mail; and the points, which the exceptions are intended to make, are, how far he is liable for his own act or neglect, how far for the acts or neglect of his assistants, and what evidence shall be sufficient to support the plaintiff's action.

But unfortunately, as not unfrequently happens in this complex and injudicious mode of conducting a suit, with all the clerical skill displayed by counsel in multiplying their counts and pointing their bills of exceptions, the principal questions are really, at last, not brought to the view of this court.

On the first and second exceptions it is unnecessary to make any remark, as they are admitted to apply to counts which the evidence did not support, and have been, in fact, abandoned.

The third exception is intended to raise the question how far a postmaster is liable for the neglect of his assistants; but, connected with the pleadings, it presents another and a very different question, to wit, whether, when the issue is taken upon the neglect of the postmaster himself, it is competent to give in evidence, neglect in the assistant acting under him. Now, the distinction between the relation of a postmaster to his sworn assistant acting under him, and between master and servant generally, has long been settled; and although the latter relation might sanction the admission of such evidence, we are unanimously of opinion that, if it is intended to charge a postmaster for the negligence of his assistants, the pleadings must be made up according to the case; and his liability then will only result from his own neglect in not properly superintending the discharge of their duties in his office.

In the fourth exception, the only difference between the opinion prayed for and that given, is, that the court require the loss to be a consequence of not forwarding *the letter [270 described in the declaration. Now, in justice to the correctness of the plaintiffs' counsel, this court hope that they meant nothing more than what the court conceded; for, certainly, if the loss was not a consequence of the state of things made out in the evidence, they were not entitled to recover.

On the fifth exception it is only necessary to remark, that if the court below erred at all, it was in conceding too much to the prayer of the plaintiff. An entry on the post-bill is by no means conclusive evidence of the transmission of a letter, for, it may still never have been put into the mail, or may have been stolen in its passage.

The sixth exception is equally untenable. The instructions of the Postmaster-General spoke for themselves. If the one superseded or rescinded the other, the evidence was to be sought for by comparing them together.

And the seventh exception affords the court an opportunity to remark how much more conducive to the purposes of justice it would be to substitute special verdicts, and demurrers to evidence, for the tedious and embarrassing practice of the court from which this case comes up. It is a fact that this bill of exceptions claims a right of recovery without stating any loss or damage whatever. The opinion prayed for was, that if the jury believed the various facts therein detailed, then it is incumbent on the defendant to make out a just, reasonable and sufficient excuse for omitting to forward the letter described. But, unless an individual has sustained some loss or damage by an omission of that kind, why should the postmaster be held to make out a defense? Each bill of exceptions must be considered as presenting a distinct, substantive case; and it is on the evidence stated in itself alone that the court is to decide. We cannot go beyond it and collect other facts which must have been in the mind of the party, and the insertion of which in this bill of exceptions could alone have sanctioned the opinion as prayed for.

Upon the whole, the judgment below must be affirmed.

*HEZEKIAH WOOD [*271
v.
JOHN DAVIS AND OTHERS.

Present—All the Judges.

A verdict and judgment that the mother was born free is not conclusive evidence of the freedom of her children, unless between the same parties or privies.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington.

The defendants in error, John Davis and others, were children of Susan Davis, a mulatto woman, who had obtained a judgment for her freedom in a suit which she had brought against Caleb Swanu, to whom she had been sold by Wood, the plaintiff in error.

The petition of the children stated that their mother, Susan Davis, had obtained a judgment for her freedom upon the ground that she was born free. The issue was joined upon the question whether the petitioners were entitled to their freedom.

Upon the trial of this issue, in the court below, the plaintiff in error, Wood, tendered a bill of exceptions which stated that it was admitted that the petitioners were the children of Susan Davis; and they produced the record of the judgment in favor of their mother, Susan Davis, against Caleb Swann, (in which case her petition stated that she was born free, being descended from a white woman; and the issue joined was upon the question whether she was free or a slave.) And it was admitted that Susan Davis had been sold by Wood to Swann before the judgment; whereupon the petitioners, by their counsel, prayed the court to direct the jury, that the record aforesaid and the matters so admitted were conclusive evidence for the petitioners in this cause; and the Court directed the jury as prayed; to which direction the defendant, Wood, excepted.

F. S. Key, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That Wood was not a party, nor privy to any party, to the suit of Susan Davis against 272] Swann, and *is, therefore, not concluded by the judgment in that case; and,

2. That the judgment was only proof that Susan Davis was free at the time of the judgment; not that she was born free; and therefore it did not appear that she was free at the time of the birth of the petitioners. She might have been manumitted after the birth of her children, and so entitled to her freedom at the time of the judgment, and yet the petitioners might remain slaves. The only issue ever joined in Maryland (under the laws of which state this case was tried) upon a petition for freedom, is, whether the petitioner be free at the time of issue joined—not whether she were born free. (2. Harris's Entries, 530). It is immaterial what title is set out in the petition. The petitioner is not confined to it, but may, on the trial, show any other title to freedom—the practice in Maryland is merely to state in the petition that the petitioner is entitled to freedom and is holden as a slave. The act of assembly of Maryland, of 1796, directs that the jury shall be charged to determine those allegations in the petition which may be controverted. The only allegation controverted is that the petitioner is free.

DUVAL, J., stated that in all the petitions which he filed in Maryland, in the cases of the Shorters, the Thomases, the Bostons, and many others, he always stated their title at large, tracing it up to a free white woman; and after judgment in those cases, the courts always held, that the subsequent petitioners who claimed under the same title, were only bound to prove their descent.

C. Lee, contra.

The issue in Susan Davis's case is, in fact, whether she was born free. And the case of Shelton v. Barbour (2 Wash. 64) shows that the verdict is conclusive as to all claiming under the same title. Wood's title was the same as Swann's, and that of the petitioners the same as that of Susan Davis.

F. S. Key, in reply.

Wood did not claim under Swann, but Swann claimed under Wood. There was no privity between them; *as to the children. [273 Swann could do nothing to injure Wood's title to them.

March 10th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., stated the opinion of the court to be, that the verdict and judgment in the case of Susan Davis against Swann, were not conclusive evidence in the present case. There was no privity between Swann and Wood; they were to be considered as perfectly distinct persons. Wood had a right to defend his own title, which he did not derive from Swann.

Judgment reversed.

MORGAN v. REINTZEL.

Present—All the Judges.

In a suit against the maker of a promissory note, by an indorser who has been obliged to take it up, the plaintiff must produce the note upon the trial.

The payment of the money by the indorser after protest, is a good consideration for an assumpsit on the part of the maker to pay the amount of the note with costs of protest.

The maker of a promissory note, payable to order, is, under the custom of merchants, liable to refund the amount of the note and costs of protest to an indorser who has been obliged to take up the note after protest.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Washington, in an action of assumpsit brought by Reintzel against Morgan upon a promissory note made by Morgan, payable to Reintzel, or order.

The declaration contained three counts: 1st. Upon the promissory note in the usual form under the statute of Anne; 2d. For money paid, laid out, and expended; and, 3d. The following special count, viz.:

"And whereas also afterwards, to wit, on," &c., "the said William Morgan, according to the custom and usage of merchants, made his certain note in writing, commonly called a promissory note, his own proper hand being thereto subscribed, bearing date on the day and year aforesaid (August 9th, 1809), by which said note the said William Morgan, sixty days after the date thereof, promised to pay to the said Anthony Reintzel, or order, five hundred dollars, without offset, value received; and then and there delivered the said note to the [274 said Anthony Reintzel; and the said Anthony Reintzel, to whom, or to whose order, the payment of the said sum of money, mentioned in the said note, was to be made, before the payment thereof or any part thereof, and before the time appointed by the said note for the payment thereof, that is to say, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, indorsed the said note, his own proper hand writing being thereto subscribed; by which said indorsement the said Anthony Reintzel ordered and appointed the contents of the said note to be paid to the president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, and then and there delivered the said note, so indorsed, to the said president, dircctors, and company of the bank of the United States, of which said indorsement, so made on the said note, the said William Morgan, afterwards, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, had notice; by reason whereof and also by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said William Morgan became liable for, and chargeable to pay to the said president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, the said sum of money mentioned in the said note, according to the tenor and effect thereof, and in consideration thereof assumed upon himself so to do. And the said Anthony Reintzel avers that the said William Morgan, although afterwards, to wit, on the 8th day of October, in the year eighteen hundred and nine, at the county aforesaid, he, the said William Morgan, was called upon by the said president, dircctors and company of the bank of the United States, and solemnly required to pay the sum of money in the said note mentioned, refused to pay the same; whereupon afterwards, upon the day and year last aforesaid, the said president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, having made no order concerning the payment thereof, protested the said note at the county aforesaid, according to the said usage and custom of merchants upon such non-payment; by reason whereof the said Anthony Reintzel, according to the usage and custom of merchants became liable to pay to the said president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, the contents of the said note, together with the interest and the damage which should accrue from the delay of payment thereof, and being so liable, afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid at the county 275] *aforesaid" (did) "pay to the said president, directors and company, the contents of the said note and the costs of protest thereon, whereof the said William Morgan afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid at the county aforesaid, had notice; by reason of the premises, and by force of the statute and usage and custom of merchants, the said William Morgan became liable to pay to the said Anthony Reintzel the said sum of money in the said note mentioned and the said costs of protest, and being so liable afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, upon himself assumed and to the said Anthony Reintzel then and there faithfully promised to pay the same when he should be thereunto afterwards required; and which said costs of protest and the said sum of money in the said note mentioned amount unto the sum of five hundred and two dollars and twenty-eight cents current money, whereof the said William Morgan afterwards, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the county aforesaid, had notice."

After a general verdict for the plaintiff in the court below, upon the issue of non assumpsit to all the counts, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment, and assigned as a reason therefor, that the last count in the declaration was bad. The court, however, overruled the motion and rendered judgment upon the verdict.

The defendant took out a writ of error; and the cause was now submitted to this court by F. S. Key for plaintiff in error, and Morsell for defendant, without argument.

March 13th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, observed that the court could see no error in the judgment.

The payment of the money by the plaintiff, under the circumstances stated in the count, was a sufficient consideration for the assumpsit.

The principal objection was that the count ought to have been founded upon the note, so as to oblige the plaintiff to produce it on the trial. But it states that *the note was [276 paid by the plaintiff; and the court thinks that the note must have been produced upon the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

WISE & LYNN v. THE COLUMBIAN TURNPIKE COMPANY.

Present—All the Judges.

Upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, this court has no jurisdiction if the sum awarded be less than 100 dollars, although a greater sum may have been originally claimed.

THE Columbian Turnpike Company obtained a rule upon the plaintiffs in error, Wise & Lynn, to show cause why this writ of error should not be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the matter in dispute being less than 100 dollars, and the writ of crror being to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

March 14. Upon the return of the rule, it appearing that the sum awarded was only 45 dollars, the court, all the judges being present, decided that they had no jurisdiction, although the sum claimed by Wise & Lynn, before the commissioners of the road, was more than 100 dollars.

Writ of error dismissed.

CALDWELL v. JACKSON.

Present—All the Judges.

Each party is liable to the clerk of this court for the fees due to him from each party respectively.

A copy of the record is not a part of the taxable costs of suit to be recovered by one party against the other; but the party who requests the copy, must pay the clerk for it.

CALDWELL, the clerk of this court, obtained a rule against Jackson, to show cause why an attachment should not issue for non-pay-277*] ment of his fees in the suit *of Winchester against Jackson, which had been dismissed on the motion of Jacksou, with costs, at a former term.

Milnor now showed cause, and contended, that Jackson was not liable to the clerk for his fees, inasmuch as Jacksou was the defendant in error, and the writ of error had been dismissed with costs. The clerk must look to the plaintiff in error for all the costs. The bill, which had been rendered, included the expense of a copy of the record, which is not regularly taxable as costs, and therefore the non-payment of that charge can be no ground for an attachment.

DUVALL, J. In Maryland, each party pays to the clerk his own fees; that is, the fees for those services which the clerk has performed for him; and the successful party recovers them from his antagonist. If either party requires copy of the record he must pay for it, as for auy other service performed; but it is uot a part of the costs which are to be taxed against the other party, as costs of suit.

March 13th. All the judges being present,

MARSHALL, Ch. J., stated the opinion of the court to be, that each party was liable to the clerk for his fees for services performed for such party; and it is immaterial to the clerk which party recovers judgment.

BLACKWELL v. PATTEN AND OTHERS.

A writ of error issued in September may bear teste of the February term preceding, and may be returnable to the next February term, notwithstanding the intervention of the August term between the teste and return of the writ.

JONES, for the defendants in error, moved this court to dismiss the writ of error, because it bore teste of February term, 1810, was issued in September, 1810, and was returnable to February term, 1811, whereas it ought to have been tested of August term, 1810. The plaintiff in error, aware of this objection, has sued out another writ of error, which stands on a subsequent part of the docket.

Campbell,* on the same side. August [*278 term is as much a term for teste and return of writs as February term. Suppose the writ bore teste ten years ago: it might as well be made returnable to February term, 1811, as this writ which bore teste of February term, 1810. If tested of February term, 1810, it ought to have been returnable to August term, 1810, and not to February term, 1811.

The appearance of the defendants in error only cures the want of a citation, not a fault in the writ of error itself.

The court refused to quash or dismiss the writ of error on account of the irregularity of its teste.

WALLEN v. WILLIAMS.

Present—All the Judges.

This court will not quash an execution issued by the court below to enforce its decree pending the writ of error, if the writ of error be not a supersedeas to the decree.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Tennessee, to reverse a decree in chancery. The court below had issued a writ of habere facias possessionem to enforce its decree. The writ of error was too late to be a supersedeas to the decree.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error, now moved to quash the writ of habere facias as irregular, and contended that the court below, sitting as a court of chancery, under the laws of Tennessee, could only enforce by execution decrees for the payment of money, and cited Tennessee Laws, Ed. 1807 (p. 158, § 2.)

P. B. Key, contra. This court has no jurisdictiou to quash an execution issued from the court below, and executed. But if this court had the power to do it, it would uot in its discretion quash a process which has merely carried into effect the decree of the court below. If the decree be reversed upon the merits, the execution *will be of no avail; but the [*279 court will not anticipate the merits upon such a motion.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The writ of error is to the original decree, which did not award this writ of habere facias. It was awarded by a subsequent order of the court, to which no writ of error issued.

TODD, J. The attachment to compel a performance of the decree was unavailing; and upon the return of it, the habere facias was issued iu conformity with the practice iu that state, as admitted by the counsel on both sides in the court below. It was ordered as a matter of course, and no objection was made. If this motion should prevail, it will make the writ of error operate as a supersedeas, contrary to the intention of the act of Congress.

Motion overruled.

M'KIM v. VOORHIES.

Present—All the Judges.

A state court has no jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment of the Circuit Court of the U. S.

THIS was a case certified from the Circuit Court for the District of Keutucky, in which the opinions of the judges were opposed.

At the July adjourned term of the court below, iu the year 1808, M'Kim, a citizen of Maryland, recovered a judgment in ejectment against Voorhies, a citizen of Kentucky, for the undivided third part of a water mill, with its appurtenances, in the county of Franklin, in the state of Kentucky. At the same time Voorhies filed his bill in chancery in the court below against M'Kim, and John Instone, a citizen of Kentucky, and Hayden Edwards, a citizen of South Carolina, claiming an equitable lien on the said third part of the mill, &c., on account of contracts, &c., between Bennett Pemberton (under whom Voorhies held the premises) and Hayden Edwards and John Instone; Pember-280*] ton having *sold the said third part of the mill, &c., to Edwards, who sold to Instone, who sold and conveyed to M'Kim. Instone was the only defendant served with process from the court below. M'Kim and Instone answered the bill, and brought on a motion to dissolve the injunctiou on the merits, which was overruled by the court below. At the term next preceding November term, 1810, (Edwards not having answered) the court below dismissed the suit as to him; and as to Instone, for want of jurisdiction; after which Voorhies had leave to discontinue as to M'Kim on payment of costs. The suit was accordingly discontinued. Previous to this disposition of the cause, Voorhies filed his bill in chancery against the same parties in the state Circuit Court for the county of Franklin, in the state of Kentucky, in which he set up the same equity as he charged in his bill in the court below. On this bill he, by an order from one of the circuit judges of the state, obtained an injunction, staying all further proceedings on the said judgment in ejectment, until the matters of the said bill were heard in equity. This injunction was dissolved at the July term of the Franklin Circuit Court; shortly after which the said injunction was reinstated by the order of the Honorable Caleb Wallace, one of the judges of the Court of Appeals of the state of Kentucky, issued under the act of the general assembly of that state, passed at their December session in the year 1807.

The injunction issued in the cause by the state court, and the order reinstating that injunction, were duly notified to the clerk of the court below, and official copies of each lodged in his office. On the third day of the session of the court below, at its November term, 1810, M'Kim, by his attorney, applied to the clerk of the court below for a writ of habere facias possessionem on the said judgment in ejectment, but the clerk refused to issue the writ in consequence of the injunction and orders aforesaid; whereupon M'Kim, by his counsel, moved the court below to instruct and order their clerk to issue a writ of habere facias possessionem, on the judgment of that court, the injunction and orders aforesaid notwithstanding. Upon this motion of the plaintiff, the opinions of the judges were opposed. The case was submitted by Har-
281*] per for the plaintiff, *without argument. There was no appearance for the defendant.

March 14th. All the judges being present,

TODD, J., stated the opinion of the court to be, that the state court had no jurisdiction to enjoin a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States; and that the court below should be ordered to issue the writ of habere facias.

BEATTY v. THE STATE OF MARYLAND.

Present—All the Judges.

A final account settled by an administrator with the Orphan's Court, is not conclusive evidence in his favor upon the issue of devastavit vel non.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Washington.

This was an action of debt brought at the instance and for the use of Thomas Corcoran against Thomas Beatty upon the administration bond of Mrs. Doyle, administratrix, with the will annexed, of Alexander Doyle. The defendant was one of her sureties in that bond. The defendant after oyer pleaded a special performance of every item in the condition of the bond. To which the plaintiff replied a judgment de bonis testatoris obtained by him, in May, 1799, against the administratrix, fieri facias upon that judgment and a return of nulla bona. The replication also avers that the administratrix had in her hands, at the time of the judgment, goods of her testator sufficient to satisfy the debt, but that she wasted them. The defendant took issue upon the devastavit.

Upon the trial of this issue, the defendant below took a bill of exceptions which stated, that the plaintiff offered in evidence the record of the judgment in May, 1799, against the administratrix for 357 dollars, and the fieri facias returned nulla bona. And also the inventory which she had exhibited to the Orphan's Court of Montgomery County, in Maryland, in January, 1795, *amounting to 3701*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, [282 Maryland currency, of which 200*l.* is stated in the inventory to be cash. Also an account of the administratrix with the estate of her testator, rendered by her to the Orphan's Court upon oath on the 17th of August, 1799, in which she charges herself with the sum of 1085*l.* in addition to the former inventory, making in the whole 4786*l.*, and claims credit for sums paid to other creditors whose claims were not entitled to preference, amounting to 3566*l.*, leaving a balance still in her hands of 1220*l.*, equal to 3253 dollars, and also a second account rendered by her upon oath to the Orphan's Court in November, 1799, charging herself with a further sum of assets to the amount of 463*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, in addition to the former balance, and claiming credit for 1607*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* paid to sundry creditors not entitled to preference, and still leaving a balance of 76*l.* in her hands to be administered. The defendant then offered in evidence a third account rendered by the administratrix to the Orphan's Court in 1801, in which she charges herself with the former balance of 76*l.* and claims allowance for payments and commissions to the amount of 123*l.*, leaving a balance in her favor of 47*l.* To this account, as well as to the two former, was annexed a certificate from the register of wills, that the administratrix made oath on the Holy Evangels of Almighty God, that the account was just and true as it stood stated, and that she had bona fide paid or secured to be paid the several sums for which she claimed an allowance, "which after due examination passed by order of court."

This account was offered as conclusive evidence for the defendant on the issue. But the court instructed the jury that it was not conclusive evidence in favor of the defendant upon that issue; and further at the request of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury that the said record of the judgment, the inventory and the two accounts of the administratrix offered in evidence on the part of the plaintiff were conclusive evidence in his favor to prove the devastavit on the part of the administratrix, to the amount of the plaintiff's claim; to which instructions of the court the defendant excepted, and the verdict and judgment being against him, he brought his writ of error.

283*] F. S. Key*, for the plaintiff in error.

The question is whether the final settlement of the administration account is conclusive.

If the court has a power to pass such an account—if it be a court of competent jurisdiction—its sentence is conclusive upon every other court. The sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court is conclusive in England, as to all matters within its jurisdiction. (Peake's Law of Ex., 69, 76, 78; Ambler, 760; 3 T. R., 125.)

The order of the court settling the account is a judicial, not a ministerial act.

Had the Orphan's Court power to settle and adjust the account?

By the act of assembly of Maryland, of February, 1777, (c. 8), which was in force at the time these letters of administration were granted, the orphan's courts had all the jurisdiction and authority which the Commissary-General had before.

By the act of 1715, (c. 39, sect. 2), the Commissary-General was to proceed according to the laws of England, and to hold his court once every two months. By the 3d section, he was to call all executors and administrators to exhibit inventories within three months, and render accounts within twelve months next after administration committed; and to enforce obedience by attachment for contempt. By the 7th and 18th sections, he is to transmit an account of the distribution to the county courts. By the 27th section there was an appeal to the governor from the sentence of the Commissary-General.

By the 34th section, the deputy-commissaries had power to pass, audit and allow all such accounts as should come before them "relating to dead men's estates," not exceeding 50*l.* provided there were no controversy thereon; but if any person claiming any interest in such estates should object to any articles of the account, the deputy-commissary was to send it, with all papers, &c., to the Commissary-Gen-

284*] eral, "before *whom all parties are to appear and defend their interest." By the 40th section, the Prerogative Court (which was the Commissary-General's court) had like authority in enforcing obedience to its process, orders, interlocutory sentences and decrees, as the High Court of Chancery had.

By the act of 1718, (c. 5), the person entitled to the residue of an estate may, after 12 months from the date of the letters of administration, sue "for such residuary part as shall appear to "be due by such accounts as shall then be made "up."

This jurisdiction over accounts appears also in the practice of the Commissary's Court, as stated in the Deputy-Commissary's Guide, (p. 45 to 49), which shows also that the settlement of the account by that court was always holden to be conclusive upon the county courts. In the Appendix (p. 198), is the form of a special commission to pass an account. It appears also that all the vouchers are to be surrendered and filed upon passing the account. This shows that it must be conclusive; for nothing could be more unjust than to oblige a man to be always ready to account and to support his account, after taking from him all his vouchers.

DUVALL, J.

The account was only binding upon the representatives of the estate, the distributees; and they might still open it in the general court. But the creditors are no parties to the settlement of the account, and cannot be bound by it.

There can be no doubt that the judgment against the administratrix, the inventory and two first accounts were conclusive evidence of a devastavit.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. I believe that is the law throughout the United States.

The court is unanimously of opinion that the settlement of the account by the Orphan's Court is not conclusive evidence for the defendant upon the issue joined.

Judgment affirmed.

*UNITED STATES v. JOHN TYLER.

[*285

Upon an indictment for putting goods on board a carriage, with intent to transport them out of the United States contrary to the act of Jan. 9, 1809, the punishment of which offense is a fine of four times the value of the goods, it is not necessary that the jury should find the value of the goods.

THIS case having been submitted without argument,

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follow:

The defendant was indicted under the act to enforce the embargo laws passed the 9th January, 1809, for loading on carriages, within the District of Vermont, nineteen barrels of pearl ashes, with intent to transport the same without the United States, to wit, into the province of Canada.

On a plea of not guilty, the jury returned the following written verdict, which was recorded:

"The jury find that the said John Tyler is "guilty of the charge alleged against him in "said indictment, and that the said potashes "were worth two hundred and eighty dollars."

The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, because the verdict was not sufficiently certain as to the value of the property charged in the indictment, the same having found the value of potashes, whereas the defendant was indicted for the intention of exporting pearl ashes.

Upon this motion, the judges being opposed in opinion, the same has been certified unto this court for its direction in the premises.

The law which creates this offense provides that the party shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and fined a sum by the court before which the conviction is had, equal to four times the value of the property so intended to be exported. The court, then, is of opinion that, under this law, no valuation by the jury was necessary to enable the Circuit Court to impose the proper fine; and, 286] therefore, *that that part of the verdict which is objected to, is regarded as surplusage, and cannot deprive the United States of the judgment to which they became entitled by the defendant's conviction of the offense laid in the indictment.

It must, accordingly, be certified to the court below, that it proceed to render judgment for the United States, on the verdict aforesaid.

Supreme Court of the United States.

THE UNITED STATES.

v.

GORDON, and Others.

Absent—Livingston, J. and Todd, J.

A writ of error does not lie to carry to the Supreme Court of the United States a civil cause which has been carried from the District Court to the Circuit Court by writ of error.

Semb.: It is a good defense to an action upon an embargo bond, that it was given for more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, and that the master was constrained to execute it by the refusal of a clearance.

THIS was an action of debt brought in the District Court of the United States for the District of Virginia, upon an embargo bond, dated the 2d of November, 1808, conditioned to re-land the cargo of the Essex, in some port of the United States, the danger of the seas only excepted.

The defendants, among other things, pleaded the following plea, viz.: "And the said defendants for further plea why the United States ought not to have and maintain the said action, say, that the said bond was given and executed for more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, mentioned in the recital and condition of the said bond, to wit, in a sum of eight thousand dollars more than double the said value; and the said last mentioned defendants aver that the obligors were constrained to execute the said bond by the refusal of the collector of the port of Tappahannock to clear and permit the said vessel and her cargo to depart from the port and district of Tappahannock until the same bond was executed as aforesaid, and this they are ready to verify," &c.

To this plea there was a general demurrer, which was overruled by the district judge 288*] (Tyler). The *United States carried the cause up to the Circuit Court by writ of error, where the judgment was affirmed by Marshall, C. J.

The United States brought another writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, which was dismissed for want of jurisdiction; upon the authority of the case of United States v. Goodwin at the last term.

BARTON v. PETIT AND BAYARD.

Absent—Johnson, J., and Todd, J.

If the original judgment be reversed, the reversal of the dependent judgment on the "forthcoming bond" follows, of course; but a special certiorari is necessary to bring up the execution upon which the bond was given so as to show the connection between the two judgments.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, on a judgment rendered on a bond (technically called in Virginia a "forthcoming bond") given to the marshal with condition to have certain goods forthcoming at the day of sale appointed by the marshal; being goods which he had seized under a fi. fa. issued upon a former judgment recovered by Petit and Bayard against Barton, which judgment was reversed at the last term of this court.

P. B. Key, for the plaintiff in error, contended; that the record of the former judgment being referred to in the condition of the bond, was to be considered as part of this record; and that the court could judicially take notice that it was the same which was reversed by this court at the last term, the transcript of which record now remains with the clerk of this court. But if the court could not judicially notice that fact, he moved for a certiorari to the clerk below to certify the record of the judgment on which the execution issued upon which the bond was given.

E. I. Lee and I. R. Ingersoll, contra, contended, that the former record was no part of the present record, and that the court could not judicially know it to be the same, and cited 4 Hen. and Mun. 293; 1 Wash. 94.

*February 11th. Washington, J., [*289 delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Virginia, rendered upon a bond given by the plaintiffs in error with condition for the delivery, at a certain time and place, of property seized by the marshal to satisfy an execution which had issued from the same court. The condition not having been complied with, this judgment was rendered upon motion and notice thereof duly served upon the obligors in the bond, agreeably to the laws of Virginia.

It is not pretended that there is any intrinsic error in this judgment to warrant its reversal; but it is contended that the reversal of the original judgment, upon which the proceedings in this record took place, requires necessarily the reversal of this judgment. The general doctrine is undeniably so; but the application of it to this case is not admitted. That the judgment in this record is dependent upon some other judgment is apparent from the bond which recites a prior execution and seizure, by the marshal, of the property mentioned in the condition, for the purpose of satisfying it; but it does not appear judicially to the court that the recited execution issued upon the identical judgment which has been reversed. The only difficulty which the court has felt has been to devise some proper mode in this, as well as in all similar cases which may hereafter arise, to connect with the original reversed judgment that which is asserted to be dependent upon it.

A certiorari upon a suggestion of diminution would not answer the purpose, as the proceedings in the original suit form no part of those in the subsequent suit; the only foundation of which are, the bond and notice. Neither does it appear regular for this court to receive as evidence of the dependency of the latter upon the former judgment, the certificate of the clerk of the Circuit Court.

The court has thought it best to direct a special writ to be framed applicable to cases of this nature, to be directed to the clerk of the court in which the judgments were rendered, 290] to certify under the seal of the *court, the execution recited in the bond on which the second judgment was rendered. This difficulty can never occur except in cases where all the proceedings in the original judgment, except the execution, are already before this court. The execution, therefore, though no part of either the original or dependent record, being certified by the proposed writ, will supply the only link necessary to prove the connection between the two judgments.

In this case, the court from the novelty of the practice necessary to be adopted, will not permit the plaintiff in error to suffer in consequence of his not having applied sooner for a writ of certiorari, but will now direct the same to issue. In future the party must take the consequences of his neglect, if he should fail to have the execution certified in time.

March 16th. WASHINGTON, J. The court has examined the execution which has been sent up by certiorari, and is satisfied that the judgment on which it issued is that which was reversed at the last term. The judgment, therefore, on the forthcoming bond must be reversed also.

Judgment reversed.

MIMA QUEEN AND CHILD, PETITIONERS FOR FREEDOM, v. HEPBURN.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

Hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which is, in its nature, susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge. Claims to freedom in Maryland are not exempt from that general rule.

After a juror is sworn no exception can be taken to him on account of his being an inhabitant of another county. If a juror be challenged for favor, and upon examination before the tryers, he declare that if the evidence should be equal he should give a verdict in favor of that party upon whom the burden of proof lies, the court in the exercise of a sound discretion ought to reject him, although the bias should not be so strong as to render it positively improper to allow him to be sworn.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington.

At the trial, several bills of exception were taken.

*1. The first was for the rejection [291 of part of the deposition of Caleb Clarke, who deposed to a fact respecting the ancestor of the petitioners which he had heard his mother say she had frequently heard from her father.

2. The second was for overruling part of the deposition of Freeders Ryland, which stated what he had heard Mary, the ancestor of the petitioners, say respecting her own place of birth and residence.

3. The third exception stated that after a juror was sworn the petitioners excepted to him because he was not an inhabitant of the county, but the court overruled the exception.

4. The fourth exception stated that a talisman being challenged for favor, and having, upon being questioned, avowed his detestation of slavery to be such that, in a doubtful case, he would find a verdict for the petitioners, and that he had so expressed himself with regard to this very case, and that if the testimony were equal he should certainly find a verdict for these petitioners: the court instructed the tryers that he did not stand indifferent between the parties.

5. The fifth exception was similar to the second.

6. The sixth exception stated that the petitioners, having read the deposition of R. Disney, stating that he had heard a report from divers persons respecting the manner of the importation of the ancestor of the petitioners, &c., the court instructed the jury that if they should believe from the evidence, that the existence of the report was not stated by the deponent of his own knowledge, but from what had been communicated to him respecting the existence of such a report many years after her importation, without its appearing by whom or in what manner the same was communicated to him, then the evidence is incompetent to prove either the existence of such report, or the truth of it.

F. S. Key, for the plaintiffs in error.

The principal exception is to the opinion of the court that in tracing a pedigree, the hearsay of hearsay is *not admissible. Ca- [292 leb Clarke's deposition, as to what he heard his mother say, was admitted, but, as to what he heard his mother say her father said, was rejected. If this opinion be correct it will be impossible to prove any ancient fact.

John Law, contra.

Hearsay is only admissible on the ground of necessity and antiquity. (1 Wash., 123; 2 Wash., 148.) There was no evidence of the death of the person whose declarations were given in evidence. Hearsay of hearsay is analogous to a copy of a copy. The witness ought at least to state from whom he heard the report.

Jones, on the same side.

Every claim to freedom ought to be supported by the same kind of evidence as is necessary to support other claims. There is no rule of law that exempts it from the general principles of evidence. In the present case the hearsay was not introduced to prove pedigree nor prescription, nor custom; but to prove that a certain ancestor came from England. It was the neglect of the parties that they did not urge their claim while they had legal evidence to support it. (5 T. R. 121, Outram v. Morewood.) Although a general right may be proved by traditionary evidence, a particular fact can not, except in tracing a pedigree. The admission of hearsay is an exception to the general rule of evidence, and therefore must be confined strictly to the excepted cases, which are prescription, custom and pedigree—cases in which the strength of the claim depends upon its antiquity. He who would use hearsay as evidence must first prove all the facts which would entitle him to use it, and must satisfy the court that better evidence cannot be had. The hearsay must be of such a fact as, if the person were living, could be given in evidence by him. Hearsay evidence of a general reputation of a fact is not admissible. The witness himself must know the fact of general reputation.

There are two objections to Disney's deposition: 1. That he does not state who informed him, so that it may be known whether that 293] person be living or not so *as himself to be a witness; and, 2. That a general reputation of a fact is not evidence.

Morsell, in reply.

The general rule of evidence is, that if the evidence offered be the best which the nature of the case admits, and leaves no presumption that there is better behind, it is admissible.

Such evidence as this is always admitted in the courts of Maryland, under whose laws this case was tried, and its use had been sanctioned by the authority of the highest court of that state. The case cited by the opposite counsel shows that it is admitted not only in cases of prescription, custom and pedigree, but in all cases of the like nature. So it has been received in settlement cases, in all cases of paupers, and in questions of ancient boundaries in ejectment. The evidence taken upon commissions to mark and bound lands, under the statute of Maryland, generally consists of testimony of this kind. (1 Harris and M'Henry's Reports, 84, 85.) After a lapse of 100 years better evidence than this cannot be expected. The general reputation of the fact that the ancestor was free is sufficient to rebut the presumption arising from color, and throws the burden of proof on the other side.

As to the admission of hearsay, he cited Peake's ev. 10 to 13, Id. Appendix, p. 18.

February 13th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was a suit instituted by the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court of the United States for the County of Washington, in which they claim freedom. On the trial of the issue certain depositions were offered by the plaintiffs, which were rejected by the court and exceptions were taken. The verdict and judgment being rendered for the defendants, the plaintiffs have brought the cause into this court by writ of error, and the case depends on the correctness of the several opinions given by the Circuit Court.

*The first opinion of the court to [294 which exception was taken was for the rejection of part of the deposition of Caleb Clarke, who deposed to a fact which he had heard his mother say she had frequently heard from her father.

The second exception is to the opinion overruling part of the deposition of Freeders Ryland, which stated what he had heard Mary, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, say respecting her own place of birth and residence.

The fifth exception is substantially the same with the second. The question is somewhat varied in form, and the testimony given by the defendant to which no exception was taken is recited, and the hearsay evidence is then offered as historical; but the court perceives no difference in law between the second and fifth exceptions.

The sixth exception is taken to an instruction given by the court to the jury on the motion of the counsel for the defendants. The plaintiffs had read the deposition of Richard Disney, who deposed that he had heard a great deal of talk about Mary Queen, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, and has heard divers persons say that Captain Larkin brought her into this country, and that she had a great many fine clothes, and that old William Chapman took her on shore once, and that nobody would buy her for some time, until at last James Carroll bought her.

Whereupon the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that if they find the existence of this report and noise was not stated by the witness from his knowledge, but from what had been communicated to him respecting the existence of such a report and noise many years after her importation, without its appearing by whom or in what manner the same was communicated to him, then the evidence is incompetent to prove either the existence of such report and noise or the truth of it; which instruction the court gave.

The plaintiffs also read the deposition of Thomas Warfield, who deposed that John Jiams, an inspector of tobacco, told him that Mary, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, *was [295 free, and was brought into this country by Captain Larkin, and was sold for seven years. The court instructed the jury that if they should be satisfied upon the evidence that these declarations of John Jiams were not derived from his own knowledge, but were founded on hearsay or report communicated to him many years after the importation and sale of the said Mary, without its appearing by whom or in what manner such communication was made to him; then his said declarations are not competent evidence in this cause. To these instructions the counsel for the plaintiffs excepted.

These several opinions of the court depend on one general principle; the decision of which determines them all. It is this: That hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which fact is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge.

However the feelings of the individual may be interested on the part of a person claiming freedom, the court cannot perceive any legal distinction between the assertion of this and of any other right, which will justify the application of a rule of evidence to cases of this description which would be inapplicable to general cases in which a right to property may be asserted. The rule, then, which the court shall establish in this cause will not, in its application, be confined to cases of this particular description, but will be extended to others where rights may depend on facts which happened many years past.

It was very justly observed by a great judge that "all questions upon the rules of evidence are of vast importance to all orders and degrees of men: our lives, our liberty, and our property are all concerned in the support of these rules, which have been matured by the wisdom of ages, and are now revered from their antiquity and the good sense in which they are founded."

One of these rules is, that "hearsay" evidence is in its own nature inadmissible. That this species of testimony supposes some better testimony which might be adduced in the particu-
296*] lar case, is not the sole ground *of its exclusion. Its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind of the existence of the fact, and the frauds which might be practiced under its cover, combine to support the rule that hearsay evidence is totally inadmissible.

To this rule there are some exceptions which are said to be as old as the rule itself. These are cases of pedigree, of prescription, of custom, and in some cases of boundary. There are also matters of general and public history which may be received without that full proof which is necessary for the establishment of a private fact.

It will be necessary only to examine the principles on which these exceptions are founded to satisfy the judgment that the same principles will not justify the admission of hearsay evidence to prove a specific fact, because the eye witnesses to that fact are dead. But if other cases standing on similar principles should arise, it may well be doubted whether justice and the general policy of the law would warrant the creation of new exceptions. The danger of admitting hearsay evidence is sufficient to admonish courts of justice against lightly yielding to the introduction of fresh exceptions to an old and well-established rule: the value of which is felt and acknowledged by all.

If the circumstance that the eye witnesses of any fact be dead should justify the introduction of testimony to establish that fact from hearsay, no man could feel safe in any property, a claim to which might be supported by proof so easily obtained.

This subject was very ably discussed in the case of The King against The Inhabitants of Eriswell, where the question related to the fact that a pauper had gained a residence, a fact which it was contended might be proved by hearsay evidence. In that case the court was divided, but it was afterwards determined that the evidence was inadmissible.

This court is of the same opinion.

The general rule comprehends the case, and the case is not within any exception heretofore 297*] recognized. *This court is not inclined to extend the exceptions further than they have already been carried.

There are other exceptions taken which appear on the record, but were not much relied upon in argument.

The third exception is to the qualification of one of the jurors. He was called as a talisman, and was stated to be an inhabitant of the county of Alexandria—not of Washington. The court decided that he was a proper juryman, and he was sworn. After his being sworn the objection was made by the plaintiff's counsel, and an exception was taken to the opinion of the court.

Whatever might have been the weight of this exception, if taken in time, the court cannot sustain it now. The exception ought to have been made before the juror was sworn.

The fourth exception also applies to an opinion given by the Circuit Court respecting the service of one of the persons summoned as a juror. James Reed, when called, was questioned, and appeared to have formed and expressed no opinion on the particular case; but on being further questioned, he avowed his detestation of slavery to be such that in a doubtful case he would find a verdict for the plaintiffs; and that he had so expressed himself with regard to this very cause. He added that if the testimony were equal he should certainly find a verdict for the plaintiffs. The court then instructed the triers that he did not stand indifferent between the parties. To this instruction an exception was taken.

It is certainly much to be desired that jurors should enter upon their duties with minds entirely free from every prejudice. Perhaps on general and public questions it is scarcely possible to avoid receiving some prepossessions, and where a private right depends on such a question the difficulty of obtaining jurors whose minds are entirely uninfluenced by opinions previously formed is undoubtedly considerable. Yet they ought to be superior to every exception, they ought to stand perfectly indifferent between the parties, and although the bias which was acknowledged in this case might not perhaps *have been so strong as to render it [298 positively improper to allow the juror to be sworn on the jury, yet it was desirable to submit the case to those who felt no bias either way; and therefore the court exercised a sound discretion in not permitting him to be sworn.

There is no error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court, and the judgment is affirmed.

DUVALL, J. The principal point in this case is upon the admissibility of hearsay evidence. The court below admitted hearsay evidence to prove the freedom of the ancestor from whom the petitioners claim, but refused to admit hearsay of hearsay. This court has decided that hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove that the ancestor from whom they claim was free. From this opinion I dissent.

In Maryland the law has been for many years settled that on a petition for freedom where the petitioner claims from an ancestor who has been dead for a great length of time, the issue may be proved by hearsay evidence, if the fact is of such antiquity that living testimony cannot be procured. Such was the opinion of the judges of the general court of Maryland, and their decision was affirmed by the unanimous opinion of the judges of the High Court of Appeals in the last resort, after full argument by the ablest counsel at the bar. I think the decision was correct. Hearsay evidence was admitted upon the same principle, upon which it is admitted to prove a custom, pedigree, and the boundaries of land; because from the antiquity of the transactions to which these subjects may have reference, it is impossible to produce living testimony. To exclude hearsay in such cases would leave the party interested without remedy. It was decided also that the issue could not be prejudiced by the neglect or omission of the ancestor. If the ancestor neglected to claim her right, the issue could not be bound by length of time, it being a natural inherent right. It appears to me that the reason for admitting hearsay evidence upon a question of freedom is much stronger than in cases of pedigree or in controversies relative to the 299] boundaries of land. It will be *universally admitted that the right to freedom is more important than the right of property.

And people of color from their helpless condition under the uncontrolled authority of a master, are entitled to all reasonable protection. A decision that hearsay evidence in such cases shall not be admitted, cuts up by the roots all claims of the kind, and puts a final end to them, unless the claim should arise from a fact of recent date, and such a case will seldom, perhaps never, occur.

THE BANK OF COLUMBIA
v.
PATTERSON'S Adm'r.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

Upon a special contract executed on the part of the plaintiff. Indebitatus assumpsit will lie for the price.

A simple contract is not merged in a sealed instrument, which merely recognizes the debt, and fixes the mode of ascertaining its amount.

Upon general counts, a special agreement executed may be given in evidence.

The recital of a prior, in a later agreement, after it has been executed, does not extinguish the former.

Wherever a corporation aggregate is acting within the scope of the legitimate purposes of its institution, all parol contracts made by its authorized agents are express promises of the corporation; and all duties imposed on them by law, and all benefits conferred at their request, raise implied promises, for the enforcement of which an action lies.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, brought by the defendant in error against the president, directors and company of the Bank of Columbia, in their corporate capacity. There were four counts only in the declaration.

1st. Indebitatus assumpsit, for matters properly chargeable in account. 2d. Indebitatus assumpsit, for work and labor done. 3d. Quantum meruit; and, 4th. Insimul computassent.

The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit, and a tender.

On the trial below, the defendant took three bills of exceptions.

The first stated, that the plaintiff read in evidence a sealed agreement, dated 10th December, 1807, between Patterson and a duly authorized committee of the directors of the bank, under their private seals. It recites, that a difference of opinion had arisen between *Patterson and the committee for build-[300 ing the new banking-house, as to certain work extra of an agreement made between Patterson and the said committee in 1804, and thereto annexed; whereupon it was agreed, that all the work done by Patterson should be measured and valued by two persons therein mentioned according to certain rates, called in Georgetown old prices, and the sum certified by them should be taken by both parties, in their settlement, as the amount thereof. It was also thereby agreed, that the out-houses, respecting which there had been no specific agreement, should be measured and valued by the same persons in the same manner. The agreement of 1804 referred to in, and annexed to the agreement of 1807, was also offered in evidence by the plaintiff, and states, that Patterson had agreed with the committee to do all the carpenter's work required, agreeably to the plan of the new bank, and states particularly the manner in which it was to be done; and that "in consideration of the work being done" as stated, the committee agreed to pay Patterson 3,625 dollars as full consideration; and that if, when the work should be finished, the committee should be of opinion that that sum was too much, Patterson agreed to have the work measured, at the expense of the bank, by two persons mutually appointed, who should take the old prices as the standard, and in case the bill of measurement did not amount to the sum of 3,625 dollars, Patterson agreed to take the amount of measurement, for full satisfaction. The plaintiff then read in evidence a paper of particulars of the work, certified by the persons named in the agreement of 1807. The defendants offered in evidence the plan of the building, and that it was built principally according to that plan, and the agreement, and that any work other than that stated in the plan and agreement, was to be charged separately as extra work, and that it was so charged by Patterson, before the 10th of December, 1807, the date of the second agreement, who presented the account (so charged) to the defendants, claiming the amount of the same, and claiming also for the work done under the agreement of 1804, the sum of 3,625 dollars, and proved, that while the work was going on, the defendants paid Patterson sundry large sums of money on account thereof.

*The court was thereupon prayed by [301 the defendants to instruct the jury, that if they believed that the agreement of 1804 was assented to by Patterson and the committee as binding between them, and that the work therein contracted for was done by Patterson, and that the sum of 3,625 dollars therein mentioned was claimed by him on account of the same, then the plaintiff could recover for no such work, but could only recover for the work done, extra of the said agreement; which instruction the court refused to give.

It was contended by the defendants' counsel,

Morsel & Key, that in that refusal the court below erred, because,

1. Although there were alterations in the building, after the agreement of 1804, yet Patterson was bound by that contract, as far as it could be traced, and could only recover for the extra work done under the counts of this declaration, which were all general. (1 Comyn on Contracts, 360; Peake's Cases, 103.)

2. Because the plaintiff was allowed to recover the value of certain work by measure and value, under the general counts, when he had contracted to do the said work for a certain stipulated price. (Esp. N. P., 138.)

The second bill of exceptions states, that the defendants, upon the same evidence, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover under any of the counts; which instruction the court refused to give, but declared that the evidence was competent.

In this refusal, it was contended that the court erred, because, the implied promise to pay for the extra work was merged in the agreement of 1807, and there was no count on that, or the other agreement of 1804. (2 T. R., 479; Foster v. Allanson.)

The third bill of exceptions states, that the defendants prayed the court to instruct the jury, upon the same evidence, that the plaintiff could not recover, unless he should prove that the defendants, after the measurement and valuation, expressly promised to pay the amount 302] *thereof to the plaintiff; and that the jury could not from the evidence offered, presume any such promise. This instruction the court also refused.

It was contended that the court erred in this refusal, because there was an express agreement under seal, relative to the work, and there was no count under that agreement.

It was also contended, that a corporation aggregate could not promise otherwise than under its seal, and therefore the law could not imply a promise.

In support of this proposition, the following cases were cited: Bac. Ab. 13. Tit. corporation; 4 Com. Dig. 258, Tit. Franchises; Bro. corporation, pl., 34; 1 Vent., 47; 1 Salk., 191; 1. Bl. Com. pt., 2; 1 Roll. Rep., 82; 3. P. Wms. 419, Rex v. Bigg.

Jones & C. Lee, contra, cited 5 Cranch, 61, Deveaux v. Bk. of U.S.; Doug., 526; and Kid. on corporations generally.

As to the form af action, viz., assumpsit and not covenant, they said the instruments were under the private seals of the committee, not the corporate seal. The declaration need not show whether the assumpsit be express or implied. (1 Chitty on pleading, 333, note II.)

Where the contract is executed general indebitatus assumpsit lies. (Fitzgibbon, 302; Bul. N. P., 139, Weaver v. Burrows; 1. Wil. 117. Alcorn v. Westbrook. Dennison's opinion; 4 Bos. & Pul., 330; 3 Bos. & Pul., 582; 6 East., 564, 569; 1 Sanders, 272, 276, note 2; Cowp. 284, 289; 9 East., 349; 1 T. R., 134; Doug. 24, Watson v. Downes; 4 Dall., 428.)

Several exceptions have been taken to the opinion of the court below, which will be considered in the order in which the objections arising out of them have been presented to us. We are sorry to say that the practice of filing numerous bills of exceptions is very inconvenient; *for all the points of law might [303 be brought before the court in a single bill, with a simplicity which would relieve the bar and the bench from every unnecessary embarrassment.

As the argument on the first exception has proceeded upon the ground that the agreement of 1804 was completely executed and performed, and the objection relates only to a supposed mistake in the form of the declaration, it will at present be considered in this view. And we take it to be incontrovertibly settled, that indebitatus assumpsit will lie to recover the stipulated price due on a special contract, not under seal, where the contract has been completely executed; and that it is not in such case necessary to declare upon the special agreement. (Gordon v. Martin, Fitzgibbon, 303; Musson v. Price, 4 East., 147; Cook v. Munstone, 4 Bos, & Pul., 351; Clarke v. Gray; 6 East., 564, 569; 3 Saund. 350, note 2.) In the case before the court, we have no doubt that indebitatus assumpsit was a proper form of action to recover, as well for the work done under the contract of 1804 as for the extra work. It may, therefore, safely be admitted (as is contended by the plaintiff in error), that where there is a special agreement for building a house, and some alterations or additions are made, the special agreement shall notwithstanding be considered as subsisting so far as it can be traced. (Pepper v. Burland, Peake's Rep. 103.) The first exception, therefore, wholly fails.

Under the second exception, the plaintiff in error has made various objections.

1. The first is, that though a promise would be implied by law, for the extra work against the corporation, yet that such promise was extinguished, by operation of law, by the provisions of the sealed contract of 1807. It is undoubtedly true that a security under seal extinguishes a simple contract debt, because it is of a higher nature. (Cro. Car., 415; Raym., 449; 2 Jones, 158; 1 Burr, 9; 5 Com. Dig. tit. Pleader, 2. G. 12.) But this effect never has been attributed to a sealed instrument which merely recognizes an existing debt, and provides a mode to ascertain its amount and liquidation. At most, the sealed agreement of 1807 could not be *construed to extend [304 beyond this import. In no sense could it be considered as a higher security for the money originally due. This objection, therefore, cannot prevail, even supposing that the agreement were the deed of the corporation.

2. A second objection is, that the special agreements, connected with the certificates of admeasurement, were inadmissible evidence under the general counts, and could be admissible only under counts framed on the special agreements.

To this objection an answer has already, in part, been given. And we would further observe, that if the agreements connected with the admeasurements were the means of ascertaining the value of the work, the evidence was pertinent under every count. (2 Saund. 122, note 2.) And if the certificates of admeasurement were of the nature of an award, they were clearly admissible under the insimul computasent count. (Keen v. Batshore, 1 Esp. Rep., 194.)

3. Another objection is, that as the agreement of 1807 is sealed, and is connected, by reference with the prior agrcement, they are to bc construed as one sealed instrument, and assumpsit will not lie upon an instrument under seal.

The foundation of this objection utterly fails, for the agreement is not under the seal of the corporation, but the seals of the committee; and if it were otherwise, it is too plain for argument, that the origiual agrcement was not extinguished, but referred to, as a subsistiug agreement. It is quite impossible to contend that the mere recital of a prior, in a later agrecmeut, after it has been executed, extinguishes the forner.

Two other objections are made under this exception; but as they are answered in the preceding observations, it is unnecessary to notice them farther.

Under the third exception, the only objections relied on are in principle the same as the objections urged under the former exceptions, and they admit the same answers.

305*] *The case has thus been considered all along, as though the contracts were made between the plaintiff's administrator and the corporation, and indeed some points in the argument have proceeded upon this ground. It is very clear, however, that neither the first nor second agreements were made by the corporation, but by the committee in their own names.

In consideration of the work being done, the committee, and not the corporation, personally and expressly agree to pay the stipulated price. A qucstion has therefore occurred how far the corporation were capable of contracting, except under their corporatc seal; and if it were eapable, as no special agreement is found in the case, how far the facts proved, show an express or an implied contract on the part of the corporation.

Anciently it seems to have been held that corporations could not do anything without deed. (13 H. 8, 12; 4 H. 7, 6; 7 H. 7, 9.)

Afterwards the rule seems to have been relaxed, and they were, for convcniency's sake, permitted to act in ordinary matters without deed; as to retain a servant, cook, or butler (Plow. 91. b; 3 Saund. 305), and gradually this relaxation widened to embrace other objects. (Bro. Corp., 51; 1. Salk., 192; 3 Id. 103; 3. Lev., 107; Moore, 512.) At length it seems to have been established that though they could uot contract directly, except under their corporate seal, yet they might by mere vote or other corporate act, not under their corporate seal, appoint an agent, whose acts and contracts, within the scope of his authority, would be binding on the corporation, Rex v. Bigg, (3 P. Wms., 419); and courts of equity, in this respect seeming to follow the law, have decreed a specific performance of an agreement made by a major part of a corporation, and entered in the corporation books, although not under the corporate seal. (1. Fonb. 305, Phil. ed. notc o.) The sole ground upon which such an agreement can bc enforced, must be the capacity of the corporation to make an unsealed contract.

As it is couceded, in the present case, that the committec were fully authorized to make agreements, there could then bc no doubt that a contract made by them in the name of the corporation, and not in their own names, would *have been binding on the corpora- [306 tion. As, however, the committee did not so contract, if the principles of law on this subject stopped here, there would be no remedy for the plaintiff, except against the committee.

The technical doctrine, that a corporation could not contract, except under its seal, or, in other words, could not make a promise, if it ever had been fully settled, must have been productive of great mischiefs. Indeed, as soon as the doctrine was established that its regularly appointed agent could contract in their name without seal, it was impossible to support it; for otherwise the party who trusted such contract would bc without remedy against the corporation. Accordingly it would seem to be a sound rule of law, that wherever a corporation is acting within the scope of the legitimate purposes of its institution, all parol contracts made by its authorized agents are express promises of the corporation; and all duties imposed on them by law, and all benefits conferred at their request, raise implied promises, for the enforcement of which an action may well lie. And it seems to the court, that adjudged cases fully support the position. (Bank of England v. Moffat, 3 Bro. Ch. Rep., 262; Rex v. Bank of England, Doug., 524, and note ibidem; Gray v. Portland Bank, 3 Mass. Rcp., 364; Worcester Turnpike Corporation v. Willard, 5 Mass. Rep., 80; Gilmore v. Pope, 5 Mass. Rep., 491; Andover & Medford Turnpike Corporation v. Gould, 6 Mass. Rep., 40.)

In the case before the court, these principles assume a peculiar importance. The act incorporating the Bank of Columbia (act of Maryland, 1793, ch., 30) contains no cxpress provision authorizing the corporation to make contracts. And it follows, that upon principles of the common law, it might contract under its corporate seal. No power is directly given to issue notes not under seal. The corporation is made capable to have, purchasc, receive, enjoy and retain, lands, tcnements, hereditaments, goods, chattels and effects, of what kind, nature, or quality, soever, and the same to scll, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of—and the board of directors are authorized to determine the manner of doing business, and the rules and forms to be pursued; to appoint and pay the various officers, and dispose of *the money or credit of [307 the bank, in the common course of banking, for the interest and benefit of the proprictors. Unless, therefore, a corporation, not expressly authorized, may make a promise, it might be a serious question how far the bank notes of this bank were legally binding upon the corporation, and how far a depositor in the bank could possess a legal remedy for his property confided to the good faith of the corporation. In respect to insurauce companies also, it would be a difficult question to decidc whether the law would cuable a party to recover back a premium, the consideration of which had totally failed. Public policy, therefore, as well as law, in the judgment of the court, fully justifies the doctrine which we have endeavored to establish. Indeed the opposite doctrine, if it were yielded to, is so purely technical, that it could answer no salutary purpose, and would almost universally contravene the public convenience. Where authorities do not irresistibly require an acquiescence in such technical nicetics, the court feel no disposition to extend their influence.

Let us now consider what is the evidence in this case, from which the jury might legally infer an express, or an implied promise of the corporation. The contracts were for the exclusive use and benefit of the corporation, and made by their agents for purposes authorized by their charter. The corporation proceed, on the faith of those contracts, to pay money from time to time to the plaintiff's intestate. Although, then, an action might have laid against the committee personally, upon their express contract, yet as the whole benefit resulted to the corporation, it seems to the court that from this evidence the jury might legally infer that the corporation had adopted the contracts of the committee, and had voted to pay the whole sum which should become due under the contracts, and that the plaintiff's intestate had accepted their engagement. As to the extra work, respecting which there was no specific agreement, the evidence was yet more strong to bind the corporation.

In every way of considering the case, it appears to the court that there was no error in the court below, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

308*] *CLARK'S EXECUTORS v. CARRINGTON.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

In a case of warranty and indemnity, a judgment against the person to be indemnified, if fairly obtained, especially if obtained on notice to the warrantor, is admissible evidence in a suit against him on his contract of indemnity.

A person who upon receiving an assignment of a share of property as security for debt, agrees to comply with the contract of the assignor with a joint owner of the property, is bound to fulfill that contract although it exceed in amount the value of the share of the property transferred to him.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, in an action of assumpsit brought by Carrington against Clark in his lifetime, and prosecuted against his executors, after his decease, to recover from them five-ninths of the amount of a judgment recovered by Smith & Co., of Hamburgh, against Carrington upon a claim against him jointly with Greene & Barker, and J. C. Nightingale, Carrington having paid the whole.

The declaration contained the usual money counts, and several counts upon a special undertaking by Clark to comply with the contract between Greene & Barker and Carrington, which contract was averred to be to pay all debts contracted by Carrington with Smith & Co. on account of the owners of the ship Abigail, in the proportion in which they are interested therein; the owners being Greene & Barker for five-ninths. J. C. Nightingale for two and an half ninths, and Carrington for one and an half ninths; Clark having received from Greene & Barker, who had become insolvent, an assignment of their share in the ship and cargo; and Carrington having paid over to Clark, five-ninths of the proceeds thereof.

A bill of exceptions was taken to the opinion of the court below, and to the admission in evidence of a letter from Clark to Smith & Co. of the 30th of June, 1800, and of a letter from Greene & Barker, to Smith & Co., of the 12th of July, 1800, and of the writ, proceedings and judgment, in the suit of Smith & Co. against Greene & Barker, J. C. Nightingale and Carrington.

The letter of 30th June, 1800, from Clark to Smith & Co. says: "This will be handed to "you by Mr. Edward Carrington, who goes "supercargo of the ship Abigail, of which he "is a part owner in company with Messrs. "Greene & Barker and John C. Nightingale. "*They have concluded to send their [*309 "ship on freight to your city, where, having no "correspondent, I do myself the pleasure of "recommending them to your notice. Mr. "Carrington proposes continuing in the ship, "and it is probable will require your advice "and assistance in the voyage which he intends "carrying into execution. I have ever found "these gentlemen persons of strict integrity, "and I doubt not will punctually fulfill any "engagements they may enter into with you."

The letter of the 12th of July, 1800, from Greene & Barker to Smith & Co., is as follows:

"NEW YORK, 12th July, 1800.

"Messrs. George Smith & Co.:

"Gentlemen—By the recommendation of "our mutual friend, Mr. John Innes Clark, of "Providence, we are induced to make an ac- "quaintance with your house, and we have ac- "cordingly recommended Mr. Edward Carring- "ton, supercargo of the ship Abigail (of which "he, together with Mr. John C. Nightingale "and ourselves are owners), to call on you for "the necessary aid he may require while in "your city. We have opened our plans of "a voyage for the Abigail to your Mr. Adam- "son, which he doubts not you will readily "coincide with, and render Mr. Carrington the "necessary aid he may require. We shall con- "sider ourselves responsible for all contracts "which Mr. Carrington may make in the busi- "ness of this ship, and anticipate the pleasure "of your being well satisfied with his strict "fulfillment of them. We have handed your "Mr. Adamson bills of lading for a parcel of "dye-wood, shipped in the Abigail with an "order to get one thousand pounds sterling in- "sured on her cargo and freight, and shall draw "on you in consequence for seven hundred and "fifty pounds sterling.

"We are, your most obedient servants,

"GREENE & BARKER.

"Please effect the above insurance, if not "already done.

"WM. ADAMSON."

*The record of the proceedings in [*310 the suit of Smith & Co. v. Carrington and others, was objected to because Clark was not a party to it. But it was proved that Clark had a power of attorney from Carrington, who was in Canton, and conducted the defense of that suit in his behalf.

The evidence principally relied on by the plaintiff in support of his action was a letter from Clark to him of the 16th of March, 1801, written at Providence. That part of the letter which relates to the subject is as follows:

"Mr. Edward Carrington:

"Dear Sir—Since your departure from hence, "our friends, Messrs. Greene & Barker, have "been so unfortunate as to reduce them to the ne- "cessity of compromising with their creditors. "In order to secure me for the indorsements I "have made in their behalf, they have conveyed "to me two-thirds of the ship Abigail, with her "appurtenances, also five-sixths of two-thirds "of the cargo. Situated as this business is, I "have to recommend your making the utmost "dispatch in your sales and proceeding imme- "diately for this place, with such articles as "you shall receive in return for the sales of "your outward cargo, submitting the articles "entirely to your judgment; but I recommend "that you leave no part of the property behind "you, if it can possibly be avoided. With re- "spect to the ship, notwithstanding I have a "bill of sale from Greene & Barker of two- "thirds, I shall view you (if you return here "with her) as the owner of such proportion as "agreed upon between you and them, and I "give you my word that you shall receive from "me every aid and support in settling the busi- "ness to mutual satisfaction, that is in my "power. Mr. John Corlis, who has undertaken "to conduct the business for Mr. John C. "Nightingale, writes you by this opportunity, "and will assure you in his behalf of one-sixth "of one-third from him—that is to say, to make "you an owner in the whole ship Abigail and "appurtenances of one complete sixth, and the "same proportion in the cargo, and Greene & "Barker's contract with you, shall in every 311*] "respect be fully complied *with, the "same as it would have been done with them, "had they continued owners."

The answer of Carrington to this letter was as follows:

"Havanna, April 22d, 1801.

"John Innes Clark, Esq.:

"Sir—Triplicate your letter of 16th March, was handed me this day, original and duplicate having not appeared. Your letter gives me the first advice of our friends, Messrs. Greene & Barker's, misfortunes by the fire, and am very sorry that they have been obliged to dispose of the Abigail and her cargo under their present situation of a bottomry to Messrs. Geo. Smith & Co. at Hamburg. But I presume and doubt not Messrs. Greene & Barker have acquainted you with the exact situation of them, and have only disposed to you of that part of the ship and cargo that may remain after the bottomry bond is settled and discharged.

"In consequence of the capture and detention of part of the cargo and bad condition of the ship, I have been unable to return direct to Hamburg, and obliged to make up a voyage for Providence, and have advised Messrs. Greene & Barker with particulars and desired them to cause insurance to be made thereon. I shall leave here this day and join the ship and hope to be at sea in a day or two. Should the voyage meet no other further disappointment, I flatter myself that after settling the accounts of the adventure, it will turn to some advantage and leave a considerable balance due Messrs. G. & B., and beg to assure you that everything that is consistent and within my duty in this business I shall give the strictest attention and consult you therein.

I am, with esteem and respect,

Your obedient servant,

EDW. CARRINGTON."

Carrington, while at Hamburg, in order to procure a cargo for the ship, had obtained credit with Smith *& Co. to a large amount [312 upon the hypothecation of the ship by a bottomry bond, and upon agreeing to return to Hamburg with a cargo; for which purpose he engaged Smith & Co. to procure insurance to be made in a large sum upon his return voyage. The premium on this insurance constituted a considerable part of the debt due to Smith & Co., upon which they recovered judgment against Carrington as before stated. One of the grounds of defense taken by Clark's executors was that Carrington had neglected to give notice to Smith & Co. of the dereliction of the return voyage in due time to save that premium of insurance, and therefore he alone ought to suffer by it. The judge, in the court below, in charging the jury (as the manner is in Rhode Island), said: "Great blame is attempted to be "thrown on Mr. Carrington for not giving "notice to George Smith & Co. that he had "changed his voyage so as to prevent the in- "surance being made from Havanna to Ham- "burg; and the defendants say that for his "neglect in not giving such timely notice, he "ought alone to pay the whole of that premium; "of this you will judge." The judge also said: "I conceive the case to be clear, that as Greene "& Barker were interested five-ninths in the "voyage, they were bound to indemnify Mr. "Carrington in the same proportion for the "damage he should sustain by the contract with "George Smith & Co." And again he says: "If Mr. Clark received from Mr. Carrington "more than five-ninths of the surplus after pay- "ing the company's debts, and Mr. Carrington "has since been obliged to pay those debts, Mr. "Clark is bound to refund his proportion.".

The judge finally concludes his charge in this manner:

"Having gone through the case at great "length and conceiving it on the whole to rest "principally on questions of law, I will give "you my opinion explicitly upon them, so that "if your verdict should be against the defend- "ants, they may have an opportunity to bring "the cause before the Supreme Court.

"I conceive that Mr. Clark's letter bearing "date March 16, 1801, at Providence, and "directed to Mr. Carrington, at Havanna, and "received by him 22d of *April, 1801, [313 "taken in connection with the other evidence "in the case, ought to be considered as a letter "of guaranty, and binding Mr. Clark to pay "five-ninth parts of the debt due to George "Smith & Co., as ascertained by the judgment "in their favor against Mr. Carrington.

"I am also of opinion that Mr. Clark, having "received of Mr. Carrington a large sum of "money, under and by virtue of the assign- "ment from Greene & Barker of their interest "in the ship Abigail and cargo, was bound, "under the circumstances of this case, as made "out and established by the evidence, to refund "the same, or so much thereof as would amount "to five-ninth parts of the debt due to George "Smith & Co. What sum Mr. Clark received "is a question of fact proper for you to decide."

The verdict and judgment being against the defendants, they sued out their writ of error.

C. Lee, for plaintiffs in error.

The bill of exceptions is,

1. To the admission of improper evidence; and,

2. To the judge's opinion as to the effect of that evidence.

1. As to the admission of improper evidence. The letter of the 30th of June was irrelevant and could have no effect upon the present case. The letter of 12th of July, 1800, from Greene & Barker to George Smith & Co., was improper evidence in the case, because it was between other parties. Clark had no knowledge of such a letter when he agreed to comply with the contract of Greene & Barker with Carrington. The record of proceedings in the case of Smith and others v. Carrington was inadmissible because Clark was not party or privy to that cause.

2. As to the opinion of the judge upon the effect of the evidence.

314*] *The letter of 16th of March, 1801, did not bind Clark to pay any money to George Smith & Co. It was intended only to bind only Clark to permit Carrington to have one-sixth of the ship and cargo according to the contract between him and Greene & Barker. The engagement of Clark was also upon a condition precedent, viz., that Carrington should return with the ship to Providence; which condition he never performed. It was very important to Clark to get possession of the ship, and he therefore annexed the condition to his promise that the ship should be brought to his place of residencc. There is no evidence that Clark knew of any other contract between Greene & Barker and Carrington than the agreement that he should have one-sixth of the ship. The judge ought not to have left it to the jury to decide whether the conduct of Carrington, in not bringing the vessel to Providence, was satisfactory to Clark, as a compliance with the condition of his promise; but ought to have told the jury that the condition had not been performed, and therefore Clark was not bound by his promise.

The judge also erred in directing the jury that the letter of the 16th of March ought to be considered as a letter of guarranty, and binding Clark to pay five-ninth parts of the judgment recovered by Smith & Co. v. Carrington. That judgment may include items for which Greene & Barker were not liable to reimburse Carrington. He erred also in directing the jury that the special counts were supported by the evidence, and that the plaintiff might, upon the money counts, recover less than the proportion of the judgment of Smith & Co.

Carrington had no equitable claim on Clark. Clark was not liable at all unless he was bound by the letter of 16th March. As to the premium of insurance upon the return voyage from Havana to Hamburgh, which constituted a great part of the claim of Smith & Co. against Carrington upon which their judgment was founded, it was an expense which arose solely from the neglect of Carrington to give due notice to Smith & Co. of his relinquishment of the return voyage, and thererefore Carrington could not have recovered any part of it from Greene & Barker; and the judge ought to have instructed the jury accordingly.

*Clark was a creditor of Greene & [315 Barker, and had as much equity as any other creditor. He took the bill of sale without notice of any prior equity. Clark, by accepting the bill of sale, could not be considered as a partner, nor liable for any transactions prior to his interest in the ship and cargo. If Greene & Barker had never paid for the ship and had become insolvent, Clark could not have been held liable to the vendor. There was no lien on the vessel or cargo. An assignee is not a partner. There is no partnership without an agreement. (1 H. Bl., 37, 48; Watson on Part., 21, 67; 3 Bos. and Pul., 288, Parker v. Parker; 289, Chapman v. Cross.)

Stockton, contra.

Upon every principle of law and justice this judgment ought to be affirmed. The suit was by one joint owner to recover of another joint owner a proportion of a joint debt recovered against the plaintiff. The verdict of the jury has settled all the questions of fact. There is no error in the form of the charge given by the judge to the jury.

1. As to the points of law arising in the case. The charge given by the judge to the jury regards two subjects: 1. That the letter of the 16th of March was, in connection with the other evidence, a guaranty for five-ninths of the debt due to Smith & Co.; and, 2. That Clark, having received upon his five-ninths of the ship and cargo more than his proportion, ought to refund.

1. As to the letter of 16th of March. It clearly binds Clark to do, in regard to that ship and cargo, and to the adventure, whatever Greene & Barker would have been bound to perform had they continued owners. There cannot be a doubt that Greene & Barker, as joint owners with Carrington, would have been bound to reimburse to Carrington five-ninths of the debt due to Smith & Co., which Carrington had been compelled to pay. It is clear also that Clark understood his liability as going to that extent. This is to be inferred from his silence as to the letter of the 22d of April, 1801, which Carrington wrote to him in reply to his of the 16th of March; from the sanction which Clark gave to the subsequent voyage to London by his *letter of 15th of May, 1802; from [316 his having charged himself in account with five-ninths of the outfit for that voyage; from his having joined in another adventure as to part of the cargo left at Guadaloupe; from his letter of the 9th of July, 1801; from his having conducted the defense of the suit of Smith & Co. against Carrington; from his affidavit made to obtain a continuance of that suit; and finally, by agreeing to refer this cause to arbitrators to ascertain the amount for which the judgment should be rendered, thereby admitting a good cause of action against him.

If all the part owners are not named in a suit, and if those who are named do not plead that fact in abatement, and judgment be obtained against them, they may compel the others to contribute. (Abbot, 71, § 13, first London edition; 2 Bos. and Pul., 268, 270; 1 East., 30.)

But Clark was liable as a joint owner, independent of the express undertaking contained in his letter of the 16th of March. And even if he is to be considered as the mere assignee of Greene & Barker, he must stand in their place and take their interest cum oncre. No person claiming under a partner, or joint owner, can claim more than such partner or joint owner could have claimed, if he had not assigned his interest. (Cowper, 449, Fox v. Hanbury.)

2. The second opinion of the judge was, that if Clark had received the proceeds of five-ninths of the ship and cargo, he was bound to refund five-ninths of the debt which Carrington had paid to Smith & Co., and that Carrington had a right to recover the same in this suit upon the money counts. In this opinion also he was correct.

If a person has received money, which by subsequent events he ought in equity and justice to refund, it is money had and received for the use of the plaintiff. He might also in this case recover on the count for money paid, laid out and expended for the use of the defendant. He paid the whole of the joint debt of which the defendants ought to have paid five-ninths.

The plaintiff was also entitled to recover on the special count. The only question, on the 317] point of pleading, *is whether the contract in the letter be materially variant from the count. The only variance alleged is in regard to the bringing of the ship to Providence; but the count is as general as the letter. The only question, then, is whether the return of the vessel to Providence was a condition precedent of the contract contained in the letter. The word "here" is satisfied if the vessel came into the United States. This was a question properly submitted to the jury. Could it mean that the plaintiff was bound at his peril and at all events, to bring the vessel into Providence? Shall nothing excuse him? capture? nor tempest? nor the clear interest of the concern?

As a partner, and especially as husband of the ship, he had a discretion to act for the common benefit of all concerned. (Abbot, 58, 59.) The condition was substantially performed. If not, it was dispensed with by Clark. Time and place are not of the essence of the contract. If a horse be sold to be delivered at a certain place on a certain day, and the purchaser, before the day, receive the horse at another place, the contract is fulfilled. Clark made no objection to the delivery of the ship at Norfolk, but agreed to a new voyage from thence to London, and received the proceeds of that voyage without objection. He is bound by his acquiescence.

Then as to the admission of evidence.

1. It is objected that the record of the case of Smith & Co. v. Carrington ought not to have been admitted in evidence, because it was res inter alios acta.

This objection admits of three answers:

1. It does not apply to this case because Clark, although not an ostensible party, was a party in interest. Where the parties are substantially the same, the record is evidence. (Gill., 35, Doug., 517, Kinnersly v. Small; 4 Dall., 120.)

2. The 2d answer is that this is either a case of indemnity or warranty; and there is a privity between the person indemnified and the person indemnifying. The root of the principle is found in the common law doctrine of warranty. If the party were called to warrant, *the [318 judgment was conclusive against him; and when the writ of warrantia charta yielded to covenant the same principle applied. (4 Reeves, 167.) Where a person indemnified gives notice to the person indemnifying that a suit is brought against him, the judgment is conclusive against the latter in a suit by the former against him for indemnity. (3 T. R., 374, Duffield v. Scott; 1 Johnson, 517, Blandsdell v. Glasscock.) So, in an action of covenant on sale of land the plaintiff must show an eviction, which he can only do by the record of the suit against him. (6 Johnson, 158.)

The principle of res inter alios acta never applies to a case of indemnity. Clark not only had notice, but actually defended the suit.

3. The 3d answer is that a judgment ascertaining a precise fact, character or privilege, is always evidence, whenever that fact, character or privilege comes in question between other parties. (2 Strange, 1109; 5 Bur., 2601; 1 Bur., 146; 9 Mod., 66.)

It is objected also that the letter from Clark to Smith & Co., of 30th of June, 1800, was irrelevant, and therefore ought not to have been read in evidence. But it clearly refers to the subject matter. It is also said that the letter from Greene & Barker to Smith & Co. was a letter between others, and ought not to have been admitted as evidence against Clark. But it was a letter from those under whom Clark claims, and by whose acts he is bound, so far as those acts relate to the property assigned to him. It was also evidence of the engagements of Greene & Barker, which Clark had undertaken to perform.

But it is said that Carrington ought not to recover, because the loss of the premium upon the insurance was owing to his negligence in not giving earlier notice of the alteration of the voyage. The answer is, that this was a matter left to the jury and properly in issue between the parties. There is no evidence of negligence in the record.

Hunter, on the same side.

The letter of the 16th of March was in itself a guaranty. *And all the acts of [319 Clark show that such was his understanding of it.

The judgment of Smith & Co. v. Carrington was admitted only as evidence of the amount recovered. All the cases on this subject are collected in the American edition of Peak's Law of Evidence (p. 45,47.)

As to the count for money had and received. This was money paid by mistake, in supposing that the debt claimed by Smith & Co. could not be recovered. Or it was a case of trust, Clark having received the money upon the understanding that he would pay his proportion of whatever Smith & Co. might recover.

The premium of insurance was paid by Smith & Co. before it was possible that they could have received notice of the change of the voyage.

If Carrington was an agent, his acts have been sanctioned by Clark. If he was guilty of misconduct, Clark has waived it.

The agent is discharged if the principal adopt his acts. (1 N. Y., T. R., 323, Lyle v. Clason; 1 N. Y., T. R., 526, Codwise v. Hacker; Johnson's cases in error, 110, Towle v. Stephenson.)

Jones, in reply.

The real question is whether Clark made himself liable for the debts of his debtors, Greene & Barker. The whole expedition resulted in loss. It is not probable that Clark meant to take all the risks of the voyages which Carrington might have undertaken under his agreement with Greene & Barker. In order to make Clark a partner the evidence must be very clear. But here was no account of stock taken, no ascertainment of debts, &c., all of which precautions would be taken by a prudent man before he engaged in a copartnership. Clark was merely an assignee of the property, and the account rendered shows that he took Greene & Barker's share at a certain price. Clark could not be liable for any losses which happened before the assignment. He was never considered as a partner either by 320] *himself or by any of the other parties. He was only considered as an assignee for his own security. Carrington gave up the property to Clark without any engagement on his part to pay the debts of the concern, showing thereby his construction of the nature of the assignment to Clark. There is no evidence to support the counts for money had and received, and for money paid, laid out and expended. Nor did the evidence support the special counts. They do not state the condition that the property was to be delivered at Providence, nor do they aver a delivery anywhere.

The record in the case of Smith & Co. v. Carrington, was admitted in evidence without any preparatory evidence to show its connection with this case. The declaration was general and extensive. The account filed did not show the cause of action.

Community of interest does not authorize the admission of a record in evidence. There must be either privity of estate or of title. Clark did not claim either under Carrington or Smith & Co.

All the cases of warranty cited apply to land or specific property, where the title to the thing was in question. They are exceptions to the general rule. The case in 3 T. R. is a case of indemnity against actions, and came on upon demurrer. But if it had come on before the jury, the plaintiff must have shown that it was a suit for a debt against which he was to be indemnified. (1 Esp. Rep., 162.)

The other cases cited are of public rights—such as common, prescription, custom, &c.

February 13th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This cause comes on now to be heard.

1st. On exceptions to the opinion of the Circuit Court permitting certain exhibits produced by the defendants in error to go to the jury.

2d. On exceptions to the charge delivered by the judge to the jury.

321*] *The first exhibit, to which the plaintiffs in error objected, was a letter written by their testator to George Smith & Co., of Hamburg, which respects the transaction on which the present suit is founded. This letter is said to be irrelevant.

The second is a letter written by Greene & Barker (whose interest the testator of the plaintiffs held as assignee) to George Smith & Co., making themselves responsible for the contract of Carriugton.

This letter is said to be inadmissible, because it is between other parties, and relates to a contract between Carrington and George Smith & Co.

The third is a judgment obtained by George Smith & Co. against Edward Carrington, the defendant in error, on his transactions as a copartner with Greene & Barker, which were guaranteed by them. The objection to this exhibit, also is, that it is the record of proceedings in a suit between other parties.

The court is unanimous and clear in the opinion that neither of these exceptions is sustained.

The letter of John J. Clark to George Smith & Co. is admissible, because it is part of the correspondence relative to the transactions out of which the present suit has grown, and because it affords a strong implicatiou that the writer was acquainted with the obligation of Greene & Barker, whose interest he claims, to comply with the engagements of Carrington, their copartner and supercargo. It cannot, therefore, be deemed irrelevant.

The letter of Greene & Barker to George Smith & Co. is admissible, because it tends to show the obligation of Greene & Barker (whose interest in the Abigail and her cargo is claimed by John Innes Clark) to perform the engagements of Carrington, and is a proper link in that chain of testimony which was adduced to prove that those engagements passed, with the interest of Greene & Barker in the Abigail and her cargo, to John Innes Clarke.

*The judgment obtained by George [322 Smith & Co. was admissible, because it was founded on the contracts of Carrington with George Smith & Co. for which Greene & Barker were liable. It was a material document to ascertain the amount to which George Smith & Co. were entitled, as against Carrington, and was therefore a part of the testimony which would be required to show for how much Greene & Barker were responsible when they assigned to John Innes Clark. It was certainly admissible, for these purposes, because Greene & Barker were in truth copartners with Carrington, and because, if they were not, it is a case of warranty and indemnity; and in such case, a judgment against the person to be indemnified, if fairly obtained, especially if obtained on notice to the warrantor, is admissible in a suit against him on his contract of indemnity. Whether it was admissible against John Innes Clark, depends on the degree of his liability for the money for which that judgment was rendered. If the obligation to indemnify passed to him with the interest of Greene & Barker, either on his express undertaking contained in his letter of March, 1801, or in consequence of any equitable lien on the vessel and cargo or on the money produced by them, which attached, while the property of Greene & Barker, and was not affected by the assignment, then these proceedings were admissible in a suit against him.

If no such liability existed, then the action could not be sustained, and the judgment would be reversed on the charge of the judge. This point therefore will be considered in that part of the case.

In his charge, after summing up the testimony offered by both parties, the judge proceeds to say: "I conceive that Mr. Clarke's letter bearing date March 16th, 1801, at Providence, and directed to Mr. Carrington at Havanna, and received by him the 22d of April, 1801, taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, ought to be considered as a letter of guaranty, and binding Mr. Clark to pay 5-9th parts of the debt due to George Smith & Co., as ascertained by the judgment in their favor against Mr. Carrington. I am also of opinion, that Mr. Clark having received of Mr. Carrington a large sum of money under and by virtue of the assignment from Greene 323*] & Barker, of their interest *in the ship Abigail and cargo, was bound under the circumstances of this case, as made out and established by the evidence, to refund the same, or so much thereof as would amount to 5-9th parts of the debt due to George Smith & Co. What sum Mr. Clarke received, is a question of fact, proper for you to decide."

The declaration in this cause contains five general counts, and three special counts founded on the letter of March 16th, 1801, which the judge considered as a letter of guaranty binding John Innes Clark to pay 5-9th parts of the debt due to George Smith & Co.

The first part of the charge is supposed, by a part of the Court, to apply to the special counts, and to determine the right of the plaintiff below to recover under them; the latter part of the charge, to the general counts, and to determine his right to recover under them.

If the letter of the 16th of March, 1801, bound John Innes Clark to perform the contract of Greene & Barker, then he was liable to the extent of Greene & Barker's liability, and was bound to pay whatever they were bound to pay, although it might exceed the proceeds of the Abigail and cargo.

If that letter did not support the special counts—if with the other circumstances of the case it did not amount to such a contract as was stated in the declaration—then Carrington could only recover on his general counts, and could obtain a judgment for no more than had been received by Clark.

Others of the court are of opinion, that the charge does not import that, in any state of the accounts, Clark was bound to pay more than he had received.

A decision of this point is rendered unnecessary by the opinion of the court on the letter of the 16th of March, 1801.

The important part of that letter is in these words: "With respect to the ship, notwith- "standing I have a bill of sale from Greene & 324*] "Barker of two-thirds, I *shall view "you (if you return here with her) as the owner "of such proportion as agreed upon between "you and them, and I give you my word that "you shall receive from me any aid and sup- "port in settling the business to mutual satis- "faction that is in my power. Mr. John Cor- "lis, who has undertaken to conduct the busi- "ness for Mr. John C. Nightingale writes you "by this opportunity, and will assure you in "his behalf, of one-sixth of one-third from him; "that is to say, to make you an owner in the "whole ship Abigail, and appurtenances of one "complete sixth, and the same proportion in "the cargo; and Greene & Barker's contract "with you, shall in every respect be fully "complied with, the same as it would have "been done with them, had they continued "owners."

What was Greene & Barker's contract with Carrington?

It is observable that neither in this letter, nor in any other part of the proceedings, is there any evidence that Greene & Barker had made with Carrington more than one contract respecting this voyage.

A part of this contract, as is apparent from the letter of Mr. Clarke, entitled Carrington to one-sixth part of the Abigail and of the cargo to be taken on board at Hamburg. The letter of the 12th of July, 1800, addressed by Greene & Barker to George Smith & Co., states Carrington to be a part owner of the vessel which was sent to Hamburg on freight, wishes them to render Carrington the necessary aid he may require, and adds, "we shall consider ourselves responsible for all contracts Mr. Carrington may make in the business of this ship, and anticipate the pleasure of your being well satisfied with his strict fulfillment of them."

It seems a necessary inference from the condition and object of the parties, that this letter was written in pursuance of, and conformity with, the contract between Greene & Barker and Carrington, and that their responsibility, "for all contracts Mr. Carrington might make in the business of the ship," was as much a part of their engagement with him as the agreement that he should be interested one-sixth in the vessel and cargo.

*This undertaking was known to Mr. [325 Clark. His letter of the 30th of June, 1800, introducing Carrington to George Smith & Co., recommends Greene & Barker and Nightingale as the persons on whom G. Smith & Co. were to rely for the fulfillment of the engagements made by Carrington. "I have ever found these gentlemen," says he, "persons of strict integrity, and I doubt not will punctually fulfill any engagements they may enter into with you." Clark knew, then, that Greene & Barker had bound themselves to be responsible for the contracts of Carrington with George Smith & Co., and alluded to this residue of their contract with Carrington, when, after saying that he should consider Carrington as the owner of such proportion of the ship as was agreed on between him and them, and that Mr. Corlis, who represented Nightingale, would do the same, he adds "and Greene & Barker's contract with you shall in every respect be complied with."

The subsequent conduct of Clark certainly proves that he never understood himself to be entitled to more, by the assignment of the Abigail and her cargo, than would remain after discharging the contracts entered into by Carrington.

The record abounds with proofs of this position, which have been much pressed at the bar, of which the court will select only one. It is the letter from Carrington to Clark, dated Havanna, April 22d, 1801, in which he acknowledges the receipt of Clark's letter of the 16th of March of the same year. He states the lien upon the ship and eargo, and adds, "but I presume, and doubt not, Messrs. Greene & Barker have aeqnainted you with the exact situation of them, and have only disposed to yon that part of the ship and cargo that may remain after the bottomry bond is settled and discharged."

At this information Mr. Clark expresses no surprise, nor does he manifest any dissatisfaetion at the conclusion Carrington had drawn respecting the terms on whieh he had sueeeeded to the rights of Greene & Barker. This is considered as further explaining his meaning in using the terms, "and Greene & Barker's contract with yon shall in every respeet be eomplied with."

326*] *Upon these grounds, it is the opinion of the majority of the eourt, that the letter of the 16th of March, 1801, contains a eontraet binding John Innes Clark to perform the whole contraet of Greene & Barker with Carrington, a part of which was to pay five-ninth parts of the debt eontraeted on account of the Abigail and her eargo, with George Smith & Co.; eonsequently the plaintiffs in error were responsible to Carrington as far as Greene & Barker were responsible.

It has been contended for the plaintiffs in error, that a considerable part of the debt to George Smith & Co. (the premium of insurance on a return voyage to Hamburg) was ineurred in consequence of the gross negligenee of Carrington in not eountermanding the order for insuranee as soon as he determined to ehange the voyage. For this sum it is eontended, Greene & Barker could not have been liable to Carrington, and eonsequently it eannot be reeovered from John Innes Clark.

One of the judges is of opinion, that the question of negligenee is, in this ease, a point of law, Carrington having been a eopartner with Greene & Barker, and therefore proper for the deeision of the eourt; others think that the judge has left that question with the jury.

In summing up the evidence, the jndge says, "the defendants say, that for his (Carrington's) neglect in not giving sueh timely notiee (of the change of the voyage), he ought himself to pay the whole of the preminm. Of this you will judge."

This explieit deelaration is eonsidered as not being overruled by the conelnding part of the eharge.

If the faet of negligence was left to the jury, they have decided it in the negative, and the qnestion whether a partner would in sueh a ease be responsible to his eopartners for negligenee in failing to countermand an order for insurance, does not arise in the cause.

On that part of the charge whieh states John Innes Clark to be responsible to Carrington to the amount of the money he had received, there 327] is no difference of *opinion in the eourt. It is, however, unnecessary to state the reasoning on which this opinion is fonnded, since the eonstruction given to the letter of the 16th of March, 1801, dccides the cause.

It is the opinion of the court, that there is no error, and that the judgment be affirmed.

DICKEY
v.
THE BALTIMORE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

A policy of insurance on a vessel, "at and from" an island, protects her in sailing from port to port of the island to take in a cargo.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an aetion on a policy of Insurance upon the ship Fabius, "at and from "New York to Barbadoes, and at and from "thence to Trinidad, and at and from Trini-"dad baek to New York."

The ship proeeeded to Barbadoes, and from thenee to the port of Spain, in the island of Trinidad, being the only port of entry in the island. Having taken in part of her retnrn cargo, she sailed from thenee for Port Hyslop, in the same island, for the residue. In the way she was lost by the dangers of the seas.

On the trial below, the opinion of the eourt was in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff took his bill of exceptions, and brought the case up by writ of error.

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, stated, that the only question was,

Whether the terms "at and from Trinidad," authorized the ship to sail from one port of the island to another port of the same island, to eomplete her eargo?

*To show that she was so authorized, [328 he relied on the case of Bond v. Nutt (Cowp., 601), and Thellusson v. Ferguson (Doug., 346; Marshall, 255, 257; Boston ed.).

Pinkney, Attorney-General, contra.

The opinion of the court below was founded upon the reason of the thing, and upon the idea that the late English cases were not authority.

The vessel was not within the policy while sailing from port to port in the island. She was lost on the high seas, and was not protected by the policy, unless she was justified by some usage of trade. Bnt no sueh usage was proved. In the case of Bond & Nutt, the vessel was a general ship, and the usage of the trade was to take goods for several different ports in the island of Jamaiea. That island has many ports of entry—Trinidad has only one. There is no case in which a vessel has been permitted to depart from a port and return to it again under such a poliey. She was not literally at the island. Analogy is against the doetrine, and so is the reason of the thing.

Harper, in reply.

In the cases cited by Marshall, there is no allusion to the eourse or usage of the tradc. Nor does the eourt lay any stress upon the fact that there were many ports of entry in Jamaiea. Although there was only one port of entry in Trinidad, yet there were other ports at which they might in fact take in a eargo.

Feb. 17th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This action was brought on a policy insuring the Fabius at and from New York to Barbadoes, and at and from thence to the island of Trinidad, and at and from Trinidad back to

New York. The Fabius arrived at the port of Spain, in the island of Trinidad, on the 21st of October, in the year 1806, where she remained until the 5th of December, when she sailed, under a special license from the proper authorities, for Fort Hyslop, another port in the is-329*] land, for the purpose of *procuring and taking in a part of her return cargo, and with a view of returning to the port of Spain, that being the only port in the island of Trinidad at which vessels, arriving from other places, were permitted to enter, or from which those destined on foreign voyages were permitted to clear. While on her voyage to Fort Hyslop, the Fabius was lost by the danger of the seas; and the question is, whether this loss is within the policy?

Were this a case of the first impression—were it to be decided for the first time on the intention of the parties to be collected solely from the words of the contract—some contrariety of opinion might undoubtedly be looked for, and it is uncertain what might be the opinion of the court.

Strictly speaking, a vessel is not at an island while sailing from one port to another of the same island; yet it is difficult to resist the persuasion that something more is meant by an insurance at and from an island than by an insurance at and from a port. The words, at and from an island, and at and from a port, are not synonymous, and yet in effect the same meaning would often be given to them, if the privilege of sailing from one port to another, for the purpose of completing the cargo, should not be granted by the policy. An insurance to an island may terminate at the first port, and the expression may be adopted from the uncertainty at what port the vessel insured may first arrive; but it seems difficult to put any other construction on an insurance at and from an island, or to assign any other motive for the risk being so described, than that it is a license to use the different ports of the island, for the purpose of obtaining the return cargo. This particular policy furnishes strong reason for this construction. It is difficult to read it without feeling a conviction that the intention of the contract was to insure the whole voyage from and to New York, and to have the liberty of the islands of Barbadoes and Trinidad. There being but one port in the island of Trinidad at which a vessel was permitted to enter or clear, takes away every inducement for inserting in the policy the words at and from the island of Trinidad, rather than the words at and from the port of Spain, in the island of Trinidad, unless those words secure the liberty of going 330*] to other *ports, for the purpose of completing the cargo, and of returning to the port of Spain, to clear out for New York.

But the words of this policy are not now to receive their first construction. In Camden v. Cowley (mentioned 1 Marshall, 166), a ship was insured from London to Jamaica generally, and by a subsequent policy she was insured at and from Jamaica to London.

The ship having touched and staid for some days at one port of Jamaica, was lost in coasting the island; but before she had delivered all her outward cargo at the other ports of the island.

In an action on the homeward policy, the claim of the insured on the underwriters was resisted, not on the principle that the words at and from did not imply a permission to use all the ports of the island; not on the principle that sailing from one port to another was a deviation; but on the principle that the risk on the outward policy had not terminated, and that consequently the risk on the homeward policy had not commenced when the loss happened.

A verdict was found against the underwriters, and a new trial was refused.

In Bond v. Nutt the insurance was made on a ship at and from Jamaica to London, warranted to sail before the first of August, 1776. The ship sailed from St. Anns, in Jamaica, on the 26th of July, for Bluefields, also in Jamaica, in order to join a convoy there. She was detained at Bluefields by an embargo, until the 6th of August, when she sailed with the convoy, but being separated from it, was captured. On this policy a verdict was given in favor of the underwriters, under the direction of Lord Mansfield, and a motion for a new trial was resisted on two grounds.

1st. That a departure from St. Anns was not a departure from Jamaica.

2d. That going to Bluefields was a deviation, that being out of the course of the voyage from St. Anns to London.

After great consideration, the court [
was unanimously of opinion in favor of the motion.

Lord Mansfield, in giving his opinion, said, "as neither party knew from what part of the "island the ship would sail, they used the words "at and from Jamaica, which protected her "in going from port to port, till she sailed." He also said, "had the insurance been at and "from St. Anns," the going round the island "to Bluefields would have been a deviation."

In Thellusson v. Ferguson, an insurance was made "at and from Guadaloupe to Havre, warranted to sail on or before the 31st December." The vessel took in her cargo at Point Petre in Guadaloupe, and for the purpose of obtaining convoy, sailed on the 24th of October, to Basseterre, where there is no port, but only an open road. She was there detained till the 10th of January, when she sailed with convoy, but was captured on the return voyage.

The plaintiffs obtained a verdict. A motion was made for a new trial, which was refused. Lord Mansfield said, "under an insurance" at and from such a place as Guadaloupe or Jamaica, the word "at" comprises the whole island, and under that word, the ship is protected in going from port to port, round the coast of the island.

The underwriters not being satisfied with this decision, another action was afterwards brought on the same policy against Staples, also an underwriter. But upon that action, the only point insisted on was that the vessel had not sailed by the stipulated day.

It appears, then, to be the settled doctrine of the courts of England, that an insurance "at and from an island," such as those in the West Indies, generally insures the vessel while coasting from port to port of the island, for the purpose of the voyage insured. It is dangerous to change a settled construction on policies of insurance.

It is the opinion of this court, that the Circuit Court erred in not giving the instruction

332*] prayed for by the *counsel for the plaintiff, and that the judgment be reversed, and the case remanded to that court with directions to give the instructions prayed for by the plaintiffs, as stated in the bill of exceptions filed in the cause.

THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF ALEXANDRIA
v.
HODGSON.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

Upon an action on a valued policy, if a misrepresentation of the age and tonnage of the vessel, whereby the underwriters were induced to agree to a high valuation, be a defense, it is at law and not in equity.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in a suit in equity, brought by the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria against Hodgson, to enjoin so much of a judgment at law obtained by the latter against the former as exceeded the value of the brig Hope as found by the jury in a special verdict upon a valued policy.

It was contended in the bill that the age and tonnage of the vessel was misrepresented, and that such misrepresentation induced the complainants to value the ship at 10,000 dollars, when in fact she was worth only 3,300 dollars, as specially found by the jury on the trial at law. She was represented to be about 250 tons burden, when she was only 161 tons, and to be from six to seven years old when she was between nine and ten years old.

The bill also alleged as a ground for relief, the refusal of the court below to receive two pleas offered by the complainants on the trial at law, the rejection of which pleas had been assigned for error in this court when the cause was here last (see Ante., vol. 6, p. 206); but this court thought the rejection of a plea no ground for a writ of error, and therefore gave no opinion as to the propriety of admitting them.

333*] *The first of those pleas stated the above misrepresentation as to the age, tonnage and value of the vessel, and averred it to be material in regard to the risk of the voyage. The other plea stated in general terms that the policy was obtained by fraud with intent to defraud the complainants of the difference between the true and the represented value of the vessel, which difference it averred to be more than 4,000 dollars.

Upon the answer of Hodgson and the other evidence in the cause the court below dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill.

E. I. Lee, for the appellants, relied principally upon the evidence of the over-valuation, which he said was so excessive as to amount to proof of fraud. But even if it were only a mutual mistake it is sufficient to avoid the policy. (Park., 12, 196, 225; Miller, 39, 43, 97.)

As to the equity of the case, he contended that the pleas rejected by the court of law, and which charge fraud, being made part of this bill, are to be considered as a charge of fraud, which is a ground of equitable jurisdiction. The rejection of the pleas is of itself a ground for a court of equity to relieve, for the complainants have not yet had an opportunity to show the fraud.

A court of equity will relieve against mistakes upon which contracts are founded.

All that the defendant is entitled to upon a policy is indemnity. He ought in equity to recover only the value and interest.

To show that equity will relieve against error at law, he cited 2 Wash., 36, Ambler v. Wyld; Prec. in ch., 233, Kent v. Bridgman; 2 Vern., 146, Graham v. Stamper; Id., Robertson v. Bell; Finch, 472; 2 Str., 733, Burrow v. Jemino; 2 P. Wms., 425; 1 Vez., Jr., 417; 2 Vez., 155; 5 Cranch, 110, Hodgson v. Marine Ins. Co.

Swann and Jones, contra.

The bill contains no charge of fraud. Straas and Leeds, who were the persons insured, are not made *parties. The pleas which [334 are referred to in the bill are not to be considered as containing an allegation of fraud which is to be answered. It is not a bill for the discovery of any fact which the complainants could not have proved at law. The object is to get rid of the over-valuation. It is to try the case over again. The answer shows that there could be no fraud; for the insured lost a cargo, worth 7,000 dollars, which was not insured.

The bill contains no equity. Their remedy was at law. In cases of insurance there is the same remedy at law as in equity.

But there was no misrepresentation. It was only the opinion of Maxwell, that the vessel was about six or seven years old, and about 250 tons burden. A representation must be the positive affirmation of some material fact. There was no representation as to value—Hodgson only proposed that the vessel should be valued at 10,000 dollars; he never affirmed that she was of that value.

On the question of jurisdiction, and to show that the alleged defense, if it were a defense at all, was a defense at law, they cited 2 Marshall, 679. The court did right in rejecting the pleas because they were complex, and offered after the law had been decided against the complainants. (2 Burr, 717.)

A valued policy is conclusive unless it be a cover to a gaming contract, or be made with a view to a fraudulent loss. (2 Vern., 119, Woodward v. Guile; 3 Bl. Com., 435; 1 Marsh, 123, 287; 4 Burr, 2228, Low v. Peers; Finch, 119, E. I. Comp. v. Blake; Prec. in ch., 102; 6 Br. Parl. ca., 417, 470; 1 Fonb., 167.) Misrepresentation as to the age and tonnage was not material to the risk; it was guarded against by the implied warranty of sea-worthiness. No previous representation as to sea-worthiness is necessary. (1 Marsh., 475.)

C. Lee, in reply.

The real value of the vessel is conclusively fixed by the verdict of the jury. But if it were not, there is evidence *enough to show [335 that she was not worth one-half the sum insured. The value thus fixed has shown the amount which will be an indemnity to the defendant.

By the refusal of the court to receive the pleas, the complainants were precluded from a just defense. This court has decided the refusal to be no ground for a writ of error at law. But we contend it is a ground for relief in equity. It is also a sufficient ground of relief that the rule of indemnity has been violated.

The valuation in the policy is only prima facie evidence, and throws the burden of proof on the underwriter. It shall be taken to be so fixed as to be an indemnity. An over-valuation is of itself evidence of fraud. If it is intended to be an interest policy, it amounts only to a contract for indemnity. (Cowper, 583, Kent v. Bird.)

Even if the defendant was mistaken, and both parties were equally ignorant, yet the complainants are not liable for more than an indemnity. (M'Ferren v. Taylor, 3 Cranch, 270.)

There is no difference in principle between insuring double the value at one office and making double insurance at two offices. The reason against both is the same, viz., that the insured shall have only one indemnity.

The law of liquidated damages does not apply.

The defendant might have had a return of part of the premium upon proving the mistake of the value.

Feb. 18th. Absent—DUVALL, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was brought in the Circuit Court, sitting in chancery, for the purpose of obtaining a perpetual injunction to a judgment rendered against the plaintiffs in favor of the defendant, on a policy of insurance effected by him as agent for G. F. Straas and others, of Rich-
336*] mond, *on the brig called the Hope. The allegations of the bill are entirely unsupported by testimony, except those which relate to the value of the vessel insured. The Hope was valued in the policy at $10,000, and $8,000 were insured upon her. She is stated to have been in fact worth less than $4,000.

The underwriters contend that they were in the practice of refusing to insure on any vessel more than four-fifths of her value, and that they were led to make this insurance by a misrepresentation respecting the value of the Hope. They therefore pray to be relieved from so much of the verdict and judgment rendered thereon as exceeds that value.

On the part of the defendants it is contended that the plaintiffs have not made out a case which entitles them to the aid of a court of equity.

Without attempting to draw any precise line to which courts of equity will advance, and which they cannot pass, in restraining parties from availing themselves of judgments obtained at law, it may safely be said that any fact which clearly proves it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law; or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery.

On the other hand it may with equal safety be laid down as a general rule that a defense cannot be set up in equity which has been fully and fairly tried at law, although it may be the opinion of that court that the defense ought to have been sustained at law.

In the case under consideration the plaintiffs ask the aid of this court to relieve them from a judgment, on account of a defense which, if good anywhere, was good at law, and which they were not prevented, by the act of the defendants, or by any pure and unmixed accident, from making at law.

It will not be said that a court of chancery cannot interpose in any such case. Being capable of imposing *its own terms on the [*337 party to whom it grants relief, there may be cases in which its relief ought to be extended to a person who might have defended, but has omitted to defend himself at law. Such cases, however, do not frequently occur. The equity of the applicant must be free from doubt. The judgment must be one of which it would be against conscience for the person who has obtained it to avail himself.

The court is of opinion that this is not such a case.

William Hodgson, as agent for the insured, applied for insurance on the brig Hope on a voyage from St. Domingo to her port of discharge in the Chesapeake, and laid before the board the following certificate:

"This may certify, that I was master of the schooner Sophia, of this place, and Alexander Burot, supercargo; that while we were at the city of St. Domingo in July last, Mr. Burot purchased the brig Hope, of Boston, and I was called on with a carpenter to examine her, and found her to be a stout well-built vessel of about 250 tons, in good order, and well found with sails, rigging, &c.; was built in the state of Massachusetts, and is from 6 to 7 years old. I left the city of St. Domingo on the 27th of July, and Mr. Burot expected to sail from there about the 15th or 20th of August up the coast to take in mahogany."

JAMES MAXWELL.

Septr. 24th, 1799."

Upon view of this certificate the vessel was valued at $10,000, and the insurance made at $8,000. On the voyage the vessel was captured.

In fact the Hope was of 160 tons burden, and was from eight to nine years old. There is reason to believe that she was not worth more than $3,000.

It does not appear that the loss was fraudulent or that the cargo was insured.

The plaintiffs contend that this misrepresentation led them to value the vessel much higher, and to insure a *much larger sum [*338 on her than they would have done had a true description been given of her size and age.

To support this allegation they state their practice never to insure on any vessel more than four-fifths of her real value, and their rule, which was known to Hodgson (he being himself one of the directors), to require that every order for insurance should be in writing, and should contain, among other things, "as full a description of the vessel and voyage as can be given."

The answer asserts that when the certificate was laid before the board of directors, Hodgson was asked if he would vouch for its truth, which he refused to do, whereupon the board agreed to value the vessel at $10,000, and to make the insurance required. He himself believed the certificate to be accurate, and is persuaded that the insured entertained the same opinion. He does not think that the tonnage of the vessel weighed much with the parties. It is not mentioned in the policy.

Straas and Leeds, whose agent Hodgson was, and for whom the insurance was made, are not parties to the bill.

No fraud is proved on them other than what is to be inferred from the error in the certificate given by Maxwell, nor ought their conduct to be decided on, or their interests affected in a suit to which they are not parties, although they might have been made defendants.

The court will not undertake to say what influence this certificate might have had, or ought to have had, at law. But since the plaintiffs were not prevented from using it at law by the act of the defendants or by any positive rule which disabled them from doing so, they have not made out a case of such clear equity—a case in which it would be so obviously against conscience for the defendant to enforce the judgment at law—as to justify the interposition of a court of chancery.

The judgment is to be affirmed with costs.

339*] *LOCKE v. THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—TODD, J.

In a count in a libel upon the 50th sec. of the collection law of March 2d, 1799, for unlading goods without a permit, it is not necessary to state the time and place of importation, nor the vessel in which it was made, but it is sufficient to allege that they were unknown to the attorney.

"Probable cause" means less than evidence which would justify condemnation. It imports a seizure made under circumstances which warrant suspicion.

ERROR to the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, which condemned the cargo of the schooner Wendell, belonging to Locke, the claimant, as forfeited to the United States.

The libel contained 11 counts.

The 1st count charged that the goods between the 1st of June, 1808, and the day of filing the libel, at Boston, with intent to transport them to Baltimore, without a permit from the collector and naval officer of the port of Boston, were clandestinely laden on board the schooner Wendell, a vessel enrolled and licensed according to statute, whose employment was not then confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers and lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, nor exempted from the obligation of giving bond according to the provisions of the statute (the embargo law).

The 2d count charged that the goods being of foreign growth and manufacture and subject to the payment of duties, between the 1st of May, 1808, and the day of filing the libel were unladed without the authority of the proper officers of the customs, from on board some vessel to the attorney unknown, after she had arrived within four leagues of the coast of the United States, the said vessel being then bound from some foreign port or place (to the attorney unknown) to the United States.

The 3d count charged that the goods, being of foreign growth and manufacture and subject to duties, were, without any unavoidable accident, necessity or distress of weather, unladen without the authority of the proper officers of the customs.

The 4th count charged that the goods being of foreign growth and manufacture, and subject to the payment of duties imposed by the laws of the United States, *between [*340 the 1st of May, 1804, and the day of filing the libel, were imported from some foreign port or place to the attorney unknown, into some port of the United States to the said attorney unknown, in a certain vessel to the said attorney unknown, and were afterwards and before filing the libel unladed at the said last-mentioned port from the said vessel without a permit from the proper officers of the customs of the last-mentioned port.

The 5th count charged that the goods were imported into Boston and were falsely, and by a false name and denomination, entered at the custom-house of the port of Boston.

The 6th count charged that they were imported into a port of the United States, to the attorney unknown, and were falsely, and by a false name and denomination, entered at the custom-house of such port.

The 7th count stated that the goods were of the manufacture of Great Britain, and were imported into New York, between the first of March, 1808, and the day of filing the libel, from some foreign port or place to the attorney unknown.

The 8th count stated that they were so imported into Boston.

The 9th count stated them to have been so imported into Philadelphia.

The 10th count averred them to have been so imported into Baltimore.

The 11th count stated them to have been so imported into some port of the United States, to the attorney unknown.

The 1st count was under the embargo law.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th counts were under the collection law.

The other counts were under the non-importation acts *of 18th April, 1806, (vol. 8, [*341 p. 80), and 19th Dec., 1806, (vol. 8, p. 219).

Harper, for the appellant.

The 1st count, under the embargo act, is understood to be abandoned.

The 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th and 11th counts are under the non-importation acts of 18th April, and 19th December, 1806. There is no evidence of the importation of the goods since the 2d Monday in December, 1807, the time when those laws began to operate.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th counts are under the general collection law of 2d March, 1799, (vol. 4, p. 325, &c.) The 5th and 6th, however, charge acts not forbidden by the law, so that the charges are reduced to those contained in the 2d, 3d and 4th counts.

The 2d and 3d counts are under the 27th sec. of the collection law (vol. 4, p. 324). These counts are defective in not averring that the unlading was before the vessel had "come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo," which is an essential ingredient in the offense described in that section. And all the counts are defective in not stating where, how, when, and from what ship the goods were unladen. These defects are as fatal in a libel as in an indictment or declaration. There is no authority for making a distinction. But if some latitude be allowed in a libel, yet it ought to be certain to a common intent in these respects.

If the libel be sufficient, yet it is not supported by proof. There is no evidence of the time when the goods were landed so as to show it to be contrary to law.

But it was said in the court below that the onus probandi was on the claimant by the express provision of the statute (Laws United States, vol. 4, p. 391, sec. 71), the words of which are: "If the property be claimed by any "person, in every such case the onus probandi "shall be upon such claimant; but the onus "probandi shall lie on the claimant only where 342] "probable cause is shown *for such "prosecution." Probable cause is prima facie evidence, and whenever that is shown, the onus probandi falls, of course, upon the other party. A contrary construction would be against the common principles of law. What you charge, you must prove. Innocence is always to be presumed until there be at least prima facie evidence of guilt. This construction is fortified by the 43d section of the collection law, (vol. 4, p. 350), which provides that if distilled spirits, wines and teas be found unaccompanied by a certificate of importation, it shall be presumptive evidence that the same are liable to forfeiture. This presumptive evidence can be no other than probable cause of seizure; and probable cause must mean presumptive evidence. In the present case there is no such probable cause. The circumstances which are supposed to excite suspicion are, 1. That there was a variance in the manifest. 2. That the names of the shippers and consignees were fictitious. 3. That there was no proof of their entry into Boston; and, 4th. That the original marks had been effaced upon many of the packages.

It is not stated where this manifest was found. The variance is very trifling. There could have been no fraud upon the United States intended by using fictitious names, because the goods were as liable to seizure as if they had been shipped in the name of the claimant. It was done to screen the goods from his creditors, he being in embarrassed circumstances at that time, as appears from the deposition of W. French. The want of a certificate of entry is only evidence that they might have been improperly imported, not that they were. The erasure of the original marks could not screen the goods from seizure; part of the original marks remained. None of these circumstances constitutes that prima facie evidence which throws the budren of proof upon the claimant. But this provision respecting the onus probandi applies only to the importer himself, and as to him it is not unreasonable; he knows where to look for the evidence of their correct importation. But it is unreasonable to apply the rule to a purchaser. It would in many cases be impossible for him to obtain the necessary evidence. There is no evidence that the claimant was the importer of these goods.

Pinkney, contra. [343

There is some ground to say that these goods ought to be condemned under the non-importation act of 1806. It is clearly proved that they are of British manufacture; they must therefore have been imported, and some of the articles appeared to be of a very recent fabric. These circumstances, connected with the total want of proof on the part of the claimant, create very strong suspicions, if they do not amount to positive proof.

But under the collection law, especially upon the 4th count, which is founded on the 50th section of that act, the case is quite clear.

It is not necessary in a libel for unlading contrary to law to state from what vessel, nor at what time, nor in what place, the goods were unladen. It would generally be impossible to prove the circumstances; and if averred, they must be proved. Suppose that the claimant had confessed that the goods were smuggled, but had not said in what vessel, nor when, nor where, the evidence of his confession would have been sufficient to condemn the goods although he had omitted to state these immaterial circumstances. It is sufficient to aver that they were landed from some vessel, and at some place within the United States unknown to the prosecutor, and within the time when the law was in force. The claimant has sufficient notice that the United States mean to rely on the general ground of suspicion, and on the shifting the onus probandi, and must come prepared to remove the suspicion. Of what use is the provision respecting the onus probandi, if the law was so before? It is perfectly nugatory if probable cause means prima facie evidence. It must mean something less than evidence; it means reasonable grounds of suspicion.

Another objection as to form is, that the libel does not aver negatively that the vessel had not arrived at her port of delivery. It is not necessary to show this even by intendment; but it does necessarily appear from the facts stated in the count. It is sufficient to set forth the great leading facts of the case, and to aver them to be done contrary to the statute. By referring to the statute he is informed as to the particulars alleged against him.

*The variance in the manifest is im- [344
material; but the use of fictitious names for shippers and consignees is a circumstance of strong suspicion. It was probably done to blind the eyes of the custom-house officers, by dividing the ownership into 13 or 14 parts.

Harper, in reply.

If the United States are permitted to state the time and place so vaguely, yet they ought to state all the circumstances which constitute the offense. It must be stated that the fact was committed within some district of the U. S. The offense is unlading before she came to her port of delivery. Whatever is necessary to be averred, must be positively averred; it cannot be made out by inference or intendment. It is not sufficient to state that it was done contrary to the statute. It must be shown how it was done, that the court may judge whether the act was unlawful or not.

Feb. 19th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, affirming a judgment of the District Court, which condemned the cargo of the Wendell, as being forfeited to the United States.

The first point made by the plaintiff in error is that the information filed in the cause is totally insufficient to sustain a judgment of condemnation.

The information consists of several counts, to all of which exceptions are taken. The court, however, is of opinion that the 4th count is good, and this renders it unnecessary to decide on the others.

That count is founded on the 50th section of the collection law, and alleges every fact material to the offense.

It is, however, objected to this count, that the time and place of importation, and the vessel in which it was made, are not alleged in the information, but are stated to be unknown to the attorney.

345* *These circumstances are not essential to the offense, nor can they, from the nature of the case, be presumed to be known to the prosecuting officer.

The offense is charged in such a manner as to come fully within the law, and is alleged to have been committed after the passage of the act, and before the exhibition of the information. This allegation, in such a case, is all that can be required.

The 4th count of the information being sufficient in law, the court will proceed to examine the testimony adduced to support it.

It is proved incontestibly that the goods are of foreign manufacture and consequently have been imported into the United States.

The circumstances on which the suspicion is founded—that they have been landed without a permit—are,

1st. That the whole cargo in fact, belongs to the claimant, and yet was shipped from Boston in the names of thirteen different persons, no one of whom had any interest in it, or was consulted respecting it, and several of whom have no real existence.

2d. That no evidence exists of a legal importation into Boston, the port from which they were shipped, to Baltimore, where they were seized.

3d. That the original marks are removed and others substituted in their place.

The counsel for the claimant has reviewed these circumstances separately, and has contended that no one of them furnishes that solid ground of suspicion which can create a presumption of guilt and put his client on the proof of his innocence. That they are either indifferent in themselves—mere casualties—or are reasonably accounted for.

To the employment of fictitious names as shippers, he says, that if the circumstance be not totally immaterial, it is sufficiently accounted 346for by the deposition of William *French, who says, "he understood that the claimant in the cause was in embarrassed circumstances some time before the shipment of these goods, and that he has understood and believes from general report that, for the purpose of preventing his property from being attached, he was in the habit of shipping his property in the names of other persons."

The court is of opinion that the circumstance is far from being immaterial. It is certainly unusual for a merchant to cover his transactions with a veil of mystery, and to trade under fictitious names. The manner in which this mysterious conduct is accounted for is not satisfactory. It does not appear that his creditors were in Baltimore, or would be more disposed to attach his property in that place than in Boston, and it does not appear that in Boston the names of others were borrowed to protect his property from his creditors. The fact itself, if true, might be proved by other and better testimony. This habit might have been proved by his clerks.

An attempt is made to account for the circumstance that the goods were not regularly entered at the custom-house in Boston, by the testimony of the same William French, who deposes that goods to a large amount are transported by land to Boston, and if intended for domestic consumption, are generally unaccompanied by certificates of having paid the duties. The inference is therefore considered as a fair one, that these goods may have paid the duties at some other port where they were purchased by Mr. Locke, and transported by land to Boston.

The court is not satisfied with this inference. Goods in packages, unaccompanied by certificates of having paid the duties, are always liable to be questioned on that account. Large purchasers, therefore, even where re-exportation is not intended, would choose to be furnished with this protection. It is a precaution which costs nothing, and which a prudent merchant will use. The presumption, therefore, is always against the person who is in possession of goods in the original packages without these documents. This presumption ought to be removed, and may be removed, not by proving *that cases have existed where a pur- [347 chaser of goods, that have been regularly entered, has omitted to furnish himself with certificates, but that the particular case may reasonably be supposed to be of that description. The actual importation, or the actual purchase of the very goods, or of goods of the same description, may be proved, and ought to be proved by a person who has been so negligent as not to obtain certificates that would exempt them from forfeiture.

The alteration of the original marks has been treated as an immaterial circumstance because no criminal motive can be assigned for it. This alteration, it is said, was not calculated to impress the revenue officers with the opinion that the duties had been paid, and is therefore not to be considered as made with that motive.

Certainly the alteration was not made without a motive. Men do not usually employ so much labor for nothing. If they use mystery without an object, they must expect to excite suspicion.

To do away that suspicion they ought to show an object.

In the present case, it is not improbable, that the motive was to relieve the goods from the suspicion of being imported in violation of the then existing prohibitory laws. One witness, who deposes that the goods were of British manufacture, also deposes that he never saw goods imported from Great Britain with such marks as those which were found on the goods.

of Mr. Locke. In the absence of other motives, the mind unavoidably suggests this.

If these circumstances were even light, taken separately, they derive considerable weight from being united in the same case. If these goods have really paid a duty, it is peculiarly unfortunate that they should have been shipped without certificates of that fact, under fictitious names, from a port where they were not entered, and that the marks of the packages should have been changed. It is peculiarly unfortunate that these circumstances cannot be explained away by showing that the goods have 348] been entered elsewhere, or even *that the claimant has purchased such goods from any person whatever.

These combined circumstances furnish, in the opinion of the court, just cause to suspect that the goods, wares, and merchandise against which the information in this case was filed, have incurred the penalties of the law.

But the counsel for the claimant contends that this is not enough to justify the court in requiring exculpatory evidence from his client. Guilt he says must be proved before the presumption of innocence can be removed.

The court does not so understand the act of Congress. The words of the 71st section of the collection law, which apply to the case, are these: "And in actions, suits, or informations "to be brought, where any seizure shall be "made pursuant to this act, if the property "be claimed by any person, in every such case "the onus probandi shall be upon such claim-"ant." "But the onus probandi shall be on "the claimant, only where probable cause is "shown for such prosecution, to be judged of "by the court before whom the prosecution is "had."

It is contended, that probable cause means prima facie evidence, or, in other words, such evidence as, in the absence of exculpatory proof, would justify condemnation.

This argument has been very satisfactorily answered on the part of the United States by the observation that this would render the provision totally inoperative. It may be added, that the term "probable cause," according to its usual acceptation, means less than evidence which would justify condemnation; and, in all cases of seizure, has a fixed and well-known meaning. It imports a seizure made under circumstances which warrant suspicion. In this, its legal sense, the court must understand the term to have been used by Congress.

The court is of opinion that there is no error, and that the judgment be affirmed with costs.

349*] *THE SCHOONER GOOD CATHARINE v. THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J. and TODD, J.

A vessel of the United States, captured, condemned, sold, purchased by her former master, a citizen of the United States, who obtained a Danish burgher's brief, and who cleared out of a port of the United States as a Dane, is a foreign vessel within the 5th section of the act of 9th Jan., 1808, supplementary to the embargo act, although she was really owned by a citizen of the United State.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, which condemned the schooner Good Catharine as a foreign vessel for a violation of the 5th section of the act of January 9th, 1808, supplementary to the embargo act (vol. 9, p. 13), which declares "that if any foreign ship or "vessel shall take on board any specie, or any "goods, wares or merchandise, other than the "provisions and sea-stores necessary for the "voyage, such ship or vessel, and the specie "and cargo on board, shall be wholly for-"feited."

She was originally an American vessel, but had been captured and condemned as prize, and purchased by Hurst, her former master, an American citizen. She took on board goods other than the provisions and sea-stores necessary for the voyage, and cleared out as a Dane.

Martin, for the appellant,

Contended, that notwithstanding these circumstances, the vessel, being really American, could not be condemned under that section of the law; for in criminal cases there can be no estoppel. A man may prove the truth of the case against his own averment.

Pinkney, Attorney-General,

Relied upon the capture, condemnation and sale, and the Danish burgher's brief, which the master had obtained, to show that she was a foreign vessel.

The sentence of the Circuit Court was affirmed.

*BOND AND ANOTHER v. JAY. [*350

Absent—TODD, J.

The exception, in the Maryland statute of limitations, in favor of "such accounts as concerns the "trade or merchandise between merchant and mer-"chant, their factors and servants, which are not "residents within this province," applies to dealings between a merchant creditor residing out of Maryland and a debtor residing in Maryland.

And in order to take the case out of the exception, it is not sufficient to aver that the creditor returned to, came, and was within the state of Maryland after the cause of action accrued, and more than 3 years before bringing the suit.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of assumpsit brought by Bond & Brooks against Jay, surviving partner of Samuel Jay and Gabriel Christie, trading under the firm of Samuel Jay and Company, upon an account for mercandise sold and delivered. The defendant, Jay, pleaded the statute of limitations of Maryland, 1715, (ch. 23), which limits actions of assumpsit to three years after the cause of action shall have accrued.

To this plea the plaintiffs replied "that at "the time when the several sums of money in "the declaration mentioned grew due, viz., on "the 20th of March, 1799, and long before, to "wit, on the 27th of November, 1797, and from "then until the said 20th of March, and from "the said last-mentioned day until the suing "forth the original writ in this suit, the plaint-"iffs were merchants, carrying on trade and "merchandise under the name and firm of "Bond & Brooks, and residing and carrying "on trade without the limits of the district "aforesaid, and of the state of Maryland, viz., "at Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania; "and that at the several times aforesaid the "said Jay and Christie were merchants, trad- "ing under the firm of Samuel Jay & Com- "pany, and residing and carrying on trade at "and within the district aforesaid, and that on "the said several days, and on sundry days "from the first of those days to the second of "those days the plaintiffs were engaged in mu- "tual trade and merchandise with the said Jay "and Christie, by reason of which trade, and "of and concerning the same, the said several "sums of money in the declaration mentioned "grew due to the plaintiffs, and this they are "ready to verify; wherefore," &c.

To this replication the defendant rejoined, that the plaintiffs ought not to have and maintain their said action by reason of anything alleged in their replication aforesaid; because, protesting, that the said several sums of money in the declaration aforesaid mentioned, do not 351] *concern the trade and merchandise between merchant and merchant; and also protesting that the plaintiffs had not continued to reside without the state of Maryland and district aforesaid since the contracting and growing due of the said several sums of money, and until the suing out the original writ in this cause; yet, for answer to the said replication, the said Samuel Jay says that true it is that at the time of the contracting and growing due of the said several sums of money, he, the said Samuel and the said Christie, were merchants and residents within the state and district of Maryland aforesaid, and continued to reside therein until the decease of the said Christie, and the said Samuel has continued to reside therein ever since; and that the several sums of money in the declaration mentioned had become due and were payable on the 20th of March, 1799, to wit, at the district aforesaid; and that afterwards, to wit, on the 20th of May, 1799, the plaintiffs returned to, came, and were within the state aforesaid, to wit, at the district aforesaid; and that afterwards, to wit, on the 18th day of October, 1799, the said Joshua B. Bond came to, and was within the said state, viz., at the district aforesaid; and that the original writ in this cause was sued forth on the 19th day of May, 1809, and not before; and so the said Samuel Jay saith that three years and more had elapsed and expired, after the return of the plaintiffs and of the said Joshua B. Bond to, and after their being within the said state and district, and after the contracting and growing due of the said several sums of money, and before the suing out of the said original writ in this cause, viz., at the district aforesaid; and this the said Samuel is ready to verify; wherefore," &c.

To this rejoinder there was a general demurrer and joinder. The court below overruled the demurrer, and adjudged the rejoinder to be good; whereupon judgment was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiffs sued out their writ of error.

The act of assembly of Maryland, 1715, (ch. 23), enacts, "that all actions of trespass quare "clausum fregit, all actions of trespass, detinue, "surtrover, or replevin for taking away goods "or chattels, all actions of account, contract, "debt, book, or upon the case, other than such "*accounts as concerns the trade or [352 "merchandise between merchant and merchant, "their factors and servants, which are not resi- "dents within this province, all actions of debt "for lending," &c., &c., "shall be commenced or "sued within the time and limitation hereafter "expressed, and not after," &c.

The third section contains a clause saving to persons within the age of 21 years, feme covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned, or beyond seas, the right of suing within the respective times limited after the removal of their several disabilities.

The cause was argued by Harper, for the plaintiffs in error, and Pinkney, Attorney-General, for the defendant in error.

February 22d. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This suit was brought by the plaintiff, a merchant of Pennsylvania, against the defendant, a merchant of Maryland, upon an account which grew out of their trade with each other as merchants. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, to which the plaintiff replied that the plaintiff, who resided in the state of Pennsylvania, and the defendant were employed in mutual trade and merchandise, of and concerning which the said several sums of money in the said declaration mentioned grew due. The defendant rejoins that the plaintiff came within the state of Maryland in 1797, and that the original writ in this cause issued on the 5th of July, 1808, and not before. The plaintiff demurred, and upon argument the demurrer was overruled and the bar adjudged to be good.

A writ of error has been sued out to the judgment of the Circuit Court, and the questions in the cause are,

1. Is the replication good in itself?

2. Does the rejoinder avoid the replication and sustain the plea?

These questions depend on the act of limitations passed in 1715 by the legislature of Maryland. The * material part of that act [353 is in these words: "Be it enacted, That all ac- "tions, &c., other than such accounts as con- "cerns the trade of merchandise between mer- "chant and merchant, their factors and ser- "vants which are not residents within this "province," &c., "shall be commenced or sued "within three years ensuing the cause of such "action, and not after."

By the plaintiffs it is contended, that if either party reside without the province the case is within the exception; by the defendant, that to bring the case within the exception both parties must reside without the province.

It is so unusual for a legislature to employ itself in framing rules which are to operate only on contracts made without their jurisdiction, between persons residing without their jurisdiction, that courts can never be justified in putting such a construction on their words, if they admit of any other interpretation which is rational and not too much strained.

This, it is thought, may be done in the case now to be decided. The words "which are not residents" refer, it is said, to both parties, plaintiff and defendant. They comprehend all the persons previously enumerated. Let this be conceded.

Then read the exception as if the word "both" or "all" were inserted. It will stand thus: "Other than such accounts as concerns the trade or merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors and servants which are not both or all residents within this province." The plain meaning of the sentence so read would be that accounts between merchant and merchant, either of whom resided out of the province would come within the exception. It is admitted that without the word "both" or "all," the more obvious meaning of the sentence is that for which the defendant contends. Yet it will bear the same construction without, as with either of those words, and the subject-matter of the law so clearly requires this interpretation that the court thinks it may be made.

The rejoinder is founded on the third section
354*] of the *act, which contains the usual exceptions in favor of infants, &c., and allows three years after the removal of the impediment to bring their suit.

It is contended that since the act of limitations runs against a person beyond sea from the time of his coming into the country, so from analogy it ought to run against a non-resident merchant from the time of his coming, though for a mere temporary purpose, within the country.

The court cannot assent to the correctness of this reasoning. To render it applicable, the rejoinder ought to have averred that the plaintiff had become a resident of the state of Maryland more than three years before the institution of the suit. Not having done so, the words of the exception have never ceased to be applicable to the plaintiff; and, consequently, the statute has never commenced to run.

It is the opinion of this court that the Circuit Court erred in overruling the demurrer of the plaintiff to the rejoinder of the defendant in this cause, and that the judgment be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded with instructions to render judgment on the said demurrer in favor of the plaintiff, and that further proceedings may be had therein according to law.

Judgment reversed.

PRESTON v. TREMBLE.

Absent—TODD, J.

If an equitable title be merged in a grant, the party has no relief in equity, although the grant be void, as being contrary to law.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee, who had dismissed the plaintiff's bill in chancery, upon demurrer, for want of equity.

The bill stated that Preston, the complainant, had title to a tract of land in the state of Tennessee, but the defendant, Tremble, fraudulently and deceitfully entered into it, and holds him out.

355*] *In setting forth the title it is stated that the land formerly lay within the state of North Carolina, during which time one Ephraim Dunlop made an entry for the land in regular form, paid the purchase money to the state, and performed every other requisite to complete the contract; but before a patent was obtained, the legislature of North Carolina passed a law defining the limits of the Indian boundary, declaring all entries and surveys already made within those limits to be null and void, and directing the entry-takers to refund all moneys received therefor. That Dunlop never received back the purchase money, nor consented to annul the contract. That the law of North Carolina rescinding the contract was void. That Dunlop afterwards obtained a warrant to survey the land and obtained a patent therefor from the state of North Carolina, and afterwards conveyed the lands to John Rhea, who conveyed to Preston, the plaintiff.

P. B. Key, for plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the land was within the territorial limits of North Carolina, who had a right to grant it.

2. That the entry and payment of the purchase money vested in Dunlop an equitable estate in fee in the land.

3. That the act of May, 1778, was void and inoperative, so far as it attempted to rescind the contract and destroy the equitable estate of Dunlop.

4. That although the patent which was issued in 1793, in contravention of the law of May, 1778, was declared void and inoperative to convey the legal title, yet the equitable estate existed and remained in Dunlop.

5. That no legal title to the land having passed to Dunlop, the plaintiff could not maintain an ejectment.

6. That when no adequate relief exists at law, a court of equity will interpose its authority, to protect an equitable estate, and by analogy, will give such full relief as a court of law would, had the title been legal.

*7. That the demurrer ought to be [356 overruled.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.

If your title is good at law, you have no case in equity. If you have any title it is at law. If you have no title at law, you can have none in equity. The equitable estate is merged in the grant.

This is an attempt to substitute a bill in equity for an action of trespass.

Decree affirmed.

BRIG PENOBSCOT
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—TODD, J.

Under the non-intercourse law, a vessel, in March, 1811, had no right to come into the waters of the United States to inquire whether she might land her cargo.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of the District of Georgia, which affirmed that of the District Court, condemning the brig Penobscot and her cargo of salt, for a violation of the acts of Congress interdicting commercial intercourse with Great Britain and her dependencies, (viz., the acts of March 1st, 1809, vol. 9, p. 243; May 1st, 1810, vol. 10, p. 186; the President's proclamation of Nov. 2d, 1810, and the act of 2d March, 1811, p. 346). By the 4th section of the act of March 1st, 1809, it was not lawful to import into the United States, or the territories thereof, any goods, wares or merchandise whatever, from any port or place situated in Great Britain, or Ireland, or in any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain; nor from any port or place in the actual possession of Great Britain; nor to import into the United States, &c., from any foreign port or place whatever, any goods, wares, or merchandise of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, or Ireland, &c.

By the 5th section, such goods so imported, (or put on board any vessel, &c., with intent of 357] importing, &c.,) as *well as all other articles on board, belonging to the same owner, are liable to forfeiture. And by the 6th section, the vessel is subject to forfeiture, if the goods are laden on board with the knowledge of the owner or master of the vessel.

The act of May 1st, 1810, and the President's proclamation of Nov. 2d, 1810, announcing that France had so revoked the edicts of Berlin and Milan, as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States; and the act of March 2d, 1811, are only referred to as reviving and enforcing against Great Britain the provisions of the act of March 1st, 1809.

The claim of the owners of the vessel and cargo stated, that the vessel sailed from Antigua on the 12th of February, 1811, and being crank and not sea-worthy, put into Turk's Island, for ballast, where she took in a load of salt, being informed, by an American vessel, that there was no law to prohibit it. That she sailed from Turk's Island for the port of Savannah, intending to stand off and on, to get information to know whether she might be permitted to come in or not. That on her approach to the harbor, a gale of wind prevented boats coming to her, and forced her, for the safety of the lives of the crew and the vessel, to make a harbor at Cockspur Island. That before she got a harbor, she was boarded by a revenue cutter, who took possession of her, and forcibly carried her into port. That the salt was not taken in with intent to violate the laws of the United States, but with the express intention and determination, if they found the importation into the United States to be unlawful, to bear away to some foreign port. She sailed from Castine, in the province of Maine, for Antigua, in December, 1810, and arrived off Savannah on the 15th of March, 1811.

There was evidence that the vessel might have called at Amelia Island, in the course of her voyage, where she might have got information of the non-intercourse law being in force. That she spoke a vessel of the United States just before she came in, but made no inquiry as to the law. That the agent of the owners wrote several letters to be delivered to the captain at sea, informing him of the law and warning him to go to some foreign port, but they were not de-358] livered. The evidence respecting *the necessity of coming in, by reason of stress of weather, did not seem to be sufficiently proved.

The cause was argued by P. B. Key for the appellants, and I. R. Ingersoll for the United States.[1]

It was contended by Key for the appellants,

1. That the cargo was not taken on board with intention of importing the same into the United States.

2. That the vessel was forced into Cockspur Harbor by stress of weather, to save the vessel and the lives of the crew: and while so making the harbor, she was boarded by a revenue cutter, and seized, and forced into the port of Savannah.

3. That she had a right to come into the waters of the United States to make inquiry whether she could be permitted to enter, and before a reasonable time had expired, she was forcibly seized and carried in.

4. That coming into the waters of the United States under either of the above circumstances, does not constitute an importation, without other and further voluntary acts on the part of the vessel.

February 23. MARSHALL, Ch. J., stated the opinion of the court to be, that the vessel came at her peril; that she was bound to get information; but was negligent in not calling at Amelia Island, and in not inquiring of the vessel which she spoke off the port of Savannah.

Sentence affirmed.

CAZE AND RICHAUD
v.
THE BALTIMORE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Absent.—TODD, J.

The underwriters upon a cargo are not liable for freight pro rata itineris, to the owner of the vessel, who is also owner of the cargo insured, in a case where the vessel and cargo were captured, the cargo abandoned to the underwriters as a total loss and by them accepted, the loss paid, the cargo condemned, restored upon appeal, and the proceeds of the cargo paid over to the underwriters. Freight pro rata itineris is not due unless the owner of the cargo voluntarily agrees to receive it at a place short of its ultimate destination.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland in an action of indebitatus assumpsit for freight *of goods by the [359 ship Hamilton from Bordeaux to Halifax.

In the court below a case was agreed by the parties, which was in substance as follows.

On the 28th of July, 1805, Mr. John Ducorneau, of Bordeaux, the agent of the plaintiffs, shipped for them, there, on their account, on board the ship Hamilton, of which they were owners, a cargo of the value of $22,986 on a voyage from Bordeaux to New York, where the plaintiffs resided. On the voyage she was captured by a British vessel of war and carried into Halifax, where the ship and cargo were condemned. Within due time after the plaintiffs heard of the capture, they abandoned as for a total loss to the defendants, who accepted the abandonment and paid the amount insured.

1.—The reporter was absent.

From the sentence of condemnation in the Vice Admiralty Court as to the vessel and cargo, but not as to freight, there was an appeal upon which the sentence was reversed and the proceeds of the vessel and cargo were restored. The proceeds of the cargo were paid over to the underwriters; but the sum they received was less than the sum they had paid upon the policy.

The question, upon this case, was, whether the plaintiffs, who were owners of both vessel and cargo, were entitled to recover from the underwriters upon the cargo, freight from Bordeaux to Halifax.

Harper, for plaintiffs in error, contended that they were so entitled.

The underwriters who became the owners of the cargo at Halifax, were benefited by the transportation from Bordeaux. The cargo was liable for its freight. The underwriters received the whole proceeds. So much thereof as amounted to the value of the freight was received by them to the use of the plaintiffs as owners of the ship.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, contra.

This action certainly cannot be maintained upon an insurer's liability for freight under a [*360 policy on cargo. *The case of Baillie and Modigliani, 2 Marsh., 728, is decisive to that effect; and even if an insurer were liable for freight under the policy, he must be sued upon that, and could not be made to answer for it in this form of action.

But it is said that this claim does not rest on the policy; but founded upon the idea, that as the underwriters became proprietors (by the abandonment and acceptance) of the cargo, or rather of the proceeds of the cargo, at Halifax, they succeeded to the burden as well as to the benefit, and must consequently pay freight pro rata itineris to the plaintiffs as owners of the ship.

To this it may be answered, that if any freight was due, it was due from the plaintiffs themselves, because it was earned while they were the owners of the goods, and because the abandonment could not throw upon the underwriters a responsibility for freight for which the assured were already liable. There could be no privity of contract between the insurers and the ship-owners with reference to such freight; and the ship-owners could have no lien on the proceeds arising from the sales under the condemnation.

But no freight was due. The goods belonged to the owners of the ship, and of course the bill of lading did not call for freight. On the contrary it declared that no freight was to be paid, "the cargo being owner's property." To imply a contract between the owners of the cargo and themselves to pay freight to themselves, and that, too, against the bill of lading, would be absurd. It follows that at the time of the abandonment the plaintiffs had no right, either complete or inchoate, to freight upon the goods insured. If it were even admitted, then, to the utmost extent contended for, that the insurers, accepting the abandonment, took the cargo cum onere, they could not be charged with freight in this case, since the thing insured was, when they succeeded to it, free from such a charge. If they became liable for freight they did not take simply cum onere; for the onus relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel did not exist when the subject-matter came to them by abandonment. The abandonment and acceptance must have created, not passed it. If, indeed, the ship had afterwards performed any service to the underwriters with [*361 respect to these goods, an assumpsit might be implied pro tanto against them; but this demand is for freight supposed to have been earned while the goods belonged to the plaintiffs, and were expressly, as well as from the nature of the transaction, exempt from freight.

The doctrine of lien which has been spoken of by the plaintiffs' counsel cannot serve his cause, for the plaintiffs could have no lien for freight which was not due; even if there could be a subsisting lien upon these proceeds, for freight which was due.

But freight was not due, for other reasons. It may be conceded that freight is in some cases due pro rata itineris, where the voyage being intercepted, the owner of the cargo consents to receive it at a place short of its destination. But he must be a volunteer. A forced receipt, as on this occasion, has never been adjudged to give a title to pro rata freight. Besides, this cargo was lost; and even if the proceeds had covered the value, it may well be questioned, notwithstanding the dictum in Baillie and Modigliani, whether by taking the proceeds, the owner gives a right to pro rata freight.

But however that may be, it can scarcely be maintained that a forced acceptance (by the owner or by an insurer to whom an abandonment has been made) of proceeds far short of the value (as was the fact here) will give such a right.

Harper, in reply.

The case in Marshall wants the essential ingredient of ownership in the person making the abandonment. It was, too, a case of partial loss. The defendants in the present case are sued, not as underwriters, but as owners of goods liable for freight. The benefit they receive from the transportation of the goods is a good foundation for an implied promise. The decision in Burrow's reports, of consent to receive the cargo liable pro rata itineris, has never been questioned.

February 24th. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*The present action is brought to re- [*362 cover freight pro rata itineris, under the following circumstances:

The plaintiffs were the owners of the ship Hamilton and cargo, and effected insurance of her cargo on a voyage from Bordeaux to New York. The sum of $11,000 was underwritten by the defendants—the sum of $10,000 at Philadelphia, and the residue of the value of the cargo ($1,986) was left uninsured. During the voyage the ship and cargo were captured, carried into Halifax, and there condemned. The plaintiffs abandoned to the underwriters and received payment for a total loss. An appeal from the sentence of condemnation was interposed and the sentence finally reversed, and the proceeds of the cargo, which had been previously sold by order of court, were paid over to the underwriters in proportion to the sums underwritten by them respectively.

We are all of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in the present action.

In the first place the court are satisfied that, as between the insured and the underwriter on the cargo of a ship, the latter is in no case responsible for the payment of freight, whether there be an abandonment or not. It is a charge on the cargo against which he does not undertake to indemnify the owner; and if authority be necessary to support the position, it is fully borne out by the doctrine of Lord Mansfield in Baillie v. Modigliani, (Marshall, 1728.)

In the next place we are all of opinion that no freight whatsoever was, under the circumstances of this case, due. Freight, in general, is not due unless the voyage be performed. Here the ship and cargo never arrived at their port of destination, and of course the whole freight could not be due. Was a pro rata freight due? We think not. The whole class of cases resting on the authority of Luke v. Lyde (2 Burr., 882), proceed on the ground that there is a voluntary acceptance of the goods themselves at an intermediate port; and not, as in the present case, a compulsive receipt from the hands of the admiralty after capture and condemnation, and ultimate restoration upon the appeal. There is, in our judgment, no equity to support such a claim; and although it 363] *receive countenance from some remarks incidentally thrown out in Baillie v. Modigliani, the current of more recent authority, as well as of principle, clearly points the other way.

It may be further added that as between the insured and the underwriter the existence of a lien on the cargo for freight does not vary the legal responsibility of the underwriter on such cargo after an abandonment.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

THE SCHOONER JANE
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

In a prosecution against a vessel for violation of a law of the United States it is not necessary to adduce positive testimony of the identity of the vessel.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, reversing that of the District Court, which condemned the schooner Jane for violation of the non-intercourse act.

Nicholson, for appellant,

Contended that there ought to have been positive proof of the identity of the vessel.

Pinkney, Attorney-General.

If these cases are to be likened to criminal prosecutions, and if the same strictness be required, it will be impossible to execute the laws. No proof was offered on the part of the claimant. But there is sufficient proof of identity—she is the same kind of vessel, has the same name, belongs to the same port, has a master of the same name, had the same cargo, and the time of her sailing from Port au Prince corresponded with the time of her arrival at Baltimore, allowing the usual time for performing the voyage.

Harper*, in reply. [*364

The United States are bound to make out full proof. If the fact be so, much better proof might have been had on the part of the United States.

February 24th. WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was an information filed in the District Court of the United States, for the District of Maryland, against the schooner Jane and her cargo for a breach of the law interdicting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. The particular charge alleged in the information is, that this vessel had imported into the port of Baltimore from some place in the island of St. Domingo, a dependence of France, 1920 bags of coffee in violation of the above law. To establish this charge two witnesses were examined on the part of the United States, who concurred in testifying that they were at Port au Prince in the island of St. Domingo, from about the middle of August to the middle of September, in the year 1809, and that they saw lying there a schooner called the Jane, of Baltimore, Vezey, master. That her cargo consisted of flour, which she discharged at that place and took in a quantity of coffee in bags, and that she sailed from Port au Prince about the 10th of September.

One of these witnesses thinks that the name "Jane" was painted on the stern of the vessel, but is not positive as to that fact; nor can either of the witnesses say that the vessel they saw at Port au Prince was the same which was seized by the collector of the port of Baltimore.

The seizure of the vessel and cargo, which are the subject of this controversy, was made between the 1st and 18th of October, 1809.

Upon the above evidence, the District Court dismissed the information and ordered restitution of vessel and cargo. This writ of error is taken to the sentence *pronounced [365 by the Circuit Court, which, upon an appeal, reversed that of the District Court and condemned both the vessel and cargo. For the claimants it is contended that the evidence in this case is merely presumptive, and is much too light to establish the fact necessary to be made out, that the vessel seized by the collector of Baltimore is the same vessel which was seen by the witnesses at Port au Prince. If the latter part of the objection to the evidence be well founded, it is fatal to the sentence, because, although presumptive evidence is clearly admissible, and may of itself be sufficient to support, in many instances, even a criminal prosecution, yet the circumstances proved ought not only to harmonize with each other, but they ought in themselves to be so strong as fully to satisfy the mind of the fact they are intended to establish.

In this case there is such a coincidence in the circumstances proved in relation to the vessel, the cargo, and the voyage, as to impress the mind with a conviction, almost irresistible, that the schooner Jane seen by the witnesses at Port au Prince, is the identical vessel against which this prosecution is carried on. That vessel was a schooner, the reputed name of which at Port au Prince was the Jane, of Baltimore, Vezey, master; which took in, at that port, coffee in bags and sailed from thence about the 10th of September. The vessel in question is a schooner, bears the same name, was commanded by a captain Vezey, her cargo coffee in bags, and she arrived at Baltimore between the 1st and 10th of October, about the time when a vessel which had left Port au Prince on the 10th September might reasonably have been expected to arrive. It is barely possible that the facts proved in this case should apply to any other vessel than the one in question; and in the absence of all explanatory evidence, which it was so entirely in the power of the claimants to have produced, is sufficient to deprive him of this slight ground to stand upon.

It is true that the proof of identity might have been strengthened by evidence that this vessel sailed from Baltimore, of the time when she sailed, the port for which she cleared, and the cargo she took out with her. But it does not 366] appear in this record, nor *does it necessarily follow, that she sailed from Baltimore on her outward voyage, or that it was in the power of the United States to prove any of the above facts. On the other hand, nothing could have been more easy than for the claimants to have proved them, and still further to have proved, if their case would have admitted it, that the evidence on the part of the United States did not apply to this vessel.

The court is of opinion that there is no error in the sentence pronounced by the Circuit Court, and that the same should be affirmed with costs.

LEE v. MUNROE AND THORNTON.

Absent—JOHNSON, J., and TODD, J.

The United States are not bound by the declarations of their agent, founded upon a mistake of fact, unless it clearly appear that the agent was acting within the scope of his authority, and was empowered in his capacity of agent to make such declaration.

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in a suit in chancery, brought by Lee against Thomas Munroe, superintendent of the city of Washington, and William Thornton, the survivor of the late board of commissioners for that city. The object of the bill was to obtain a discount of 3,000 dollars upon a judgment, which Munroe, as superintendent, had obtained against Lee upon his bond. The ground upon which this set-off was claimed, was this: Morris and Nicholson were indebted to Lee in that sum by promissory notes, and offered payment in certain city lots, the title whereof was in the commissioners of the city. Morris and Nicholson having paid money in advance to the commissioners, were, as they supposed, entitled to demand from them the conveyance of the lots in question, under existing contracts between the commissioners and themselves. Whereupon Lee applied to the commissioners to know of them whether they would convey the lots to him, upon the order of Morris and Nicholson. This they promised to do, and made an entry of it in their journal. Lee then agreed with Morris and Nicholson to receive the lots in payment, and upon receiving their order to the commissioners to convey them to him, gave up to Morris and Nicholson their notes for 3,000 dollars, which were the *evidence of the debt. [367 On presenting this order to the commissioners, they refused to convey the lots, unless he would pay them the purchase money due thereon to them from Morris and Nicholson, alleging that the balance was against Morris and Nicholson in their account with the commissioners. Morris and Nicholson shortly afterwards became insolvent.

C. Lee, for the appellant.

This case cannot be distinguished from that of a mortgagee, who, knowing another person is about to lend money upon the mortgaged premises, informs him that his mortgage is satisfied. If it be not, he shall be postponed to the 2d Mortgagee. (2 Vern., 554, Ibbottson v. Rhodes; 1 P. Wms., 394, Mocatta v. Murgatroyd; 4 Dall., Levy v. Bank U. S.)

The commissioners were acting within the scope of their authority. It was their business to keep the accounts with Morris and Nicholson, and to know the balance; it was also their business to convey the lots. It is immaterial what was the real state of accounts at the time. They acted at their peril.

The question is, who shall bear the loss? Not he who was in no fault, but he whose duty it was to know the truth, and who by his negligence has brought this loss upon the plaintiff.

Jones, contra.

This case does not depend upon the principle of first and second mortgagee. The bill does not seek relief personally against the superintendent, or the surviving commissioner, but is intended to charge the public with this loss. The commissioners were public officers; they had no interest in the business. It was a simple mistake of a fact on their part, which cannot bind the United States. It is an attempt to set off unliquidated damages incurred by these public officers against a judgment debt.

Feb. 26th. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a bill seeking relief against [368 public officers nominally, but against the United States in fact, for a mistake of the former in a representation made by them to the appellant, by which it is alleged that he has sustained a loss, for the redress of which in damages this suit is brought. It has been contended in this case, that the defendants having, in their public character as commissioners of the city of Washington, misinformed the plaintiff as to the state of the accounts between them and Morris and Nicholson, and thereby induced him to relinquish a demand which he had against the latter, he is now entitled to have discounted from a judgment, which they have obtained against him for the use of the United States, a sum equal to the principal and interest of the debt which he lost by the confidence which he placed in them; and this is supposed to be like the case of a party who, being about to lend money on real estate, applies to one who holds a prior mortgage to ascertain whether he has any incumbrance on it. There is no doubt, in such a case, that if the person making the application discloses that he is about lending money on the estate, he will be preferred to the first mortgagee, should the latter deny his having a mortgage, or assert that it is satisfied; and it seems agreeable to the dictates of reason and good conscience, that his claim should be postponed to that of a person whose confidence was inspired by the misrepresentation of one who was acting for himself, and every way competent to inform him of the truth. But in all the cases which have been decided on this principle, the fraud, for such it is supposed to be, has been practiced by a party who has himself an interest in the subject-matter of inquiry, who cannot well be mistaken, and whose conduct therefore ought to be conclusive on him, when the rights of third persons come in question. It is, however, not known to the court that the same rule of decision has been extended so as to affect the interests of principals, and particularly of the public, in consequence of similar mistakes made by an agent, nor is it reasonable that such extension should take place, unless it most manifestly appear that the agent was acting within the scope of his authority, and was empowered, in his capacity of agent, to make the declaration or representation which is relied on as the ground of relief. In the present case, the defendants were employed and author-369] ized by the public to *sell and make contracts for the sale of certain lands lying within this district. In pursuance of these powers, they had made contracts with Morris and Nicholson, who, having advanced a considerable sum of money, were in the habit of directing the defendants from time to time, to convey certain of the lots which they had contracted for, to the persons named in such orders. The commissioners, supposing that Morris and Nicholson had not yet received titles to land equal in value to the sum which they had advanced, told the plaintiff that if he would obtain an order from them for certain lots they should be conveyed to him. But in a day or two after they discover that Morris and Nicholson had already received deeds for lots to the whole amount of the sum which they had advanced, and give notice of this fact to the plaintiff, offering, however, to convey to him the lots in question, on his paying for them at the rate expressed in their contract with Morris and Nicholson. The court will not inquire whether the plaintiff really suffered any injury from the confidence which he placed in the commissioners, or whether he lost his remedy against Morris and Nicholson (of which very serious doubts may well be entertained), but a majority of the judges are of opinion, that the communication made by the commissioners to the plaintiff was altogether gratuitous, and that not being within the sphere of their official duties, the United States cannot be injured by it, and that the defendants could not, without rendering themselves personally liable to the public, have made a title to the plaintiff after a discovery of the mistake which they had made, but on the terms proposed by them; or in other words, that the United States could not, by any declaration of the commissioners proceeding from a mistake, lose the lien which was secured to them by the contract with Morris and Nicholson, for the stipulated price of this property. If the commissioners acted fraudulently, which is not pretended, they may be personally liable in damages to the plaintiff; but if it were a mistake, and such it is represented to be, the court has already said that the interests of the United States cannot, and ought not, to be affected by it. Were it otherwise, an officer entrusted with the sales of public lands, or empowered to make contracts for such sales, might by inadvertence, or incautiously giving information to others, destroy the lien of his principles on very *valuable and large tracts of real estate, [370 and even produce alienations of them without any consideration whatever being received. It is better that an individual should now and then suffer by such mistakes than to introduce a rule, against an abuse of which, by improper collusions, it should be very difficult for the public to protect itself.

It is the opinion of this court that the decree of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

HERBERT AND OTHERS
v.
WREN AND WIFE AND OTHERS.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

Courts of chancery have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, in cases of dower, especially where partition, discovery, or account is prayed, and in cases of sale where the parties are willing that a sum in gross should be given in lieu of dower.

If a devise of land in Virginia to the widow appear from circumstances to be intended in lieu of dower, she must make her election, and cannot take both.

If a wife join her husband in a lease for years she is still entitled to dower in the rent.

A court of chancery cannot allow a part of the purchase money in lieu of dower, when the estate is sold, unless by consent of all parties interested.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria, in a suit in chancery brought by Richard Wren, and Susanna, his wife, who was the widow of Lewis Hipkins, deceased, and John and Westley Adams, her trustees, against W. Herbert, T. Swann, R. B. Lee, and W. B. Page, (trustees of Philip R. Fendall, deceased,) and E. I. Lee, Jos. Deane and F. Green.

The case was stated by MARSHALL, Ch. J., (in delivering the opinion of the court), as follows:

This suit was brought by Richard Wren, and Susanna, his wife, formerly the wife of Lewis Hipkins, praying that dower may be assigned her in a tract of land of which her former husband died seized, and which has since been sold and conveyed to the defendant, Joseph Deane, or that a just equivalent in money may be decreed her in lieu thereof.

The material circumstances of the case are these:

Lewis Hipkins, being seized as tenant in common with Philip Richard Fendall on one-third of a tract of land lying in the county of Fairfax by his deed executed *by himself and [371 wife, leased the same to Philip Richard Fendall for the term of thirteen years, to commence on the first of September, in the year 1794, at the annual rent of 140*l.*

In the year 1794 Lewis Hipkins departed this life, having first made his last will and testament in writing, in which he devised both real and personal estate to his wife: the real estate for her life, with remainder to his three daughters.

To his two sons he devised the premises in question, and added that if, during the minority of his sons, Philip R. Fendall should erect thereon another water-mill or water-mills, his desire was that his sons or the survivor of them should, at the expiration of the lease for years made to the said Philip pay one-third part of the value of such mill or mills, and in default of payment that P. R. Fendall should be permitted to hold the same at the present rent until the value should be received.

He directed his two tracts of land in London to be sold for the payment of his debts, and appropriated the annual rent accruing on the lands leased to P. R. Fendall to the education and maintenance of his children.

The testator then adds the following clause: "If it should so happen that the remaining part of my estate, not herein bequeathed, should prove insufficient to pay all just demands against my estate, then my will and desire is that my executors shall sell as much of my real and personal estate as may be necessary to make up the deficiency, and that they shall sell such parts as will divide the loss among my representatives as nearly as may be in proportion to the property bequeathed to them and each of them."

On the 13th day of December, in the year 1797, Susanna Hipkins, then the widow of Lewis Hipkins, conveyed her dower in the premises in question and also in the land devised to her for life by her deceased husband to the plaintiffs, John Adams and Westley Adams, in trust for her use.

372*] *In the year 1803 P. R. Fendall and Walker Muse instituted a suit against the executors and children of Lewis Hipkins, deceased, and in the month of June in that year the cause came on to be heard by consent of parties, when the court decreed that the whole estate of Lewis Hipkins be sold and the money brought into court.

The report of the sale does not appear on the record, but an entry was made that the report was made and confirmed by the court.

Under this decree the premises were sold and conveyed to the defendant, E. I. Lee, who purchased in trust for P. R. Fendall, one of the executors of Lewis Hipkins. On the deed of conveyance is a memorandum stating that the property was sold subject to dower.

Lee conveyed the premises to the other defendants, trustees of P. R. Fendall, for the purposes of a trust deed which had been previously executed, conveying to them the other two-thirds of the same estate on certain trusts in the deed recited.

The trustees sold and conveyed to the defendant, Joseph Deane.

The bill states that the defendant, Joseph Deane, had not paid the purchase money, and was willing, should the court decree dower in the premises, to give an equivalent in money in lieu thereof.

Soon after the trust deed from Susanna Hipkins to John and Wesley Adams she intermarried with the plaintiff, Richard Wren.

Philip R. Fendall continued to pay the plaintiff, Susanna, during her widowhood, and the plaintiffs, Richard and Susanna, after their intermarriage, one-third part of the rent accruing on the premises devised to him by Hipkins and wife until the year 1803; since which he has refused or neglected to pay the same.

The defendants, the trustees of Philip Richard Fendall, he having departed this life previous to the institution of this suit, insist,

*1. That the remedy of the plaint- [373 iffs, if they have any, is at law, and that a court of equity can take no jurisdiction of the cause.

2. That the provision made by the will of Lewis Hipkins for the plaintiff, Susanna, not having been renounced by her, bars her right of dower in his estate.

The defendant, Joseph Deane, has put in no answer, and as against him the bill is taken as confessed.

The Circuit Court determined that the claim of the plaintiff, Susanna, to dower was not barred, and decreed her a sum in gross as an equivalent therefor.

From this decree the trustees of Philip Richard Fendall have appealed. The plaintiffs also object to so much of the decree as refuses them rent on the premises, and have therefore taken out likewise a writ of error.

E. I. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. If the complainant, Susanna, has any right of dower, her remedy was in a court of law.

In a suit in chancery, if a question of dower arise, and the right of dower be denied, a court of equity will send it to a court of law to be tried.

The courts of the United States are forbidden by law to exercise chancery jurisdiction in a case in which there is a remedy at law. A court of equity takes cognizance of no case of dower which does not involve some peculiar ground of equity—such as discovery, partition, account, &c.

Here was no prayer for discovery, nor partition, and although an account was prayed, yet it was unnecessary. (1 Fonb., 19; 1 Br. C. C., 326; 3 Atk., 130, Dormer v. Fortescue; 2 Br. C. C., 631; 2 Vez., Jun., 124.)

2. She had no right to dower. Her husband, Hipkins, had devised to her an estate for life, which appears, by the various provisions in his will, to have been intended to be in lieu of dower. The lands out of *which [374 dower is now claimed, he devised to his sons, and also devised them for payment of his debts. He specifically devised away all his lands.

In the case of Ambler v. Norton (4 Hen. and Mun., 23), the devise was not expressly in lieu of dower, but the fact was collected from the whole context of the will.

3. But if she had a right of dower, the court had no authority to make a decree for part of the purchase money, without the consent of all parties concerned. (1 Inst., 33.)

R. I. Taylor, contra.

None of the facts upon which the claim of dower is founded is denied by the answer. The denial of the right is founded on particular facts therein stated.

1. As to the jurisdiction. At the present day courts of law and equity have a concurrent jurisdiction in dower, if the facts are not denied upon which the claim of dower is founded; such as seizure, &c. In general a court of chancery is the proper tribunal. A discovery is almost always sought; partition is frequently required, and an account is generally taken. (Comyns Dig. Tit. Chancery, E. Mitford, 109, 129; 1 Fonb., 22; 6 Bac. Ab., 417; 2 Vez., Jr., 122, 124.) There is no case in Virginia where the jurisdiction has been denied.

In this case a partition was necessary, and that is a special ground of equitable jurisdiction.

But the property had been sold by order of court, expressly subject to dower, and the deed to Deane contained a covenant to indemnify him against the claim of dower. A court of chancery can call all parties before it, and by decreeing a compensation in lieu of land, prevent circuity of action. The widow and the purchaser had consented to such a decree. An account of rents and profits was also necessary. The act of Congress prohibiting the resort to chancery where there is a remedy at law, is only an affirmance of a principle of the common law.

375*] *But it is said that by joining in the lease for 13 years, she barred her dower during the lease. This is not so. Her husband still had a free hold of inheritance in the land, and died seized thereof. And the widow is entitled to dower in all lands of which the husband was seized of the freehold of inheritance during the coverture. (1 Inst., 32; Com. Dig., Tit. Dower, A. 6.)

But the most formidable objection arises upon the devise to her by the will. That devise was not expressly in lieu of dower, nor is there such averment as the state of Virginia requires. There is no averment that she accepted the lands devised in lieu of dower; nor that her husband was seized of such an estate in those lands as would be a bar if she had accepted them.

The decree of the court was for a sale of the whole real estate of her husband. It does not appear that the land devised to her was not sold as well as the rest. If it was she is not barred of her dower. (Co. Lit., 18 [B.], Harg. note; Ridgeway's Rep. tem. Hardwicke, 184, Dormer v. Fortescue; Fonb., 22; 6 Bac. Ab., 417.)

But there is an error in favor of the plaintiff in error, and if the cause should be sent back it ought to be corrected. There was no allowance made for arrearages of rent.

As to the decree for money in lieu of land. The widow was willing to receive it, and the defendant, Deane, to pay it. If there had not been a decree for money, Deane would have been obliged to pay the whole purchase money to the trustees and then sue them for a breach of covenant, and recover back in damages the value of the dower to be assessed by a jury. By ascertaining that value in the first instance, this circuity of action and loss of time are prevented. Whether the court below ought themselves to have fixed the value of the dower, or left it to be ascertained by a master in chancery, or by a jury, we do not pretend to say. We do not wish the decree to be affirmed. We hope the bill will not be dismissed, but sent back with instructions to allow us the arrearages of rent with the profits thereon, and that an account be taken accordingly.

C. Lee, in reply. [376

The essential point of the case is that she is barred of her dower by her acceptance of a jointure under the will. The act of assembly (Rev. Co., 180, § 11) says "that if any estate be conveyed by deed or will, either expressly, or by averment, in lieu of dower," &c., "such conveyance shall bar her dower of the residue," &c. She has accepted her jointure and resides upon it. All the circumstances of the will show the intent to be in lieu of her dower. By averment, means by allegation and proof dehors the will. (1 Inst., 36 [b] note; Wooddeson, Tit. Dower; Hargrave Co., Lit., 36 [b] note; 1 Br. C. C., 292, Pearson v. Pearson.)

The court had no right to decree money in lieu of the land without consent of the creditors.

No arrearages of dower can be recovered for the time preceding the demand.

February 26th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The material questions in the cause are:

1. Has a court of equity jurisdiction in the case?

2. Is the plaintiff, Susanna, entitled to dower?

3. If these points be in her favor what decree ought the court to make?

According to the practice which prevails generally in England, courts of equity and courts of law exercise a concurrent jurisdiction in assigning dower. Many reasons exist in England in favor of this jurisdiction, one of which is, that partitions are made and accounts are taken in chancery in a manner highly favorable to the great purposes of justice. In this case dower is to be assigned in an undivided third part of an estate, so that it is a case of partition of the original estate as well as of assignment of dower in the part of which Lewis Hipkins died seized.

*An additional reason and a conclu- [377
sive one in favor of the jurisdiction of a court of equity is this: The lands are in possession of a purchaser who had not yet paid the purchase money. A court of law could adjudge to the plaintiffs only a third part of the land itself. Now, if the plaintiffs be willing to leave the purchaser undisturbed, to affirm the sales and to receive a compensation for her dower instead of the land itself, a court of equity ought never, by refusing its aid, to drive her into a court of law and compel her to receive her dower in the lands themselves. This is therefore a proper case for application to a court of chancery.

2. It is perfectly clear that the provision made by Lewis Hipkins in his last will is no bar to a claim of dower for several reasons, of which it will be necessary to mention only two.

1. It is not expressed to be made in lieu of dower.

2. It is not averred that she has accepted the provision and still enjoys it.

3. It remains to inquire what decree the court ought to make in the case.

The first question to be discussed is this: Is the plaintiff, Susanna, entitled both to dower and to the provision made for her in the will of her late husband?

The law of Virginia has been construed to authorize an averment that the provision in the will is made in lieu of dower, and to support that averment by matter dehors the will. But, with the exception of this allowance to prove the intention of the testator by other testimony than may be collected from the will itself, the act of the Virginia legislature is not understood in any respect to vary the previously existing common law.

In the English books there are to be found many decisions in which the widow has been put to her election either to take her dower and relinquish the provision made for her in the will, or to take that provision and relinquish her dower. There are other cases in which 378*] *she has been permitted to hold both. The principle upon which these cases go appears to be this:

It is a maxim in a court of equity not to permit the same person to hold under and against a will. If, therefore, it be manifest, from the face of the will, that the testator did not intend the provision it contains for his widow to be in addition to her dower, but to be in lieu of it; if his intention discovered in other parts of the will must be defeated by the allotment of dower to the widow, she must renounce either her dower or the benefit she claims under the will. But if the two provisions may stand well together, if it may fairly be presumed that the testator intended to devise or bequest to his wife as additional to her dower, then she may hold both.

The cases of Arnold v. Kempstead and wife, of Villarael and Lord Galway, and of Jones v. Collier and others, reported by Ambler, are all cases in which, upon the principle that has been stated, the widow was put to her election.

In the case under consideration neither party derives any aid from extrinsic circumstances, and therefore the case must depend on the will itself.

The value of the provision made for the wife compared with the whole estate is not in proof; but so far as a judgment on this point can be formed on the evidence furnished by the will itself, it was supposed by him to be as ample as his circumstances would justify.

The only fund provided for the maintenance and education of his five children is the rent of £140 per annum, payable by P. R. Fendall. Since he has made a distinct provision for his wife, the presumption is much against his intending that this fund should be diminished by being charged with her dower.

That part of the will, too, which authorizes P. R. Fendall, in the event of building a mill and not receiving from the sons of the testator their half of its value, to hold the premises until the rent should discharge that debt, indicates an intention that in such case the whole rent should be retained.

379*] *The clause, too, directing the residue of his estate to be sold for the payment of debts is indicative of an expectation that the property stood discharged of dower, and is a complete disposition of his whole estate. The testator appears to have considered himself as at liberty to arrange his property without any regard to the incumbrance of dower.

Upon this view of the will it is the opinion of the majority of the court that the testator did not intend the provision made for his wife as additional to her dower, and that she cannot be permitted to hold both.

She has not, however, lost the right of election. No evidence is before the court that she has accepted the provision of the will, nor that she still enjoys it. Indeed there is much reason to suppose the fact to be otherwise. The decree of 1803 does not except the lands decreed to her for life from its operation, nor is the court informed by the evidence that those lands were not sold under it.

But if she had accepted that provision and still enjoyed it, there is no evidence that she considered herself as holding it in lieu of dower. On the contrary, she was in the actual perception of one-third of the rent accruing on the lease held by P. R. Fendall; and in the deed executed by her in 1797, before her second marriage, she conveys her dower in the lands leased to Fendall, and also her dower in the lands devised to her by her deceased husband. It is therefore apparent that she never intended to abandon her claim to dower.

The next inquiry to be made by the court is, to what profits is the plaintiff, Susanna, entitled in consequence of the detention of dower?

It is unnecessary to decide whether, in general, a person claiming dower from a purchaser can recover profits which accrued previous to the institution of her suit. In this case the plaintiff was in the actual enjoyment of dower. She received one-third of the rent accruing from the premises for nine years. She was therefore in full possession of her dower estate; and when afterwards the land was sold under a decree of a *court, P. R. Fendall was [380 one of the executors who made the sale, and was himself in effect the purchaser of the estate. Upon no principle could he justify the refusal to pay that portion of the rent which was equal to her dower in the land, unless on the principle that she was not entitled to dower. In this case, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to one-third of 140*l.* per annum for the remaining four years of the lease under which P. R. Fendall held the land, and to an account for profits after the expiration of the lease.

But the plaintiff, Susanna, cannot claim the profits on her dower and hold any portion of the particular estate devised to her, or of the profits on that estate. An account, therefore, must be taken, if required by the defendants, showing what she has received under the will of her husband. This must be opposed to the profits to which she is entitled for dower, and the balance placed to the credit of the party in whose favor it may be.

It remains to inquire whether the allowance of a sum in gross in lieu of dower in the land itself, or of the interest on one-third of the purchase money, might legally be made.

This must be considered as a compromise between the plaintiffs and the defendant, Deane. His assent being averred in the bill, and the bill being taken pro confesso as to him, this may be considered as an arrangement to which he has consented. This, however, cannot affect the other defendants. They have a right to insist that, instead of a sum in gross, one-third of the purchase money shall be set apart and the interest thereof paid annually to the tenant in dower during her life.

If the parties all concur in preferring a sum in gross to the decree which the court has a right to make, still it is uncertain on what principle seven years were taken as the value of the life of the tenant in dower. It is probably a reasonable estimate, but this court does not perceive on what principles it was made, nor does the record furnish the means of judging of its reasonableness.

This court is of opinion that there is error in the decree of the Circuit Court in not requiring 381] the plaintiff, *Susanna, to elect between dower and the estate devised to her by her late husband, and in not allowing profits on her dower estate if she shall elect to take dower. The decree is to be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the following decree:

This court is of opinion that the plaintiff, Susanna, is not barred of her right of dower in the lands of which her late husband, Lewis Hipkins, died seized, but that she cannot hold both her dower and the property to which she may be entitled under the will of the said Lewis. She ought therefore to have made her election either to adhere to her legal rights and renounce those under the will, or to adhere to the will and renounce her legal rights, before a decree could be made in her favor.

This court is further of opinion that the plaintiff, Susanna, having been in possession of her dower by the receipt of rent for several years after the death of her late husband, is, in the event of her electing to adhere to her claim of dower, entitled to receive from the estate of P. R. Fendall the profits which have accrued on her dower estate in his possession from the time when he ceased to pay the same, until the sale was made to the defendant, Joseph Deane, and is entitled to receive from the said Joseph Deane the profits which have accrued thereon since the same was sold and conveyed to him, to ascertain which an account ought to be directed. And the court is further of opinion that an account ought also to be directed to ascertain how much the said Susanna has received from the estate of her late husband, and what profits she has received from the estate devised to her in his will; all which must be deducted from her claim for dower.

The court is further of opinion that if the parties, or either of them, shall be dissatisfied with the allotment of a sum in gross, and shall prefer to have one-third part of the purchase money, given by the said Joseph Deane for the lands in which the plaintiff, Susanna, claims dower, set apart and secured to her for her life, so that she may receive during life the interest 382] accruing thereon, *and shall apply to the Circuit Court to reform its decree in this respect, the same ought to be done.

It is the opinion of this court that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria in determining that the plaintiff, Susanna, was entitled to dower in the estate of her late husband, Lewis Hipkins, deceased, but that there is error in not requiring her to elect between her dower and the provision made for her in the will of her late husband, and in not decreeing profits on the same. This court doth therefore reverse and annul the said decree; and doth remand the cause to the said Circuit Court with instructions to reform the said decree according to the directions herein contained.

THE CARGO OF THE BRIG AURORA, BURNSIDE, CLAIMANT, v. THE UNITED STATES.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

The legislature may make the revival of an act depend upon a future event, and direct that event to be made known by proclamation. When an act of Congress is revived by a subsequent act, it is revived precisely in that form, and with that effect, which it had at the moment when it expired.

The non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809, was, by force of the act of May 1, 1810, and the President's proclamation of Nov. 2d, 1810, revived on the 2d of February, 1811.

In a libel, it is not necessary to state any fact which constitutes the defense of the claimant.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court for the District of Orleans, condemning the cargo of the brig Aurora, for having been imported from Great Britain, in violation of the 4th and 5th sections of the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809, (vol. 9, p. 243), which it was contended were in force against Great Britain, on the 20th of February, 1811, (when this cargo was seized), by virtue of the act of May 1st, 1810. (vol. 10, p. 186), and the President's proclamation of November 2d, 1810.

By the fourth section of the act of March 1st, 1809, it is enacted, "that from and after "the 20th day of May next, it shall not be law- "ful to import into the United States *or [383 "the territories thereof, any goods, wares or "merchandise whatever, from any port or place "situated in Great Britain or Ireland, or in "any of the colonies or dependencies of Great "Britain, nor from any port or place situated "in France, or in any of her colonies or de- "pendencies, nor from any port or place in the "actual possession of either Great Britain or "France."

By the 5th section of the same act it is enacted, "that whenever any article or articles, the "importation of which is prohibited by this "act, shall, after the 20th of May, be imported "into the United States or the territories there- "of, contrary to the true intent and meaning "of this act," 'all such articles' "shall be for- "feited."

By the 11th section of the same act, it is provided, "that the President of the United States "be, and he hereby is authorized, in case either "France or Great Britain shall so revoke or mod- "ify her edicts, as that they shall cease to vio- "late the neutral commerce of the United "States, to declare the same by proclamation; "after which the trade suspended by this act "and by the act laying an embargo," &c., "may be renewed with the nation so doing."

This act was to continue in force only to the end of the then next session of Congress, but the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 17th and 18th sections were, by the act of June 28th, 1809, continued to the end of the next session.

On the 19th of April, 1809, in consequence of the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, the President issued his proclamation declaring that Great Britain had so revoked her edicts, &c., whereby the law ceased to operate against her. But in consequence of the disavowal of Mr. Erskine's arrangement by the British government, that proclamation was afterwards revoked.

The act of 1st of March, 1809, expired with the session of Congress, on the 1st of May, 1810, on which day Congress passed an act (vol. 10, p. 186), the 4th section of which enacted, "that in case either Great Britain or "France shall, before the third day of March 384 "*next, so revoke or modify her edicts, "as that they shall cease to violate the neutral "commerce of the United States, which fact "the President of the United States shall de- "clare by proclamation, and if the other nation "shall not within three months thereafter so "revoke or modify her edicts in like manner, "then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, "eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections "of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the "commercial intercourse between the United "States and Great Britain and France, and "their dependencies, and for other purposes,' "shall, from and after the expiration of three "months from the date of the proclamation "aforesaid be revived, and have full force and "effect, so far as relates to the dominions, col- "onies, and dependencies of the nation thus "refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify "her edicts in manner aforesaid. And the re- "strictions imposed by this act shall, from the "date of such proclamation, cease and be dis- "continued in relation to the nation revoking "or modifying her decrees in manner afore- "said."

On the 2d of November, 1810, the President issued his proclamation, declaring that France had so revoked or modified her edicts, as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States.

By the act of March 2d, 1811, (vol. 10, p. 346, sec. 1), it is enacted, "that no vessel owned "wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United "States, which shall have departed from a "British port prior to the 2d day of February, "1811, and no merchandise owned wholly by "a citizen or citizens of the United States, im- "ported in such vessel, shall be liable to seiz- "ure or forfeiture, on account of any infrac- "tion, or presumed infraction of the provisions "of the act to which this is a supplement," (the act of May 1st, 1810.)

The second section provides that in case Great Britain should so revoke or modify her edicts, &c., the President shall declare the same by proclamation.

The 3d section enacts, that until the proclamation aforesaid "shall have been issued, the "several provisions of the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 385 "7th, 8th, 9th, 10th and *18th sections "of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict,' "&c., (the act of March 1st, 1809,) "shall have "full force, and be immediately carried into "effect against Great Britain, her colonies and "dependencies."

The Aurora cleared out from Liverpool on the 11th of December, 1810, sailed on the 16th, and arrived at New Orleans, between the 2d and the 20th of February, 1811. The President's proclamation of 2d of Nov., 1810, was known in Liverpool on the 13th of December.

Joseph R. Ingersoll, for appellant.

Here was no intent to violate the law. The vessel cleared out before the proclamation was known in Liverpool, and a knowledge of that fact is not brought home to her. But if it had been, it was impossible for her to know whether Great Britain would not, before the 2d of February, revoke her obnoxious orders in council, so that the law would never come into operation, even if the President could, by proclamation, call it into existence. And the law, if it should take effect, was not to go into operation until "the 20th of May next." When was the 20th of May next? If the law was revived by the proclamation, it could not be revived until the 2d of February, 1811. It was to be considered as being re-enacted on that day. The 20th of May next, therefore, meant to the 20th of May, 1811. The words of the act of May 1st, 1810, are, "shall from and after the expira- "tion of three months from the date of the "proclamation aforesaid, be revived, and have "full force and effect." The provision that it should begin to operate on the 20th of May next, was as much a part of the law as any other of its provisions. It was the intention of the legislature that some warning should be given to the citizens of the United States, so that they might by possibility avoid forfeiture under it. But if that provision be not adopted as well as the others, it was impossible to avoid the penalties of the law; for until the 2d of February, it would at all events be lawful to import, and until after that day it would be impossible to know that Great Britain had not revoked her edicts, so that if the law was to take effect on that *day it would be impossible for [*386 the most innocent and most wary to escape punishment.

This could not have been the intention of the legislature. Effect ought, if possible, to be given to the words, after the 20th of May next; and the most matured construction is that the legislature meant the 20th of May next following the day, when the act should become absolute, by the happening of the contingency on which its existence was to depend. A contrary construction would attribute to the legislature the most flagrant injustice—that of punishing a man under a law of which it was impossible he should have had a knowledge.

Who ever heard of a conditional penal law, the condition of which was to be decided by the party, and which it was impossible for him to decide until after the law became absolute? The President was not authorized to decide it. Every man was to ascertain the fact for himself.

But Congress could not transfer the legislative power to the President. To make the revival of a law depend upon the President's proclamation, is to give to that proclamation the force of a law. Congress meant to reserve to themselves the power of ascertaining when the condition should have been performed. This is to be inferred from the act of March 2d, 1811, by which it is enacted, that until

Great Britain shall so revoke her edicts, &c., and until that fact shall be proclaimed by the President, the enumerated sections of the act of March 1st, 1809, interdicting, &c., "shall have full force, and be (i. e., shall be) immediately carried into effect." These expressions strongly imply that those sections of the act were not already in full force, and had not been carried into effect.

But the 1st section of the act of March 2d, 1811, protects from forfeiture all American vessels and goods which sailed from Great Britain before the 2d of February. The information in this case does not deny that the goods are bona fide American property; and the answer of Burnside calls the Aurora an American brig—speaks of the return voyage, and states himself to be of New Orleans. The 387] bill of lading is also on account *and risk of an American citizen. It is therefore to be inferred that the property was American, and therefore not liable to forfeiture.

John Law, contra.

The proclamation was known in Liverpool three days before the Aurora sailed, and must be presumed to have been known by the master.

The 20th of May referred to in the act was the 20th of May, 1809, which had passed when the law of May 1st, 1810, was enacted, and when the act of March 1st, 1809, expired.

The legislature meant to revive the law as it existed on the day of its expiration. The words "after the 20th of May next," were at that time of no effect, and were as inoperative as if they had been expunged from the law.

The legislature did not transfer any power of legislation to the President. They only prescribed the evidence which should be admitted of a fact, upon which the law should go into effect.

The evidence is not sufficient to show the cargo to be American property.

Feb. 26th. JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a decision of the District Court of Orleans, on a libel preferred against the goods in question, under the non-intercourse acts of March 1st, 1809, and May 1st, 1810.

These goods were claimed by Robert Burnside, a citizen of Orleans, as his property, and the material questions in the cause are,

1st. Is the property American, in which case it is exempted from forfeiture, by a subsequent law, viz., of March 2d, 1811.

388*] *2d. Was the act of 1st March, 1809, revived by the President's proclamation at all, and if revived, did it commence its operation on the 2d of February, or on the 20th May following the time of issuing that proclamation?

On the question of fact, the court are of opinion that the evidence is not sufficient to prove the property American. The national character of the property the claimant might easily have established by his correspondence, and the examination of witnesses in Europe. No such evidence is resorted to. The bill of lading alone is resorted to, on which it is said to be shipped on account of a citizen of the United States, and consigned to Burnside, but the name of the owner is not inserted. Here again the defect of evidence may have been supplied by evidence who this citizen was, but no such evidence is adduced.

In the examination of the two clerks of John Rason & Co., of Liverpool, it is simply stated that these goods were shipped by John Richardson, of Liverpool, but on whose account they do not state, nor does it appear that they were examined to that point.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the absence of proof which might so easily have been supplied, will authorize a conclusion that the property was not American.

On the second point, we can see no sufficient reason why the legislature should not exercise its discretion in reviving the act of March 1st, 1809, either expressly or conditionally, as their judgment should direct. The 19th section of that act declaring that it should continue in force to a certain time, and no longer, could not restrict their power of extending its operation without limitation upon the occurrence of any subsequent combination of events.

On the question when the operation of the 4th section of the act should commence, we are of opinion that by reviving an act, the legislature must be understood to give it, from the time of its revival, precisely that force and effect which it had at the moment when it expired; *and that a suspended operation [389 to the 20th May would be wholly inconsistent with the words made use of in the 4th section of the act of May, 1810, viz., "shall be revived and have full force and operation," and therefore, that its operation commenced on the 2d of February, 1811.

Some objections have been made to the sufficiency of the libel, because it does not negative the fact of American property. But on that subject, we are of opinion, that in no case can it be necessary to state in a libel any fact which constitutes the defense of the claimant, or a ground of exception of the operation of the law on which the libel is founded.

THE SCHOONER HOPPET AND CARGO v. THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., and TODD, J.

Wines, the produce of France, imported into the United States before the non-intercourse act, re-exported to a Danish Island, there sold to a merchant of that place, and thence exported to New Orleans during the operation of that act of Congress, were liable to forfeiture under that law.

An information in the admiralty for a forfeiture must contain a substantial statement of the offense. A general reference to the provisions of the statute is not sufficient. If the information be defective in that respect, the defect is not cured by evidence of the facts omitted to be averred in the information.

The decree must be secundum allegata, as well as secundum probata.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the District Court for the District of Orleans (exercising the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States), condemning the schooner Hoppet and her cargo as forfeited to the United States under the act of Congress of March 1, 1809, (vol. 9, p. 243), entitled "An act to inter-

"dict the commercial intercourse between the "United States and Great Britain and France "and their dependencies, and for other pur- "poses."

The 4th section of that act makes it unlawful "to import into the United States or the terri- "tories thereof, from any foreign port or place "whatever, any goods, wares or merchandise "whatever, being of the growth, produce or "manufacture of France or of any of her col- "onies or dependencies," or of any country in the possession of France.

By the 5th section it is enacted, "that when- "ever any article or articles, the importation of "which is prohibited by this act, shall, after

390*] "the 20th of May, be imported *into "the United States or the territories thereof, "contrary to the true intent and meaning of "this act, such articles, as well as all other ar- "ticles on board the same ship or vessel belong- "ing to the owner of such prohibited articles, "shall be forfeited."

And by the 6th section it is enacted, "that if "any article or articles, the importation of "which is prohibited by this act, shall, after "the 20th of May, be put on board of any ship "or vessel,' 'with intention to import the same "into the United States or the territories "thereof, contrary to the true intent and mean- "ing of this act, and with the knowledge of "the owner or master of such ship or vessel,' "such ship or vessel shall be forfeited."

The information against the vessel did not aver that the goods were put on board the ves- sel with intention to import the same into the United States or the territories thereof contrary to the act, with the knowledge of the owner or master of the vessel; nor did the information against the cargo state that such of the goods as were not prohibited belonged to the owner of the prohibited goods; but both informations averred generally that the goods were imported contrary to the 4th, 5th and 6th sections of the act.

It appeared from the evidence and admissions in the case that the wines, which constituted the principal part of the cargo, were the prod- uce of France, and had been shipped from New York to the Danish island of St. Bartholo- mews, where they were purchased by a mer- chant of that place and shipped to New Orleans. It did not appear certainly whether they had been imported into New York since the 20th of May referred to in the act of Congress.

Harper, for the appellants,

Contended that it was probable from all the circumstances that the wines had been imported into the United States before the prohibition, and if so they had become incorporated with the general commerce of the country, and had lost their national character as French prod- uce. He also insisted on the defect in the in- formations, as stated above.

391*] *_Pinkney_, Attorney-General, and Law, contra.

The letter of the law is too plain to admit of construction. These wines never could cease to be the produce of France. They were im- ported from a foreign place into a territory of the United States during the prohibition by law. If they had acquired an American charac- ter, it was lost by receiving the drawback. It does not appear that they were imported into New York before the prohibition. If they had been, the proof was so easy that the want of it creates the strongest presumption that the fact was not so.

The intent is only to be known by the act of the owners. They were bound to know the laws of the country to which they were trading. It is sufficient for the United States to prove a knowledge that the goods were put on board for that voyage.

Feb. 27th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from a sentence of the Court for the District of Orleans condemning the schooner Hoppet and her cargo, as forfeited to the United States for violating the non-inter- course law.

In the District Court two informations were filed by the attorney for the United States, one claiming the ship as being forfeited, and the other claiming the cargo. Objections have been made to each of these informations which will be separately considered.

The information against the vessel charges in substance, that while the act entitled "An act to interdict commercial intercourse," &c., was in force, certain goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France, were imported into the United States, to wit: into the port of New Orleans, in the said vessel, from some foreign port or place, to wit: from St. Bartholomews, contrary to, and in violation of the 4th, 5th and 6th sections of the act. By reason of which, and by virtue of the act of Congress entitled "An act, &c., the said vessel her tackle, ap- parel and furniture have become forfeited to the United States.

*The charge contained in this inform- [*392 ation, and the only charge it contains, is an im- portation into the United States of certain pro- hibited articles while the prohibitory act was in force. How far does this crime affect the vessel?

This question must be answered by the law. The 6th section of the act enacts in substance, that if any article, the importation of which is prohibited, shall be put on board of any ship, &c., with intention to import the same into the United States or the territories thereof, con- trary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and with the knowledge of the owner or mas- ter of such ship, &c., such ship, &c., shall be forfeited.

This is the only section of the act which im- poses a forfeiture on the vessel. It will be per- ceived that the crime consists in the prohibited articles being laden on board a ship with intent to be imported into the United States, and with the knowledge of the owner or master of the vessel. A union of a lading with the intention to import, and with the knowledge of the owner or master, is necessary to constitute the crime. Without these essential ingredients, the par- ticular offense, which alone incurs a forfeiture, cannot be committed.

In the information under consideration neither of these offenses is charged. It is neither al- leged that the prohibited goods were put on board the ship with intention to be imported into the United States, nor with the knowledge of the owner or master.

The information against the cargo charges in substance, that certain prohibited articles and certain other articles not stated to be prohibited, were brought into the United States, to wit: into the port of New Orleans, while the act entitled "An act to interdict commercial intercourse," &c., was in force, from some foreign port or place, by reason of which, and by virtue of the act, the whole cargo of the Hoppet has become forfeited.

The 5th section of the act, under which this prosecution was sustained, inflicts forfeiture on the prohibited articles imported contrary to law, and also on "all other articles on board the same 393] ship or vessel, boat, *raft or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles."

The innocent articles are liable to forfeiture only where they belong to the owner of the prohibited articles. It is this association, and this alone, which constitutes their crime. Their being in the same vessel exposes them to no forfeiture unless they belong to the same person. In the case under consideration, the information does not allege that the innocent and the prohibited articles did belong to the same person.

The first question made for the consideration of the court is this: Will this information support a sentence of condemnation pronounced against the vessel and the innocent part of the cargo?

That the information states a case by which no forfeiture of the ship or the innocent part of the cargo has been incurred, unless its defectiveness be cured by the allegation that the act was done contrary to and in violation of the provisions of the statute, has been already fully shown.

It is not controverted that in all proceedings in courts of common law, either against the person or the thing for penalties or forfeitures, the allegation that the act charged was committed in violation of law, or of the provisions of a particular statute will not justify condemnation, unless, independent of this allegation, a case be stated which shows that the law has been violated. The reference to the statute may direct the attention of the court, and of the accused, to the particular statute by which the prosecution is to be sustained, but forms no part of the description of the offense. The importance of this principle to a fair administration of justice, to that certainty introduced and demanded by the free genius of our institutions in all prosecutions for offenses against the laws, is too apparent to require elucidation, and the principle itself is too familiar not to suggest itself to every gentleman of the profession.

Does this rule apply to informations in a court of admiralty?

394*] *It is not contended that all those technical nicetics which are unimportant in themselves, and standing only on precedents of which the reason cannot be discerned, should be transplanted from the courts of common law into the courts of admiralty. But a rule so essential to justice and fair proceeding as that which requires a substantial statement of the offense upon which the prosecution is founded, must be the rule of every court where justice is the object, and cannot be satisfied by a general reference to the provisions of a statute. It would require a series of clear and unequivocal precedents to show that this rule is dispensed with in courts of admiralty, sitting for the trial of offenses against municipal law.

It is, upon these and other reasons, the opinion of the court, that the information is not made good by the allegation that the offense was committed against the provisions of certain sections of the act of Congress.

Is it cured by any evidence showing that in point of fact the vessel and cargo are liable to forfeiture?

The rule that a man shall not be charged with one crime and convicted of another, may sometimes cover real guilt, but its observance is essential to the preservation of innocence. It is only a modification of this rule, that the accusation on which the prosecution is founded, should state the crime which is to be proved, and state such a crime as will justify the judgment to be pronounced.

The reasons for this rule are,

1st. That the party accused may know against what charge to direct his defense.

2. That the court may see with judicial eyes that the fact, alleged to have been committed, is an offense against the laws, and may also discern the punishment annexed by law to the specific offense. These reasons apply to prosecutions in courts of admiralty with as much force as to prosecutions in other courts. It is therefore a maxim of the civil law that a decree must be secundum alegata as well as secundum probata. It would *seem to be a [395 maxim essential to the due administration of justice in all courts.

It is the opinion of the court that this information will not justify a sentence condemning the schooner Hoppet and that part of her cargo which is not alleged to be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of either France or Great Britain, or the dependencies of either of those powers, whatever the fact may be.

There are certain wines imported in this vessel alleged to be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of France. These wines were exported from the United States to St. Bartholomews, where they were purchased by the consignee and shipped to New Orleans. It is contended, that having been imported into the United States previous to the passage of the non-intercourse law, their exportation and reimportation does not subject them to the penalties of that law. But the court is unanimously of opinion that they come completely within the provisions of the act of Congress.

It is the opinion of the court, that there is no error in that part of the sentence of the District Court of Orleans which condemns the wines in the information mentioned as forfeited to the United States, but that there is error in that part of the sentence which condemns the schooner Hoppet and the residue of her cargo.

This court doth therefore adjudge and order that so much of the sentence of the District Court as condemns the schooner Hoppet and the thirty-five hogsheads of molasses, five barrels of molasses, twelve dozen of cocoa-nuts and twelve pounds of starch, part of the cargo of the said schooner, be and the same is hereby reversed and annulled; and the said sentence as to the residue of the cargo, is in all things affirmed.

396*] *THE MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY

v.

KORN AND WISEMILLER.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

The proprietors of buildings in Alexandria, insured by the society, were bound by the act of assembly of Virginia passed in 1805, and the subsequent regulations of the society, to pay an additional premium upon the increased rate of hazard according to the new regulations of 1805.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

The Mutual Assurance Society against fire, &c., was incorporated by an act of the legislature of Virginia in 1795.

According to the original plan of the institution the houses in the towns and country were blended together in one general mass, and were mutually pledged to each other, to make good the losses which might be respectively sustained by fire.

In January, 1805, the legislature of Virginia, at the request of the society, passed a law changing the original plan of the institution, by separating the town buildings from those in the country, and making the town buildings liable only for town losses, and the country buildings for country losses. This law directed that there should be a revaluation of the buildings which had been previously insured; and authorized the society, as in the first instance, to fix the rates of hazard, and make such by-laws, rules and regulations as they might think proper.

The society was authorized to recover its debts by motion, in a summary manner.

Under the act of 1805 the society made a new tariff of rates of hazard.

The houses of the defendants were revalued under the act. The revaluation was less than the original valuation; but the rate of hazard, or in other words, the premium for the insurance, was increased under the new regulation.

397*] *By the third section of a by-law of the society made in January, 1805, under the authority of their original act of incorporation and of the act of 1805, it is enacted, that if the "revaluation of any building shall prove it to "be of less value than that at which it was in- "sured, there shall be no demand against the "society of restitution of any part of the "premium which may have been paid, and the "proprietor of such building shall pay the ad- "ditional premium (if the materials of which "his building be erected, or its contiguity re- "quire it) which according to the new rates of "hazard ought to be paid."

In July, 1805, the defendants, Korn and Wisemiller, agreeably to a form prescribed by the society, made a declaration, under their hands and seals, as follows: "We do hereby "declare and affirm, that we hold the above "mentioned buildings, with the land on which "they stand, in fee-simple, and that they are "not, nor shall be insured elsewhere, and that "we will abide, observe and adhere to the "constitution, rules and regulations, which "are already established, or may hereafter be "established by a majority of the insured, pres- "ent in person or by representatives, or by the "majority of the property insured, represented "either by the persons themselves, or their "proxy duly authorized, or their deputy, as "established by law, at any general meeting to "be held by the said assurance society; or "which are or hereafter may be established by "the president and directors of the society."

To this declaration were annexed a plat, description and new valuation of the buildings insured.

The buildings had been originally insured by the defendants in the year 1796.

The sum now claimed of the defendants was for the additional premium arising out of the increased rates of hazard according to the new regulations, made in January, 1805.

Swann, for the plaintiffs in error.

This case differs from that of Atkinson (ante, vol. 6, p. 202), which was for an additional premium occasioned *by the increased [398 valuation of the building; this is for the additional premium upon the new rates of hazard.

In the former case between these same parties (ante, vol. 6, p. 192), it was decided by this court that the proprietors of houses in Alexandria, still continued members of the society, notwithstanding their separation from the state of Virginia, and were bound by all the by laws and regulations of the society.

The only remaining question is whether the defendants are liable for the new rates of premium. It was just that the old members and the new should stand on the same ground and pay the same rates of premium where the risk was the same. This point has never been disputed in Virginia.

C. Lee, contra.

The former case has settled the point that the defendants are bound by their original contract in 1796. The legislature had no right to alter or vacate that contract. There was nothing unjust or hard in the case. The additional premium ought to be confined to cases of excess upon revaluation.

Swann, in reply.

The act of Assembly of 1805 was passed at the request of the society, of which the defendants were members, and bound by the acts of the majority.

March 3d. JOHNSON J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In the case decided between Atkinson and these plaintiffs, February term, 1810, the question arose on the construction of the 7th section of the act of 1805, and the additional premium in that case was imposed upon a revaluation without relation to a change in the rates of premium, but resulting from the increased valuation.

In this case the sum demanded arises from the changes made in the rates of premium, arising from a *variation of risk; to equal- [399 ize which the 8th article of the present rules of the society requires an additional per centage to be paid by the present members of the company, in conformity to what is to be imposed upon subsequent applicants for insurance. And it is contended that the contract being complete between the parties, the insurers cannot add to the consideration to be paid for insurance. In general this doctrine is unquestionably correct, but peculiar circumstances except this from ordinary cases. This subject was considered in the quoted case decided between these same parties in February, 1810. It is there laid down, and on reflection we are confirmed in the opinion, that in the capacity of an individual of the body corporate the defendants are bound by the by-laws of the society as far as is consistent with the nature of its institution.

This case is within the 4th section of the 8th article of those by-laws, and therefore the judgment below ought to have been for the plaintiffs.

Judgment reversed.

WEBSTER AND FORD v. HOBAN.

Present—All the judges except TODD, J.

Upon a sale of land at auction, if the terms be that the purchaser shall within 30 days give his notes with two good indorsers, and if he shall fail to comply within the 30 days, then the land to be resold on account of the first purchaser, the vendor cannot maintain an action against the vendee for a breach of the contract, until a resale shall have ascertained the deficit, although the vendee should instruct an attorney to draw a deed, and insert his name as purchaser.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in a special action on the case, by the plaintiffs in error, against the defendant in error, for not paying the purchase money for a house sold by the plaintiffs to the defendant, at public auction.

The premises were publicly advertised, and set up at auction by a licensed auctioneer. On the day of sale, certain written articles, purporting to exhibit the terms, were read aloud by the auctioneer in the presence and hearing of the defendant and others assembled upon that occasion, and the paper was also handed round and read by those present. Of those articles, three only require notice.

400*] *Art. 1st, declares that the highest bidder shall be the purchaser.

Art. 3d, requires that the purchaser should secure the purchase money, with interest included, by his promissory notes, with two approved indorsers, payable in six and twelve months.

Art. 5th, declares that the purchaser shall be allowed "thirty days to comply with the 3d "article, at which time (in case of compli- "ance) he shall receive a good and complete "title to the property. On failing to comply "within the 30 days, the property then to be "resold on account of the first purchaser."

The premises were struck off to the defendant, as the highest bidder, at the price of 4,000 dollars; whereupon the auctioneer, in the presence of the defendant, signed a certificate, at the foot of the articles of sale, declaring him to be the purchaser at that price.

An attorney was employed to draw a deed of bargain and sale, and received instructions for that purpose, both from the plaintiffs and defendant; the draft of the deed, with blanks for the date and the name of the grantee, was presented to the defendant, and left with him for inspection; after examining it, he returned it to the attorney, requesting him to insert his, the defendant's, name in the proper blanks, which he accordingly did. This draught of the deed recited the title of the plaintiffs, and that the defendant, being the highest bidder, had purchased the premises at the sum of 4,000 dollars, which he had secured to be paid to the plaintiff's, according to the terms of sale.

The breach of the agreement alleged in the declaration, was, that the defendant had failed to give his promissory notes within the 30 days, or at any time afterwards.

The court below decided that the plaintiffs could maintain no action upon the contract, without first resorting to a resale and ascertaining the deficit.

Jones, for the plaintiffs in error, contended,

1. That the remedy by a resale was cumulative, *and did not take away the right [401 of action for a breach of the original contract.

2. That the draught of the deed (as to its collateral effect, as written evidence of the agreement) having been authenticated by an act equivalent to signing, imported a substantative and positive agreement to go on with the contract, and to complete the purchase, and was not subject to be explained or controlled by the original terms.

The authority to contract, he said, might be by parol, although the contract must be in writing. (Roberts on frauds, 112; Sugden on vendors, 56.) Hoban gave the attorney verbal authority to draw the deed, which amounts to an agreement in writing signed.

There was no argument for the defendant in error.

March 3d. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

If there ever existed a valid agreement between these parties in relation to the house in question, on which the court gives no opinion, the terms of it must be sought for in the articles exhibited by the auctioneer, at the time of sale. Of these, two only bear on this case. These were, "that the purchaser should secure the "purchase money with interest by his promis- "sory notes, with two approved indorsers, pay- "able in 6 and 12 months;" and "that the "purchaser should be allowed thirty days to "comply with these terms, at which time, in "case of compliance, he was to receive a good "and complete title to the property, and on "failing to comply within the thirty days, the "property was then to be resold on account of "the first purchaser."

The plaintiffs offered no evidence of any resale, or of any deficiency arising thereon, but contended, that the remedy by a resale was merely cumulative, and did not take away the right of action against the defendant, for his violation of the contract. Such is not the opinion of this court. The vendee, by the terms of sale, had an option of taking the estate after it was bid off to him, and in case of refusal, of having it sold again *on his account. [402 It might have produced more than on the first sale, in which case the surplus would have belonged to him; or the same price might have been obtained, and then he would have lost nothing, or it might have sold for less, and then by paying the difference which would have formed his whole loss, he would have been exposed, as he must be, if this action proceeds, to have damages assessed against him, by some uncertain and arbitrary or unsatisfactory rule, which might be adopted by a jury. Of these advantages which were reserved to him by the terms of the auction, the plaintiff had no right to deprive him. The court is further of opinion, that nothing whichwas done after the sale at all varied the right of the parties.

The judgment below is affirmed with costs.

THE MARYLAND INSURANCE CO. v. WOOD.

The letter of Mr. Merry to the Secretary of State, of the 12th of April, 1804, extended to the Island of Curraçoa, the order of the lords commissioners of the admiralty of the 5th of January, 1804, respecting the blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant on a policy upon the schooner William and Mary "at and from Baltimore to Laguira, with liber- "ty of one other neighboring port, and at and "from them or either of them back to Balti- "more." "Warranted by the assured to be an "American bottom, proof of which to be re- "quired in the United States only."

The former judgment of the Circuit Court in this case having been reversed (see ante, vol. 6, p. 29), and the cause remanded for a new trial, the verdict and judgment were again in favor of the original plaintiff. The defendants took only one bill of exceptions, which stated the execution of the policy, the sailing of the vessel with proper documents as an American bottom from Baltimore on the 8th of March, 1805, upon the voyage insured; her arrival off Laguira on the 24th of the same month, where she remained three days laying off and on, vainly endeavoring to obtain permission to enter the port, and on the 31st sailed towards the 403] port of *Amsterdam, in the Island of Curraçoa, by the direct and accustomed route, with a view and intention of ascertaining by inquiry of British ships of war, or other vessels, whether the port of Amsterdam was then in a state of blockade, and to enter it if it should not be blockaded, but if it should be blockaded, not to attempt to enter it, but to proceed to St. Thomas's or Porto Rico. That Amsterdam was a neighboring port to Laguira, being distant about 147 miles. That when she approached Amsterdam, being distant about 30 miles, the master discovered a British vessel at the distance of 21 miles, whereupon he altered the course of the schooner, and stood directly toward the British vessel for the purpose of inquiring whether Amsterdam was still in a state of blockade; that while so standing for the British vessel, which was a frigate then actually supporting the blockade of the port of Amsterdam, the schooner was captured by the frigate and sent into Jamaica, and there condemned for breach of the blockade of the port of Amsterdam, whereby she was wholly lost to the plaintiff. That on the 16th of May, 1805, the plaintiff having received intelligence of the capture, abandoned the vessel in due time to the underwriters, who refused to accept the abandonment.

That on the 27th of October, 1803, the government of the United States made to the British government, through its charge d'affairs in the United States, a representation on the subject of a blockade, then recently notified, of the Islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe; which representation is set forth at large in the bill of exceptions, being a letter from Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Thornton, the British charge d'affairs, dated the 27th of October, 1803.

That on the 5th of January, 1804, the British government, in consequence of that representation, issued an order to its commanding naval officer in the West Indies and to its courts of vice-admiralty there, relative to the blockade of Martinique and Guadaloupe; which order is as follows:

"Admiralty office, 5th January, 1804.

Sir:—Having communicated to the lords of the admiralty Lord Hawkesbury's letter of the 23d ult., inclosing the *copy of a dispatch, [404 which his lordship had received from Mr. Thornton, his majesty's charge d'affairs in America, on the subject of the blockade of the Islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, together with the report of the Advocate-General thereupon, I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you for his lordships' information, that they have sent orders to Commodore Hood not to consider any blockade of those Islands as existing unless in respect of particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports unless they shall have been previously warned not to enter them; and that they have also sent the necessary directions on the subject to the judges of the vice-admiralty courts in the West Indies and America. I am, &c.,

EVAN NEPEAN.

George Hammond, Esq."

That on the 12th of April, 1804, the British government, by its minister plenipotentiary in the United States, communicated the aforesaid order to the government of the United States, who caused it to be immediately published in the public newspapers.

That on the same 12th of April, 1804, the said British minister plenipotentiary officially made known to the government of the United States, that the siege of the island of Curraçoa had been converted into a blockade, which communication was as follows:

"Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison.

Washington, April 12th, 1804.

Sir:—I have the honor to acquaint you that I have just received a letter from Rear-admiral Sir John Duckworth, commander-in-chief of his majesty's squadron at Jamaica, dated the second of last month, in which he desires me to communicate to the government of the United States, that he has found it expedient for his majesty's service to convert the siege which he lately attempted of Curraçoa into a blockade of that island.

*I cannot doubt, sir, that this blockade [405 will be conducted conformably to the instructions which (as I have the honor to acquaint you in another letter of this date), have been recently sent on this subject to the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's forces, and to the judges of the vice-admiralty courts in the West Indies, should the smallness of the Island of Curraçoa still render necessary any distinction of the investment being confined to particular ports. I have the honor to be, &c.,

ANT. MERRY."

That Travers, the master of the schooner William and Mary, heard a report at Baltimore, before he sailed, that Amsterdam was in a state of blockade; and that he was informed, before he sailed from Baltimore, by the master of an American vessel, that about four months before the time of giving that information, he arrived with his vessel near the port of Amsterdam, and there met with a squadron of British ships of war then blockading that port, and was warned off by the commander of the squadron, with his register indorsed in the usual manner.

That Travers in the course of his voyage fell in with a strong French squadron in lat. 15, long. 63, which was sailing westward. That the port of Amsterdam is in lat. 11 deg. 55 min., long. 68.

That while laying off Laguira to endeavor to obtain permission to enter the port, or to anchor his vessel, he was informed by a merchant at Laguira, to whom he had been introduced by a letter, and through whom he made application for permission as aforesaid, that the port of Amsterdam was then free from blockade; and was advised by the said merchant to proceed thither with his vessel, that the port of Laguira and all the ports on the Spanish main were then shut against foreigners, whereby he was prevented from going on shore and from making inquiries otherwise than by writing from his vessel to some person on shore.

That the island of Buenos Ayres was then a dependency of Curraçoa, distant from it about 406] twenty miles east, and *is a small island having no port, except a roadstead about the middle of its length on the east side, where there was a small battery and military post. That the cruising ground of vessels blockading Curraçoa, was between that island and Buenos Ayres, which latter was included in the blockade, as were also all the other ports of the Island of Curraçoa. That Travers did not attempt to enter the port of Amsterdam, nor sail towards it with an intention of entering it if blockaded, but merely for the purpose of ascertaining, by any lawful and proper means in his power, whether it was still in a state of blockade, of entering it if it was not, and of proceeding elsewhere if it was.

That when he sailed from Laguira as aforesaid he had, from the facts and circumstances above mentioned, reasonable ground of belief that the blockade had ceased, and had no means of obtaining any further information on the subject at any neighboring port or place.

Whereupon the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believed the matters so given in evidence by him, then his right of recovery in this action is not affected by the conduct of Travers in proceeding as aforesaid from Laguira towards Amsterdam for the purposes aforesaid; which instruction the court gave, and also the further direction, that if they should believe that Travers intended, while at Laguira, to violate the blockade of Amsterdam, and attempted it by sailing towards that port, and within the limits of the cruising ground; in such case his conduct was unlawful; and the defendants were thereby discharged from any responsibility upon the policy.

To this instruction the defendants excepted and brought their writ of error.

Martin, for plaintiffs in error.

When this case was here before, it was erroneously supposed that the order of the 5th of January, 1804, applied to the Island of Curraçoa, as well as to those of Guadaloupe and Martinique. It was not until the 12th of April following, that the blockade of Curraçoa was notified to our government by Mr. Merry, who gives *his opinion that the former order [407 would be extended to this blockade. But it is merely his opinion; he had no authority to bind his government upon that subject; and his opinion could not justify the master of this vessel in going to the blockading squadron for information.

If he acted upon the information of the minister he acted at his peril. (5 Rob., 74, 234; 1 Rob., 144; The Neptunus, 2 Rob., 92.) He ought to have called at Buenos Ayres for information. (Park, 408, 9; Marshall, 321.)

LIVINGSTON, J., thought this case could not be distinguished from the one which was here before. It appears to be only an application to this court to reverse its own decision.

STORY, J., thought the letter of Mr. Merry was conclusive upon the subject.

JOHNSON, J. It does not appear to be so clear a case as the other.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., had formed no opinion upon this case. It seemed to him to be different from the other.

Harper, for the defendant in error, requested that the opinion of the court might be given in writing.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. I understand the opinion of the court to be, that the letter of Mr. Merry puts the case on the same ground as if the blockade had been of Martinique or Guadaloupe.

Harper. That is, that it extended to this case the benefit of the order of the 5th of January, 1804.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. I so understand it.

LIVINGSTON, J., afterwards delivered the opinion of the court in writing, as follows:

It is the opinion of the court, that the communication of the British minister to the American government on the 12th of April, 1804, relative to the blockade of Curraçoa, furnished a sufficient excuse for the assured's proceeding *towards that island for the purpose of [408 inquiring as to its continuance, and that his doing so was no violation of his neutrality.

The court does not mean to be understood as giving any opinion on the effect of such conduct if no such communication had been made.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

FERGUSON v. HARWOOD.

Absent—Todd, J.

If a clerk of a court certify at the foot of a paper purporting to be a record, "that the aforegoing is truly taken from the record of proceedings" of his court, and if the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, certify that such attestation of the clerk is in due form of law, it is to be presumed that the paper so certified is a full copy of all the proceedings in the case, and is admissible in evidence.

But if the writing produced, do not purport to be a record, but a mere transcript of minutes extracted from the docket of the court, it is not admissible in evidence.

A variance is immaterial which does not change the nature of the contract.

If a bond of conveyance (then in suit) be assigned, and the assignor agree to refund to the assignee the value thereof if the property should not be recovered on the bond, it is sufficient for the assignee, in a suit against the assignor upon his promise to refund, to aver that the property was not recovered in the suit which was pending when the agreement was made to refund.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington, in an action of assumpsit, brought by Harwood against Ferguson, to recover the value of three hogsheads of tobacco, upon the following agreement (after describing the hogsheads by their numbers, marks and weights), viz.:

"Upper Marlborough, June 16th, 1808.

Received of Walter W. Harwood, as one of the administrators of William Eversfield Berry, deceased, in part of my claim against said estate, the three hogsheads of crop tobacco as above stated, to be allowed p. ct. the highest six months' credit price at this place during that time after the rescinding of the embargo. I have put into the hands of the aforesaid Walter W. Harwood a bond of conveyance given by Elisha Berry to his son, William E. Berry, dated March 14th, 1798, for the purpose of recovering the property therein mentioned now depending in a suit in Prince George's County Court. If the property is not recovered in the aforesaid bond of conveyance, I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors and administrators to return the above three hogsheads of tobacco, with legal interest, or the value thereof in money, to the aforesaid Walter W. Harwood, or to his heirs or assigns.

(Signed) ENOS D. FERGUSON."

409*] *Upon this agreement the plaintiff declared that whereas the said Walter, as one of the administrators, &c., on———at———delivered to the said Enos, in part of his claim, &c., three hogsheads of crop tobacco (describing them), he, the said Enos to be allowed per cent. therefor the highest six months' credit price, &c. And whereas also the said Enos, at——— on——— put into the hands of the aforesaid Walter, a bond of conveyance, &c., for the purpose of enabling the said Walter to recover, and of recovering the property in the said bond mentioned, a suit for the recovery whereof was then depending in the County Court of Prince George's county, in the state of Maryland, the said Enos then and there, in consideration of the premises and the delivery of the three hogsheads of tobacco as aforesaid, promised and undertook and bound himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, to return the three hogsheads of tobacco aforesaid, with legal interest, or the value thereof in money, to the aforesaid Walter or to his heirs or assigns, if the property in the aforesaid bond of conveyance mentioned was not recovered in the suit then as aforesaid depending for the recovery thereof; and the said Walter avers that the property in the said bond mentioned was not recovered from the said Elisha Berry in the suit so as aforesaid depending for the recovery thereof, but that judgment was given for and in favor of the said Elisha in said suit, whereof, and of all which premises, the said Enos afterwards had notice, whereby he became liable to return the said tobacco with legal interest or to pay the value thereof in current money of the United States, which value the said Walter avers to be 180 dollars, whereof the said Enos had notice, &c.

There was also a count in the declaration for money had and received.

Upon the trial of the general issue the defendant, Ferguson, took three bills of exceptions.

The first bill of exceptions was to the admission in evidence of an exemplification of the record of a suit in Prince George's County Court, which was certified as follows;

"I hereby certify that the aforegoing is truly taken from the record of proceedings of Prince George's *County Court, and in testi- [410 mony thereof I do hereto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the said County Court, this third day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven.

JOHN READ MAGRUDER, Jr., Clk."

The seal of the County Court was annexed, with the regular certificate of the chief judge of the court that the attestation of the clerk was in due form of law.

The objection to this exemplification was that it did not appear by the certificate of the clerk to be a full copy of the record of all the proceedings in the case. The practice of the clerk of the Circuit Court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was to certify that the "foregoing is truly taken and copied from the proceedings," &c.

The second bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiff having read to the jury the evidence mentioned in the first bill of exceptions, and which had been permitted by the court to be read, the defendant offered to read a copy of the docket entries of Prince George's County Court, which the clerk had also certified to be truly taken from the proceedings of that court. To this certificate was annexed the seal of the court and a certificate by the chief judge of the court that the attestation of the clerk was in due form of law.

The third bill of exceptions stated that after the plaintiff had read the agreement to the jury, the defendant objected to its admissibility in evidence upon the first count in the declaration, because it varied from the agreement set forth in that count. But the court was divided in opinion and the agreement was read.

The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant brought his writ of error.

F. S. Key, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the record of Prince George's County Court ought not to have been admitted as evidence in this cause, because the clerk of that court had not certified it to be a full record of all the proceedings in the case, *nor [411 even that it was a copy of anything, but had merely stated that "the foregoing was truly taken from the record of proceedings in that court."

2. That the court ought to have admitted the copy of the docket entries of Prince George's County Court to be read in evidence, because they were certified by the clerk in the same manner to be "truly taken" from the same proceedings.

3. That the court ought not to have admitted the agreement in evidence to support the first count in the declaration, because it varied from the agreement set forth in that count, in the following particulars: 1. The agreement produced in evidence states that the defendant in error, Harwood, should be allowed the highest credit price, &c., for the tobacco, whereas the agreement set forth in the count is, that the plaintiff in error, Ferguson, should be allowed the highest credit price, &c., for the tobacco: and 2. The agreement produced in evidence states that the plaintiff in error was to return the tobacco if the property should not be recovered "in the aforesaid bond of conveyance." But the count charges that the plaintiff in error, Ferguson, agreed to return the tobacco if the property, in the bond of conveyance mentioned, should not be recovered in the suit then pending for the recovery thereof.

In support of this bill of exceptions he cited the following cases: 1 T. R., 240; 2 Bos. and Pull., 116; 4 T. R., 560; 2 East, 2 and 450.

J. Law, for the defendant in error.

On the first exception, cited 2 Harris's Entries, 221, 227 and 263, to show that the clerk's certificate annexed to the transcript of the record of Prince George's County Court was in due form, according to the practice of the courts in Maryland.

On the second exception, he cited Peak's Law of Evidence, 34, 55 and 66, to show that the docket entries of one court were not evidence in another court.

On the third exception, to show how far it is necessary to set forth the agreement in the 412*] declaration, he *cited 6 East, 564, Clarke v. Marsden; 4 T. R., 558, Frith v. Gray, in the note to Drewry v. Twiss; 3 Wils., 40, Richard v. Symonds; Doug., 640, Bristow v. Wright.

And to show that words of surplusage are to be rejected, he cited 2 H. Bl., 113; 1 T. R., 235, King v. Pippett; 4 Williams's Dig., 707.

To show that omissions may be supplied, he cited King v. Beach (Cowp., 229); King v. May (Doug., 183).

And to show that a variance in an immaterial averment is not fatal, he cited 5 T. R., 496, Peppin v. Solomans; 4 T. R., 558, Drewry v. Twiss.

March 5th. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Several exceptions have been taken in this cause. The first proceeds on the ground that the record was not authenticated by the clerk in due form of law. The statute of the United States of the 26th of May, 1790, declares that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved and admitted in any other court within the United States by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form of law. It is conceded that such a certificate accompanied the record objected to. It is therefore a case within the words of the law, and the court below were precluded from receiving any other evidence to show that the attestation was not in due form of law. The record so authenticated was properly admitted in evidence.

Even if the points had been open, the court are not satisfied that any material variance existed between the attestations of the different clerks.

The court are also of opinion that the second exception cannot be sustained. The writing produced did not purport to be a record, but a mere transcript of minutes extracted from the docket of the court. There is no foundation laid to show its admissibility in the cause.

*The third exception has presented [413 the chief difficulty which we have felt in deciding the cause. It is addressed to the variances between the declaration and the contract produced in evidence. The inducement of the declaration alleges "that the said Walter, as one of the administrators of William E. Berry, deceased, on, &c., at, &c., delivered unto the said Enos, in part of his claim against the estate of the said William, three hogsheads of crop tobacco, &c., he, the said Enos, to be allowed per cent. therefor the highest six months' credit price at the place aforesaid during that time, after rescinding the embargo." The contract produced in evidence is without the words "he, the said Enos." There is therefore a literal variance, and its effect depends upon the consideration whether it materially changes the contract.

In general, courts of law lean against an extension of the principles applied to cases of variance. Mistakes of this nature are usually mere slips of attorneys, and do not touch the merits of the case. Lord Mansfield has well observed, that it is extremely hard upon the party to be turned round and put to expense from such mistakes of his counsel, and it is hard also upon the profession.

It will be recollected that this does not purport on the face of the declaration to be a description of a written instrument, nor the recital of a deed or record in hæc verba. In respect to the latter, trifling variances have been deemed fatal; but as to the former a more liberal rule has been adopted. In setting forth the material parts of a deed or other written instruments, it is not necessary to do it in letters and words. It will be sufficient to state the substance and legal effect. Whatever, however, is alleged should be truly alleged. A contract substantially different in description or effect would not support the averment of the declaration.

In the case at bar, it is very clear that the word "Enos" was by a mere slip inserted instead of "Walter." It is repugnant to the sense and meaning of the contract that the creditor who received the tobacco at a stipulated price in part payment of his debt, should allow to himself that price. From the nature of the transaction the debtor must be entitled to the allowance. *If the same words had been introduced [414 into the written contract itself, they must have been rejected as nonsensical or repugnant, or have had imposed upon them a sense exactly the same as if the words had been "the said Walter." And a declaration which should altogether have omitted the words, or have given that legal sense, would have well supported an action. Can a different result take place, where the repugnancy is not in the contract, but in the declaration? A majority of the court are clearly of opinion that it cannot. The words of a contract stated in a declaration, must have the same legal construction as they would have in the contract itself.

The context manifestly, in this case, shows the repugnancy. It is impossible to read the declaration and not to perceive that the price is to be allowed to the debtor, and not to the creditor. Many cases have been cited where the variance has been held fatal, but no one comes up to the present. The case of Bristow v. Wright (Doug., 665), is the strongest. There the demise was alleged to be at a yearly rent payable quarterly. The demise proved was without any stipulation as to the times of payment. The court held that the demise laid and that proved were not the same. But if the demise had been truly laid, and the declaration had proceeded to allege that the rent was to be paid by the lessor to the lessee, we think that the action might well have been maintained notwithstanding the repugnancy. That in effect would be the same as the present case.

In King v. Pippet (1 T. R., 235), where the declaration set forth a precept and improperly inserted the word "if," which made it conditional, the court rejected the word, and held the variance immaterial. The court said it was impossible to read the declaration and not to know what it should be. There are other cases to the like effect.

We are therefore satisfied that the variance is immaterial, because it does not change the nature of the contract, which must receive the same legal construction, whether the words be in or out of the declaration.

A second variance is supposed in the allegation that the promise was to return the tobacco 415] or its value, if *the property in the bond of conveyance mentioned in the declaration was not recovered in the suit then depending for the recovery thereof; whereas the contract produced in evidence contained no limitation to a recovery in that particular suit. We are satisfied however that the plaintiff has declared according to the true intent of the parties as apparent on the contract. It could never have been their intention to postpone the right to a return of the tobacco or its value, beyond the time of a recovery or failure in the suit then depending. Any other construction would have left the rights of the parties in suspense for an indefinite period, wholly inconsistent with the avowed objects of the contract.

On the whole, it is the opinion of the court that the judgment be affirmed with costs.

BIAYS
v.
THE CHESAPEAKE INSURANCE CO.

Absent—TODD, J.

There cannot be a total loss of part of a cargo consisting of memorandum articles of only one species (such as hides). Nor are the underwriters liable for salvage upon such articles, under the clause which authorizes the insured to labor and travel for the preservation of the cargo, unless perhaps in a case where the salvage may have prevented an actual total loss of the cargo.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance on hides, which by the memorandum in the policy are declared to be free from average, unless general. The policy contains the usual stipulation "that in case of "loss or damage, the assured shall labor, &c., "for the preservation of the property, to the "expenses of which the assurers will contribute." The voyage was to Amsterdam. The vessel arrived at a place called "Niew Diep;" where, according to the usage of the trade, the hides were put into several lighters to be sent to Amsterdam. One of these lighters sunk, but some of the hides contained in it were afterwards fished up and saved by the people of the place, for which a salvage of 6,000 dollars was allowed and paid. The rest were totally lost. This action was brought to recover for those totally lost, and for the salvage of those which were saved.

*On a case stated, the judgment of [416 the court below was for the defendants; on which the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

Harper for plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That where an insurance is made in gross, as in this case, upon a cargo consisting of a number of separate distinct things, there may be a total loss upon some of them, though the rest are saved, and

2d. That as consequently the loss here upon the hides fished up would have been total but for the labor and care of the assured, they are entitled to be reimbursed the expense, by the underwriters, under the stipulation in the policy on that subject: notwithstanding the declaration in the memorandum, exempting hides from particular average.

1. The obvious construction and meaning of the memorandum is, that where the cargo is divisible, there may be a total loss of part. The average loss mentioned is loss by deterioration. If one out of many bales of cloths should be lost, it would be a total loss of that bale. But if one piece in a bale should be damaged and lost, it would be an average loss, especially as to memorandum articles. If a cargo should consist of 500 casks of wine, and 499 of them should be lost, one only being saved, this would be a total loss of the 499 casks.

In the absence of all authority, we must resort to general principles. Such cases must have existed often; but no case is found in the books like the present. The inference is, that it must have been considered as a total loss.

2. The 2d point (as to the salvage), is perhaps a point of more difficulty; but it depends in part upon the first. Where the object of the expense is to prevent a total loss, the underwriters are liable. Here the salvage loss prevents a total loss.

If a literal construction be given to the two stipulations in the policy, one would destroy the other. The *insured are to labor to [417 prevent a total loss; not for their own benefit, for they are insured, but for the benefit of the underwriters. The loss was of part of a lighter load of hides; some were fished up and saved, and salvage paid. No expense could arise respecting these hides, unless it would come under the name of average loss. The stipulation therefore to labor, &c., would be void as to all these articles. The construction ought to be, that we will pay all expenses incurred, to prevent a greater than an average loss.

March 6th. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an insurance on hides, "warranted by "the assured free from average, unless general." The declaration is for a total loss by perils of the seas, but it came out in evidence that 3,280 hides (the whole number insured being 14,565), were put on board of a lighter to be transported from the vessel to their place of destination; that the lighter in her passage to the shore was sunk, by which accident 789 of the hides, of the value of 4,000 dollars, were totally lost, and the residue, to the number of 2,491 more, were fished up and saved, at the cost of six thousand dollars, which were paid by the plaintiff. The hides thus saved were delivered to the plaintiff's agent, and sold on his account. The whole sum insured on the cargo of hides by the defendants was twenty-five thousand dollars.

On this state of facts it has been contended, that this insurance, although on perishable commodities, being in gross on a cargo consisting of a distinct number of articles, there may be a total loss as to some of them, although others be saved, and that for the part of the cargo thus totally lost, the underwriters are liable, notwithstanding the agreement respecting what are generally called memorandum articles. In support of this position it is said that the only intention of the parties in coming to this agreement, was to obviate disputes concerning losses arising from the perishable nature of the goods insured; but that as this loss happened in another way, and is total as to the portion of the property in question, it ought not to be considered as excluded by the memorandum.

418*] *Whatever may have been the motive to the introduction of this clause into policies of insurance, which was done as early as the year 1749, and most probably with the intention of protecting the insurers against losses arising solely from a deterioration of the article, by its own perishable quality; or whatever ambignity may once have existed from the term average being used in different senses, that is as signifying a contribution to a general loss, and also a particular or partial injury falling on the subject insured, it is well understood at the present day, with respect to such articles, that underwriters are free from all partial losses of every kind, which do not arise from a contribution towards a general average. It only remains then to examine, and so the question has properly been treated at bar, whether the hides, which were sunk and not reclaimed, constituted a total or partial loss within the meaning of this policy. It has been considered as total by the counsel of the assured, but the court cannot perceive any ground for treating it in that way, inasmuch as out of many thousand hides which were on board, not quite eight hundred were lost, making in point of value somewhat less than one-sixth part of the sum insured by this policy. If there were no memorandum in the way, and the plaintiff had gone on to recover, as in that case he might have done, it is perceived at once that he must have had judgment only for a partial loss, which would have been equivalent to the injury actually sustained. But without having recourse to any reasoning on the subject, the proposition appears too self-evident not to command universal assent, that when only a part of a cargo, consisting all of the same kind of articles, is lost in any way whatever, and the residue (which in this case amounts to much the greatest part), arrives in safety at its port of destination, the loss cannot but be partial, and that this must forever be so, as long as a part continues to be less than the whole. This loss then being a particular loss only, and not resulting from a general average, the court is of opinion that the defendants are not liable for it.

Having disposed of this point, it would seem as if much difficulty could not occur in deciding the other question, which has been made in this cause, and that is: whether the assured is not entitled to recover the *expenses [419 which he was put to in saving part of the hides which had sunk.

This liability is supposed to result from that clause in the policy which authorizes the assured, "in case of any loss or damage, to sue "labor and travel for, in and about the de-"fense, safeguard and recovery of the goods, "or any part thereof, to the charges whereof "the assurers will contribute according to the "amount of the sum insured." If this clause be construed with reference to what is most evidently its subject matter, that is a loss within the policy, and in connection with other parts of the instrument, it seems impossible to misunderstand it, or that it should receive so extensive an application as the plaintiff is desirous of giving to it. The parties certainly meant to apply it only to the case of those losses or injuries for which the assurers, if they had happened, would have been responsible. Having, in such cases only, an interest in rescuing or relieving the property, it is reasonable that then only they should defray the charges incurred by an effort made for that purpose; but when a loss takes place, which cannot be thrown on them, it would require a much stronger and more explicit stipulation than we find in the policy to render them liable to contribute to such expenses. If a cargo be insured for a long voyage against sea risks only, and a capture intervene the very day after the vessel leaves port, it is very clear that the underwriter is not only not liable for such a loss, but that he derives an advantage from it, as his risk may be terminated thereby, and the whole premium be earned, and yet if the construction now endeavored to be put on this clause should prevail, all the expenses of claiming a property, in which he had no interest, and which if condemned is a matter of indifference to him, and all the costs of pursuing it through an almost endless litigation, would be thrown, whether the pursuit were successful or otherwise, or an insurer who had taken care to restrict his liability to losses by perils of the sea only. The court cannot subscribe to such an interpretation, when a more natural, rational, and obvious one, and that without departing from the letter of the instrument, presents itself, which is, that this clause can never apply but in such cases as would, if they happen, be losses (either partial or total) within the meaning *of [420 the policy. We are therefore of opinion, that the underwriters not being answerable for the principal loss in this case, they cannot be so for the subsequent expenses which were incurred in recovering the property.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed with costs.

STARK
v.
THE CHESAPEAKE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J., TODD, J., and DUVALL, J.

It need not appear by the record of naturalization that all the requisites prescribed by law for the admission of aliens to the rights of citizenship have been complied with.

Semb. that the judgment of the court admitting the alien to become a citizen is conclusive that all the prerequisites have been complied with, or that parol proof may be received in aid of the record.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant upon a policy of assurance, in which the goods insured were warranted to be American property, "proof of which to be required in the "United States only." A loss by capture having taken place, the plaintiff offered an abandonment, which was refused, wherefore he brought this action:

To prove his citizenship and support the warranty, he produced and read at the trial an exemplification duly authenticated, of the record of his naturalization, in the words following, viz.:

"At a Court of Common Pleas held at "York, for the county of York, on the third "Monday of May, in the year of our Lord one "thousand eight hundred and four, before "John Joseph Henry, Esquire, President, and "his associate judges, &c., assigned, &c.

"The petition of John Philip Stark, late of "Wetgenstein Berleburg, in the empire of Germany, was read to the court, setting forth "that your petitioner has resided in the state "of Pennsylvania five years, that he is now "desirous of becoming a citizen of the United "States conformably to the act of Congress in "such case lately provided; your petitioner 421*] "therefore prays of the *honorable "Court that he may be admitted to citizenship "upon his complying with the requisites of the "act aforesaid, and your petitioner will pray, "&c. JOHN PHILIP STARK.

"Jacob Hostler appearing in court, and being duly sworn, says that the petitioner above "named has resided within the state of Pennsylvania five years and upwards; and during "that time he has behaved as a man of good "moral character, attached to the principles of "the constitution of the United States, and well "disposed to the good order and happiness of "the same. JACOB HOSTLER.

"Sworn and subscribed in open court the "21st of May, 1804.

"CHARLES W. HARTLEY.

"John Philip Stark, the above petitioner, appearing in open court and being duly sworn, "doth declare that he will support the constitution of the United States, and that he doth "absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure "all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign "prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly to Christein the prince "of Wetgenstein Berleburg, in the empire of "Germany. JOHN PHILIP STARK.

"Sworn and subscribed in open court the "21st of May, 1804.

"CHARLES W. HARTLEY.

"Whereupon the court admitted the said "John Philip Stark to become a citizen of the "said United States, agreeably to the prayer of "his said petition, and ordered all the proceedings aforesaid to be recorded by the clerk of "the said court."

The plaintiff also proved by parol evidence that he being a free white person, did reside within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, to wit: in the state of Pennsylvania, at some time between the 18th day of June, 1798, and the 14th day of April, 1802, *viz., on the 1st day of October, 1798, [422 and there continued to reside from that time until the 21st of May, 1804.

Whereupon, the court, at the prayer of the defendants, by their counsel, directed the jury that the plaintiff had failed in proving the property insured under the policy to be American property, according to the warranty, and therefore was not entitled to recover.

To which instruction the plaintiff took a bill of exceptions.

The act of Congress of the 14th of April, 1802 (vol. 6, p. 74), "to establish an uniform rule of "naturalization and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," requires that the applicant should have made a previous declaration before some court of record of his intention to become a citizen, &c., three years before his admission; and that the court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided in the United States five years at least, and within the state or territory where such court is at the time held, one year at least.

The act of 26th March, 1804 (vol. 7, p. 136), dispenses with the previous declaration of intention, &c., as to such aliens, "being free "white persons, as were residing within the "limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States, at any time between the 18th day "of June, 1798, and the 14th day of April, "1802, and who have continued to reside within the same."

The objection made by the defendant's counsel to the record of naturalization of the plaintiff was, that it did not appear by the record that the plaintiff had made a previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen, agreeably to the first provision of the act of 14th April, 1802; nor that he was residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States at any time between the 18th of June, 1798, and the 14th of April, 1802, and continued to reside therein so as to be entitled to the benefit of the act of the 26th of March, 1804.

It was contended also that parol evidence of these facts ought not now to be admitted in aid of the record.

On the part of the plaintiff it was contended: [*423] *1. That the decision of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of York was conclusive. That court had power and authority to admit aliens to the right of citizenship; and having admitted the plaintiff, the grounds of their decision cannot now be inquired into, nor the correctness of their judgment questioned.

2. That if the record of admission be not conclusive, yet it was competent for the plaintiff to prove now by parol evidence the facts which did, at the time he was admitted, entitle him to the benefit of the act of the 26th of March, 1804.

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, and Martin, for the defendant in error,

Submitted the question arising in this case without argument to the court, who, without giving a more particular opinion, pronounced the following judgment:

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel, on consideration whereof this court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in directing the jury that the plaintiff had failed in proving the property insured under the policy to be American property. It is therefore considered by the court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to that court to be further proceeded in according to law.

Judgment reversed.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS AND OTHERS, APPELLANTS,

v.

GEORGE ARMROYD AND OTHERS, APPELLEES.

Absent—TODD. J.

A sentence of a foreign tribunal condemning neutral property under an edict unjust in itself, contrary to the law of nations, and in violation of neutral rights; and which has been so declared by the legislative and executive departments of the government of the United States, changes the property of the thing condemned. A sale by the authority of the captors before sentence of condemnation is affirmed by such sentence, and is good ab initio.

A French tribunal at Guadaloupe had jurisdiction of property seized on the high seas for breach of the Milan decree, and carried into the Dutch part of the island of St. Martins, and there sold by order of the Dutch governor of St. Martins, before condemnation, without any authority from the French tribunal at Guadaloupe. The American owner cannot reclaim, in the courts of this country, his property which has been seized and condemned in a French court under the Milan decree.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, which dismissed the libel with costs.

*The libel stated, that the schooner [*424 Fortitude, owned by Williams and others, citizens of the United States, having taken in a cargo of molasses at Martinico, sailed on the 20th of August, 1809, for New London. That on the next day she was piratically seized on the high seas by an armed schooner, showing no colors, but asserted to be from Guadaloupe, and carried into St. Martin's, where the captain's papers were taken from him, and the vessel and cargo detained, as it was asserted, to wait the event of a trial. That on the 9th of September the prize-master left St. Martin's for Guadaloupe, with a copy of the schooner's papers, under pretense of causing proceedings to be instituted in the French Court of Admiralty in that island. That on the 23d of September the master of the Fortitude went to St. Bartholomews, and on his return was informed, that during his absence the governor had ordered the vessel and cargo to be sold at public sale; which was done and bought for the governor and one of his council, as the libelants believed. That immediately after the sale the governor took possession of the vessel, and on the 2d of October the cargo was landed, and 97 hogsheads of the molasses were shipped on board another vessel to Philadelphia, where they arrived, consigned to Armroyd and others, of whom the libelants demanded it, but they refused to deliver it, or to account for the value of it.

A claim was interposed by George Armroyd & Co. in behalf of Richardson & Carty, and others, which stated, that on the 21st of August, 1809, and long before, war existed between Great Britain and France; that the Fortitude, being an American vessel at peace with the French empire, on her voyage from Martinico, a British colony, where she had been trading with the enemies of the French empire, during the war, in violation of the decrees and regulations of that empire, was seized by a French privateer, and carried to St. Martin's, as lawful prize to the captors, and her papers sent to a French tribunal, having competent jurisdiction, at Guadaloupe, under the sole and exclusive dominion and jurisdiction of the French empire; but the papers were captured on the passage to Guadaloupe. That the vessel and cargo, being so carried into St. Martin's, were there bona fide sold by order of the Dutch *governor at the island, to whom [*425 such right belonged, by the laws and constitutions of the said island; and the goods in question, part of the cargo, were bona fide purchased by a certain I. L. Lapierre, and by him bona fide sold to a certain Abraham Concheyter, from whom they were afterwards bona fide purchased by Richards & Carty, for account of themselves and others.

By consent of parties a sentence was passed pro forma in the District Court, for the libelants.

In the Circuit Court, upon the appeal, the NOTE.—CHIEF J. MARSHALL, in the case of The Mary, 9 Cranch, 126, 142, 144, 145, has considered the conclusiveness of a sentence of a court of admiralty, which is said not only to bind the subject matter on which it is pronounced, but to prove conclusively the facts which it asserts. He says in substance: A judgment against one defendant for the want of answer, or a decree against one defendant for want of an answer, does not prevent any other defendant from contesting, so far as respects himself, the very fact which is admitted by the absent party. No reason is perceived why a different rule should prevail in a court of admiralty. "The decisions of a court of exclusive jurisdiction are necessarily conclusive on all other courts, because the subject matter is not examinable in them. With respect to itself no reason is perceived for yielding to them a further conclu-claimants exhibited a further answer, stating, that by a decree of the registry of the commission for prize causes of the island of Guadaloupe, and its dependencies, duly constituted a court of prize by the Emperor of France, on the 12th of October, 1809, the schooner Fortitude, and her cargo, were condemned, by a sentence which is set forth at large in the answer, the substance of which sentence is included in the following extract, viz.:

"It results from the examination and from "the analysis of the papers just mentioned, "that the schooner Fortitude, captured by the "French privateer Le Fripon, is the property "of a citizen of the United States of America; "that she sailed from New London, bound to "Martinico, at which place she sold her cargo, "and took in another of molasses for the said "port of New London, and consequently she "has incurred the penalty pronounced by the "3d article of the Imperial decree, which di- "rects new measures against the maritime "system of England, and was given at the "Royal Palace of Milan, on the 17th of Sep- "tember, 1807, inserted in the bulletin of the "laws, No. 169, which article is as follows:

"Every vessel whatever, and whatever be "her cargo, which shall have cleared from any "English port, colony or country occupied by "English troops, or which shall be bound to "any English port, colony or country occupied "by English troops, shall be good prize, as "having infringed the present decree. Such "vessels shall be captured by our men of war, "and awarded to the captors.

426*] *"And after having heard the opin- "ion of the inspector of marine, we have de- "clared, and do declare, the American schoon- "er Fortitude to have been well and duly "captured by the French privateer Le Fripon, "and to be forfeited to the owners and crew of "the said privateer; consequently the said "schooner Fortitude, together with her cargo, "is awarded to the captors to be sold in the "customary form, if the sale has not already "taken place; and the proceeds shall be dis- "tributed conformably to the ordinance con- "cerning captures," &c.

On the 19th of April, 1811, the Circuit Court reversed the sentence of the District Court, with costs; from which sentence of reversal the libelants appealed to this court.

Lyman Law, for the appellants.

This condemnation was founded upon the Milan decree, which is admitted, on its face, to be in violation of the law of nations. It does not proceed on the ground of its being the property of an enemy, nor contraband of war, nor for violating a blockade. If it appear from the sentence itself, that the condemnation was not upon any ground recognized by the law of nations, nor upon the violation of any municipal right acknowledged by that law, this court will not carry it into effect. France may, by her own municipal laws, regulate her own trade, but she has no right to control ours, beyond her territorial jurisdiction, further than to protect her own belligerent rights, acknowledged by the law of nations. If we violate no such right, and if we do not carry our property within her territorial jurisdiction, she has no right to regulate our trade. Her condemnation, grounded upon regulations which she has no right, according to the law of nations, to make, is void. But even if she had a right to condemn, her condemnation can transfer no title, unless the thing itself be in her possession, at the time of condemnation, so that the possession may pass with the title. Here the property never was within the jurisdiction of the court at Guadaloupe. It had been sold and delivered by the Dutch governor, before the condemnation. It does not appear that he had any authority either from the captors, or from the court, to make the sale. The purchaser cannot *derive from the governor a [427 better title than the governor had at the time of sale.

I. R. Ingersoll, contra.

It is acknowledged that a tribunal, professing to be a court of admiralty, has condemned the property in question, and that the appellees possess it by virtue of a capture on the high seas. This is prima facie evidence of the correctness of the title, and throws the onus probandi upon the appellants.

A court of admiralty is a court whose jurisdiction is co-ordinate with that of every other throughout the world. The admiralty law is "of all times and of all nations," and its decrees, so far as they affect the thing itself, and so long as they remain unreversed, can never be questioned. The end being gained, it is an immaterial question, what were the means, as they are sanctified by the end. Whether the proceedings are erroneous, or not, according to our notions of right and wrong; whether they are predicated upon a mistake of the law, or of siveness than is allowed to judgments and decrees of courts of common law and equity. They bind the subject matter as between parties and privies.

"The whole world, it is said, are parties to an admiralty cause; and therefore the whole world is bound by the decision. The reason on which this dictum stands will determine its extent. Every person may make himself a party, and appeal from the sentence; but notice of the controversy is necessary in order to become a party, and it is a principal of natural justice, of universal obligation, that before the rights of an individual be bound by a judicial sentence, he shall have notice, either actual or implied, of the proceedings against him. When these proceedings are against the person, notice is served personally, or by publication; where they are in rem notice is served upon the thing itself. This is necessarily notice to all those who have any interest in the thing, and is reasonable because it is necessary, and because it is the part of common prudence for all those who have any interest in it, to guard that interest by persons who are in a situation to protect it. Every person, therefore, who could assert any title to the Mary, has constructive notice of her seizure, and may fairly be considered as a party to the libel. But those who have no interest in the vessel which could be asserted in the Court of Admiralty, have no notice of her seizure, and can, on no principle of justice or reason be considered as parties in the cause so far as respects the vessel. When such person is brought before a court in which the fact is examinable, no sufficient reason is perceived for precluding him from re-examining it. The judgment of a court of common law, or the decree of a court of equity, would, under such circumstances, be re-examinable in a court of common law, or a court of equity, and no reason is discerned why the sentence of a court of admiralty, under the circumstances, should not be re-examinable in a court of admiralty." The Mary, 9 Cranch, 143, 144, 145, MARSHALL, Ch. J. To the same effect in Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 4 Pet., 466, 475.

the fact, or are founded upon regulations consistent with, or repugnant to, the law of nations, are questions wholly immaterial. The sentence has sealed the proceedings, and those questions can never judicially come before this court.

In confirmation of these positions, it might be sufficient to refer to the decisions of this court, where the principles are settled.

In the case of Rose v. Himely (4 Cr., 292), this court refused to confirm the property of the alleged purchaser, because the court passing sentence had neither the actual nor constructive jurisdiction, nor power, over the subject in controversy. The point upon which it was decided was, that the vessel and cargo were seized out of the territorial jurisdiction claimed by the French government of St. Domingo, for a breach of municipal regulations, and were never carried within that jurisdiction, but were sold by the captor at a foreign port.

Two judges (the Chief Justice and Judge Washington) thought that, in order to give ju- 428] risdiction, the property *should have been taken as prize of war, and brought infra præsidia. Three (Judges Cushing, Chase and Livingston) were of opinion, that it would be conclusive even under a municipal regulation, provided it were carried to the country of the captors. Judge Johnson considered it conclusive at all events. But even in that case, the Chief Justice says, in p. 276, "if the court of "St. Domingo had jurisdiction, the sentence "is conclusive." In the cases of Hudson and others v. Guestier, and La Font v. Bigelow (4 Cr., 293), it is decided that, in case of prize of war, a condemnation, while lying in a neutral port, will bind the property; and that the same principle applies to a seizure made within the territory of a state, for a violation of its municipal laws, p. 296. Judges Chase and Livingston dissented, because the vessel was not carried into a French port for trial. Judge Johnson adhered to his former opinion, that it was immaterial whether the capture was made in the exercise of municipal or belligerent rights, or whether within the jurisdictional limits of France, where she is supreme, or upon the high seas, where her authority is concurrent with that of other nations. (P. 298.)

In the case of Croudson and others v. Leonard (4 Cr., 434), it was decided, that a sentence of condemnation for breach of blockade was conclusive evidence of a violation of the warranty of neutrality in a policy of insurance.

In the case of Rose & Himely, above mentioned, the incidental questions were decided in favor of our positions; for here it was prize of war, seized and condemned within the jurisdiction of the court; yet it may be said the issue of that case was adverse. If so, it was expressly overruled in Hudson & Smith v. Guestier (6 Cr., 281). The court there unanimously decided, that the judge of the French court must have had a right to dispose of every question made in behalf of the owner of the property, whether it related to the jurisdiction of the court, or arose out of the law of nations, or out of the French decrees, or in any other way: and even if the reasons of his judgment should not be satisfactory, it would be no ground for a foreign court to rescind his proceedings, and to refuse to consider his sentence as conclusive on the property; and that, as the title was changed by the condemnation at Guadaloupe, the original *owner had no [429 right to pursue it in the hands of a vendee.

But this is no new principle of law originating with the present state of the world, which would seem rather to forbid it; since the rapacity of the courts of admiralty on the one side, and their acknowledged subserviency to the governing power on the other, diminish the respect which would otherwise be due to their sentences.

The conclusive effect of a foreign sentence in changing the property seems to have been first judicially decided in the case of Hughes v. Cornelius (2 Shower, 242; Sir T. Raymond, 473; Skin., 59; Lord Raym., 893, 935; Vern., 21). The authority of this case has never been questioned. The only question has been as to the collateral effect between underwriters and the assured in cases of warranty in a policy of insurance. And even there, whenever the condemnation has been upon the ground of its being the property of an enemy, the sentence has always been holden to be conclusive, without regard to the circumstances by which the court came to that result. The sentence is conclusive as to whatever it purports to decide. (Park, 355, 360, 361–2; Rob., 173, The Christopher; 4 Rob., 35, The Henrick and Maria; 5 Rob., 255, The Comet; 4 Rob., 3, The Helena; 3 Bos. & Pul., 505, Lothian v. Henderson; 7 T. R., 526, Calvert v. Boville; 7 T. R., 681, Geyer v. Aguilar; East, 473, Oddy v. Boville; 3 Bos. & Pul., 201, Baring v. Clagett; 5 East, 99, Baring v. Royal Exch. Ins. Co.; 5 East, 155, Bolton v. Gladstone.) Such also has been the course of decisions in the different American states. (1 Binney, 295, Calhoun v. Penn. Ins. Co.; 3 Binney, 220, Cheviot v. Faussat; 2 Johnson's N. Y. cases, 451, Vanderheuvel v. The United Ins. Co.; S. C., 127.)

Such being the acknowledged effect of a foreign condemnation, the only remedy for the injured party is a resort to the court of the captors for redress. If that government will not afford it, he must apply to his own, which will make it a national concern to be settled either by negotiation or war, if it be deemed a matter of sufficient importance. (Doug., 614, Le Caux v. Eden.)

The fact that the Milan decree was a violation of the law of nations, and of our neutral rights, can make no difference. For if an unjust condemnation, professing *to be [430 founded upon a just law, be conclusive, there is no reason why a condemnation, founded upon an unjust law, should not be equally conclusive.

The question is not, whether this court will lend its aid to carry into effect the Milan decree, but whether it will reverse the sentence of a foreign court, and destroy vested rights acquired under such a sentence by a bona fide purchaser.

But it is said the purchase was made before the sentence of condemnation was passed, and was therefore void. This, however, can make no difference. The effect of the condemnation is not to vest the property, but to sanctify a title which was vested by the capture; to confirm all intermediate acts, and to give a judicial sanction to that which was already sufficiently firm in point of fact. (1 Wils., 211; 2 Azuni, 262; 12 Mod., 134, Rex v. Broome; Carth., 398, S. C.) The condemnation does not give property, it only establishes the fact that the captor had a lawful title by the capture. These maritime sales in market overt give an indefeasible title. (4 Johnson, 38, 39, Grant v. M'Lachlan.) In cases of foreign attachment, if the attached goods are perishable, or from their situation are exposed to peculiar danger, the constant practice is to order a sale, and such sales are valid, although the attaching creditor may fail to support his claim.

It is an established principle, says the Court of Errors (2 Johnson's cases, 458), that any person purchasing will be secure.

Law, in reply, cited the cases of Geyer v. Aguilar; Pollard v. Bell; Price v. Bell; Bird v. Appleton; Mayne v. Walter; (1 Rob. 144), and Havelock v. Rockwood (8 T. R., 268); to show that there must be a good cause for condemnation by the law of nations. He cited also, 4 Cr., 221; Dong., 574, and 1 Rob., 139. to the same point, and to show the limitation of the general principle of conclusiveness of a foreign sentence. As to the extent of the power of France over neutral commerce, he cited Marten's Law of Nations, 332; and to show that the Berlin and Milan decrees were in violation of our neutral rights, and were so declared by our government, he referred to the President's message to Congress of the 15th of 431] *December, 1810, and cited 4 Cr., 292, Rose v. Himely; 3 Rob., 99, 333; 2 Rob., 239.

To show that the court must have jurisdiction, before its decree can be conclusive, he cited 4 Cr., 471; 3 Rob., 96. To support the position that a sale before condemnation is not valid, he cited Marten's 332; 4 Cr., 250; 1 Browne's civil law, 254; 1 Rob., 139.

Dana, on the same side.

This is an appeal by a citizen of the United States to his government for redress for a violation of his neutral rights by a foreign sovereign. This court exercises that branch of the government, which, in some countries of Europe, is exercised by the sovereign himself. The only question is, whether this court has power to declare void a condemnation founded upon a decree which the legislature and the executive of the United States have declared to be a violation of our neutral rights, and contrary to the law of nations. This is a question never before agitated in the courts of the United States.

This vessel has not violated the law of nations, nor the municipal law of any state or nation.

The sovereign power of a nation cannot be exercised on the high seas, unless over its own subjects or pirates, or jure belli. It can affect hostile property only. A municipal regulation can not rightfully affect neutral property, beyond the territorial jurisdiction. On the high seas all nations are equal. This property, having never been within the French jurisdiction, can never have offended against French municipal law. The court had no jurisdiction under the municipal law of France in such a case. Suppose, in case of capture and recapture, the first captors proceed to libel and condemn the property in a French court, while it is safe in a port of the United States, having never been within the jurisdiction of France. It can never be pretended that such a condemnation would be valid.

The title and possession must be delivered together at the same time, or the sentence will not be conclusive in rem.

*In the cases of Rose & Himely, and [432 Hudson & Guestier, the property was sold by an agent of the court; but the Dutch governor of St. Martins had no authority from the tribunal at Guadaloupe. It has been decided in the courts of the United States, that Holland is not a dependency of France. Captors cannot sell or dispose of the property captured, before the capture has been adjudged lawful by a competent court. It is the interest of all nations to enforce this rule. The opposite practice would lead to incalculable evils.

March 8th. MARSHALL, Chief Justice, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

A vessel, with a cargo belonging in part to the appellants, was captured on the high seas, on the 20th of August, 1809, by a French privateer, and carried to St. Martins, where the vessel and cargo were sold by order of the governor, at public auction, and part of the cargo purchased and sent to the appellees in Philadelphia. After the sale the vessel and cargo were condemned by the court of prize, sitting at Guadaloupe, professedly for a violation of the Milan decree in trading to a dependence of England. On the arrival of the goods, they were claimed by the original owner, who filed a libel for them. In the District Court they were adjudged to him. The Circuit Court reversed that sentence, and from the judgment of the Circuit Court there is an appeal to this court.

It appears to be settled in this country, that the sentence of a competent court, proceeding in rem, is conclusive with respect to the thing itself, and operates as an absolute change of the property. By such sentence, the right of the former owner is lost, and a complete title given to the person who claims under the decree. No court of co-ordinate jurisdiction can examine the sentence. The question, therefore, respecting its conformity to general or municipal law, can never arise, for no co-ordinate tribunal is capable of making the inquiry. The decision in the case of Hudson & Smith v. Guestier, reported in 6th Cranch, is considered as fully establishing this principle.

It is contended that the sentence, in this case, has not changed the property, because,

*1st. The sale was made under the [433 direction of the Governor of St. Martins, before the sentence of condemnation was pronounced.

2d. The sentence proves its own illegality, because it purports to be made under a decree which the government of the United States has declared to be subversive of neutral rights and national law.

1st. In support of the first objection it has been urged, that the jurisdiction of the court depends on the possession of the thing; that a sentence is a formal decision, by which a forcible possession is converted into a civil right; and that the possession being gone, there remains nothing on which the sentence can operate.

However just this reasoning may be when applied to a case in which the possession of the captor has been divested by an adversary force, as in the cases of recapture, rescue, or escape, its correctness is not admitted when applied to this case. The possession is not an adversary possession, but the possession of a person claiming under the captor. The sale was made on the application of the captor, and the possession of the vendee is a continuance of his possession.

The capture is made by and for the government; and the condemnation relates back to the capture, and affirms its legality.

2d. That the sentence is avowedly made under a decree subversive of the law of nations, will not help the appellant's case in a court which cannot revise, correct, or even examine that sentence. If an erroneous judgment binds the property on which it acts, it will not bind that property the less because its error is apparent. Of that error, advantage can be taken only in a court which is capable of correcting it.

It is true that in this case there is the less difficulty in saying that the edict under which this sentence was pronounced, is a direct and flagrant violation of national law, because the declaration has already been made by the legislature of the Union. But what consequences attend this legislative declaration? Unques-434*] tionably the *legislature which was competent to make it, was also competent to limit its operation, or to give it effect by the employment of such means as its own wisdom should suggest. Had one of these been, that all sentences pronounced under it should be considered as void, and incapable of changing the property they professed to condemn, this court could not have hesitated to recognize the title of the original owner in this case. But the legislature has not chosen to declare sentences of condemnation, pronounced under this unjustifiable decree, absolutely void. It has not interfered with them. They retain therefore the obligation common to all sentences whether erroneous or otherwise, and bind the property which is their object; whatever opinion other co-ordinate tribunals may entertain of their own propriety, or of the laws under which they were rendered.

The sentence is affirmed with costs.

SMITH AND BUCHANAN
v.
THE DELAWARE INSURANCE CO.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J. and TODD, J.

A verdict "for the defendants subject to the opinion of the court upon the points reserved," does not authorize an absolute judgment for the defendants, unless the points reserved and the opinion of the court thereon are stated on the record.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant on a policy of insurance.

The jury found a verdict "for the defendants, subject to the opinion of the court on the points reserved." And judgment was thereupon rendered "for the defendants accordingly."

The plaintiffs, by their counsel, moved the court below that the points reserved (which the motion states, without stating the facts out of which they arose), and the opinion of the court upon those points, should be entered on the record.

*The court did not act on this motion: [*435 and, of course, the points do not appear, so as to enable this court to take notice of them.

The defendants, it was said, would not agree to any arrangement by which the legal merits of the cause, as they appeared below, might come into discussion here.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, for plaintiffs in error,

Contended that the verdict was imperfect, contradictory and void; and did not warrant the judgment pronounced upon it, nor any other judgment. (23 Vin., 397, pl. 10.) It is neither a general nor a special verdict.

Harper, contra,

Admitted that it was in form an irregular proceeding, but he was instructed to insist on the judgment.

It is a general verdict for the defendants: and by consent of parties it was referred to the court; and if they should be of opinion that the verdict should not stand, they were to award a venire de novo. It was the negligence of the plaintiffs in not having the facts, or the points and consent, stated on the record.

It is evident that what was done was by consent. The plaintiffs do not appear to have wished to bring the case here; but were at the time contented to rely on the opinion of the court below.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The case is too plain for argument. The jury did not intend to find a general verdict; but to submit the points of law to the court. If the law had been for the plaintiffs the court could only have awarded a venire de novo. The facts ought to have appeared, so that the judgment might have been either reversed or affirmed upon the merits.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial awarded.

*HOLKER AND OTHERS v. PARKER.

Present—All the Judges except TODD, J.

An attorney at law, as such, has authority to submit the cause to arbitration.

But an attorney at law, merely as such, has no right, strictly speaking, to make a compromise for his client.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, in a suit in chancery brought by Holker and others, his assignees, against Parker, to set aside an award made under a rule of court in a suit at law in the same court between Holker and Parker.

The case, as stated by MARSHALL, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

In the year 1782, John Holker, one of the plaintiffs in this cause, Daniel Parker, the defendant, and William Duer, who is dead, insolvent, formed a trading company under the name and firm of Daniel Parker & Co., of which Daniel Parker was the acting partner. After receiving large sums of money, and contracting debts to a great amount, Parker absconded from the United States without making any settlement of his accounts. In the month of December, 1785, Holker commenced a suit against Parker in the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Philadelphia, where the said Parker had resided and carried on the business of the copartnership. This suit was commenced by attaching the effects of Parker in the hands of Thomas Fitzsimmons. In June, 1788, a judgment in favor of the said Holker was rendered on the verdict of a jury for the sum of 47,231*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.* Pennsylvania currency, equal to $125,951.03. The property attached amounting to $5,000, was sold and paid to the said Holker towards satisfying this judgment.

Other attachments were laid by Holker on the property of Parker, and proceedings were also instituted against him by other persons, creditors of the company. On the 31st of December, 1788, while these were depending, an indenture of six parts was made and executed between said Parker by Andrew Craigie, his attorney, of the first part, John Holker of the second part, Samuel Rogers of the fourth part, by An-437* drew *Craigie, his attorney, Royal Flint of the fifth part, and sundry creditors of Daniel Parker & Co. of the sixth part. William Duer was named in the said indenture as of the third part, but never executed the deed.

The object of this deed was to convey to Royal Flint in trust for the creditors of Daniel Parker & Co., and for other purposes therein specified, the partnership effects of Geyer, De la Lande, and Fynye, to which Parker represented himself to be entitled, and which he had previously conveyed to the said Samuel Rogers. By this indenture the said Parker covenanted among other things that he would, within eight months from the date thereof, repair to Philadelphia personally, or by attorney, and then settle all the accounts of the company. It was further agreed that the said Parker and Holker should, within eight months from the date of the first indenture, reciprocally give bonds to each other in the penal sum of 50,000*l.* Pennsylvania currency conditioned for the settlement of their respective accounts within ten months thereafter, and for payment of their several balances to Royal Flint and his successors for the trusts in the said indenture mentioned. The bonds to be assigned to the said Royal Flint or his successors in trust as aforesaid.

In consideration of the premises the said Holker, and also the said parties of the sixth part, severally covenanted with the said Parker that they would immediately "vacate, annul, "discontinue and withdraw all suits, actions "and proceedings whatever, which they or any "or either of them shall or may at any time or "times heretofore have commenced, brought or "prosecuted against the said Daniel Parker or "his estate, goods, chattels or property, in any "court or place whatsoever in Europe or Amer-"ica, and shall and will place him, the said "Daniel Parker, and his property in the same "situation as they were before the commence-"ment of such suits or proceedings." And the said Holker further covenanted not to commence or prosecute any action against him, the said Parker, for any balance that might be due until after eighteen months after the eight months aforesaid should have expired.

The bonds were given, but Parker failed to comply *with the covenant for settling [*438 the accounts of the copartnership transactions.

The effects of Geyer, De la Lande and Fynye, which were assigned to Royal Flint, being insufficient to satisfy previous charges on them, proved totally unproductive.

Debts to a large amount due from Daniel Parker & Co. were recovered from Holker and paid by him.

On the 21st July, 1796, Holker made a power of attorney to James Lloyd, of Boston, for the purpose of recovering from the the said Parker the moneys supposed to be due to him, and at the same time transmitted to the said Lloyd copies of the judgment obtained by him against Parker in June, 1788, and of a judgment obtained against Holker by John Ross for the sum of 12,933*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* Pennsylvania currency, equal to $34,488.95. This judgment was for a debt due from Daniel Parker & Co., which was rendered subsequent to the indenture of six parts herein before stated, and had been discharged by Holker.

Mr. Lloyd placed these papers in the hands of Mr. Lowell, an attorney at law of Boston, who instituted an action of debt on the judgment obtained by Holker against Parker. This suit was brought by way of attachment. At the June term, 1797, Daniel Parker appeared by his attorney, and filed four several pleas in bar of the action, in all of which the indenture of six parts herein before stated was pleaded as a release of the judgment on which the suit was instituted.

The plaintiff's attorney prayed oyer of the instrument of which the defendant had made a profert in his pleas, and, in the October term, 1797, not having replied or demurred to the said pleas, entered into a rule of court, by which the said action and all demands were referred to Nathan Goodale, George Deblois, and Fisher Ames, Esquires, with liberty reserved to Holker of disagreeing to the rule thirty days after he should receive notice of it.

Notice of this rule was received by Holker in August, 1798, but he does not appear to have been informed *that any liberty of dis- [*439 senting from it was reserved to him. It would seem that he submitted to it with some repugnance, and under the idea that it was unavoidable.

On the 8th of September, 1798, Holker made an affidavit, which he transmitted to his attorney, stating many reasons why the referees should not immediately proceed to make up their award in the case, and showing that in the settlement of the complex accounts between Parker and himself, much testimony would be required respecting transactions both in Europe and America, and that so much depended on the entries in the books of the bank at Philadelphia, that the settlement ought to take place there. He declared, however, that he would endeavor to be prepared to appear before the arbitrators in the succeeding months of November or December, or sooner if practicable.

In October, 1798, the rule of reference was made absolute. Mr. Holker had assigned this claim to Mr. Lowell, the father of his attorney at law, the administrator of Mr. Russel, so far as would be necessary to satisfy a debt due to Russel's estate. On the 6th of November, 1798, Mr. Lloyd wrote a letter to Mr. Holker informing him that his affidavit had been laid before the court, in consequence of which his cause had been continued until the succeeding June term. On the 23d of the same month Mr. Lloyd addressed another letter to Mr. Holker, informing him that the "referees would attend to his business whenever it might be convenient for him to appear before them."

Suits had been instituted against Holker in Philadelphia, in which he had been compelled to give bail in large sums. He then resided in Virginia, and was arrested in Baltimore by his bail in April, 1799, and carried to Philadelphia, where he was enabled to obtain other bail on no other condition than the express stipulation of not proceeding to Boston. On the 18th of May he made an affidavit before the mayor of Philadelphia, stating that he was prevented by this detention from proceeding to Boston in order to attend the referees in person as he proposed to do. That he was about petitioning the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania for a special court, which he had reason to believe he *[440] should obtain in the course of the succeeding July or August, but that in the meantime it was utterly out of his power to go to Boston. This affidavit was transmitted to his attorney in Boston. On the 24th of June Mr. Lowell addressed the following letter to Mr. Holker:

"I received your affidavit through my friend "Mr. Lloyd, and with much difficulty obtained "a delay. The referees adjourned to the first "of September next, when the cause will go on "at all events, whether you are here or not. "As to success without your aid it is out of the "question, as we know nothing of the cause, "and as your subsequent covenants with Park-"er will appear to annihilate your claims under "the judgment. Whether you will eventually "succeed in getting a nominal judgment against "Parker if you do attend, you alone can "judge. I am rather inclined to think I could "persuade the adverse counsel to give us a judg-"ment for the whole or part of the property "attached ($7,200). They appear to be heart-"ily sick of defending Parker, as they know "him to be immersed beyond hope of recovery, "and are doubtful whether they will be com-"pensated for their trouble. Whether some "arrangements of this sort would not be ad-"vantageous to you if it can be effected, con-"sidering your doubt of recovery, and the cer-"tainty of Parker's inability to pay what may "be decreed, you best can judge.

"Whatever you do on this point let it be ex-"plicit, as Mr. Lloyd and myself mean to avoid "all responsibility and every hazard of future "blame. I beg you will inform me speedily "what we shall do about your action, as the "referees will meet in sixty days or there-"abouts."

This letter was transmitted to Mr. Holker by Mr. Lloyd, who subjoined thereto the following letter:

"Immediately on the receipt of your favor "covering a memorial to the Circuit Court, I "delivered them both to Mr. Lowell who duly "attended thereto: the result is communicated "in the foregoing letter from that gentleman. "His obtaining the delay is what could not "have been calculated on. The court would "*not have granted it. To avoid ex-[*441 "pense in feeing counsellors it was acceded "to by the other party.

"The period now fixed can no longer be "protracted on any account whatsoever. From "what I can learn of the disposition of the de-"fendants, it is truly depicted to you in Mr. "Lowell's letter: they would, as he observes, "probably confess judgment for the greater "part if not the whole of the property attach-"ed. It must be understood that they would "do this only on the condition that they should "receive a full discharge from you on account "of Daniel Parker. You will please to let me "receive your determination as soon as may be "convenient."

These letters were never answered by Mr. Holker. A petition had been presented by Holker to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania to have his person liberated on delivering up all his property for the use of his creditors in pursuance of a law of that state. This petition came on to be heard on the 13th of September, 1799, but was continued from time to time until the 14th day of April, 1800; when by the judgment of that court, he was discharged from custody.

The referees made the following report to the Circuit Court during the October term, 1799.

"The subscribers, pursuant to the annexed "rule, met at the office of Nathan Goodale on "the 8th day of June, 1799, after notifying "John Lowell, Jr., Esquire, attorney for the "plaintiff, John Holker, and William Hull, "Esquire, attorney for said Daniel Parker, the "said attornies attending our meeting and "John Lowell, Jr., Esquire, in behalf of said "Holker, having asked a delay or adjournment "until the first day of September then next, "now last past, and on the said first day of "September the referees having again met, and "the said parties appearing by their attornies, "and having been fully heard, the said meet-"ing was again adjourned at the request of the "said Lowell until this day, being the 23d day "of October, 1799, when the said attorneys "having again appeared, and nothing further "being offered in support of their several alle-"gations, we do award that the said John Holk-"er, the plaintiff, *recover against the [*442 "said Daniel Parker the sum of $5,000 in full "satisfaction and discharge of all debts, costs, "judgments, executions, accounts, controver-"sies, claims or demands, subsisting between "them, of what name or nature soever."

The award was read and accepted, and judgment immediately rendered for $5,000 without costs, which sum was received by the attorney of Mr. Holker, and the balance after deducting costs and commissions was paid to the administrator of Russel, to whom Holker was indebted and to whom he had made an assignment of his claims against Parker, so far as it should be necessary to satisfy the said debt.

It appears that the evidences in support of Holker's claims, other than the two judgments which have been mentioned, were never in the hands of his counsel, and were consequently never laid before the referees; that the counsel for Holker never controverted the allegation made on the part of Parker, that the judgment obtained by Holker in the court for the county of Philadelphia, was released by the indenture of six parts, nor ever insisted that it was to be considered as prima facie evidence subject to such objections, or to such discounts as Parker might make. The accounts between the parties do not appear to have been examined, nor the judgment of the arbitrators exercised on any part of the case. The award for $5,000 was made with the consent of Parker's attorney, and without objection on the part of Holker's attorney. That transaction is thus stated by Mr. Lowell: "Some time before the trial, the coun- "sel for Parker did lead this deponent to un- "derstand that as they were desirous of closing "the affair, they should not objeet to our tak- "ing judgment for the amount attached, but "the deponent wholly and absolutely did re- "jeet the said proposal. He, however, stated it "to said Holker and begged his instructions "thereon, but said Holker never replied to said "letter; when the referees met and this depo- "nent found they would proceed to final judg- "ment against his elient for defeet of evidence, "he, this deponent, stated the former offer, but "the adverse counsel refused to agree to it but "said that they had no objection to our taking "judgment if the referees saw fit for $5,000 443] "instead of *$7,200 or thereabouts, the "amount attaehed; though they deelared they "had doubts whether on a final liquidation "there would be so mueh due. The referees, "taking their admission against them, awarded "that sum. But it was never agreed by this "deponent that such a sum should be taken "in full of the said Holker's demands. It was "no compromise, nor was there any secret un- "derstanding; but he deemed it his duty to ob- "tain even this sum rather than an award, "which would have been otherwise made, that "the said Parker owed the said Holker "nothing." The attorney for Mr. Parker, whose deposition is also in the reeord, states the transaction thus: "After a considerable exam- "ination of the aecounts by the arbitrators with- "out coming to a decision, Mr. Lowell agreed "that they should award to Mr. Holker $5,000 "in full of all demands, provided I would "agree to give seeurity for the payment of the "money to Mr. Holker or to his attorney, Mr. "Parker being abroad. I agreed to it. We "both agreed to it. It was done. When Mr. "Lowell and myself had agreed, we stated our "agreement to the arbitrators." To another interrogatory the same witness answers: "I did "not reeommend to the arbitrators any award "until the parties had agreed upon a sum; my- "self and Mr. Lowell."

Two of the arbitrators are dead. The deposition of the third has been taken. He says that the award was founded entirely on the admission of Mr. Parker's attorney.

The correspondence of Mr. Holker with his attorneys showed his confident relianee on the judgments placed in their hands as amounting to prima facie evidence, and that his claims considerably exceeded those judgments. The evidenee now taken in the eause swells them to a very great amount.

There is evidence that Daniel Parker was at the time much embarrassed in eonsequence of deep speculation in the national debt of France; and that he was eertainly believed by the attorney of Mr. Holker to be insolvent. This was at that time the general impression. It was afterwards known to be erroneous.

*Mr. Holker instituted a suit against [444 Mr. Parker in Franee, where it was determined that he was barred by the judgment rendered against him in the Circuit Court of the United States on the award.

Holker and his trustees have now brought this suit in the Cireuit Court of the United States sitting in chancery, praying that the award may be set aside in whole or in part, that the accounts between Holker and Parker may be settled, and that Parker may be decreed to pay the sum whieh shall appear to be due. Parker has pleaded the award and judgment thereon in bar of these claims and of any account.

On a hearing, the bill of the plaintiffs was dismissed, and from that decree an appeal was made to this court.

Harper, for the appellants, contended that the award ought to be set aside.

1st. Beeause the rule of reference was entered into without authority.

2d. Beeause if there was authority, the rule and the award exceeded it.

3d. Beeause the award was founded on a mistake in law.

4th. Beeause it was made on an agreement or compromisc made collusively, or inadvertently or by mistake, between the plaintiff's attorney and the agent of the defendant.

5th. Because, if no such agreement or compromise were made, the award was founded on a belief of one, and therefore void for mistake.

1 and 2. The reference was made without authority. The letter of attorney to Lloyd is "generally to do and perform all that may be necessary in the premises." It cautiously avoids giving a power to refer to arbitration. Lowell so understood it, as appears from his answer to the 11th interrogatory. Lowell, as attorney at law, had no such authority. If he had, it could only *extend to submit that action, not [445 all demands. His authority was limited to the ease in which he was employed, and Lloyd had authority over two causes of action only—the judgment in Pennsylvania recovered by Holker against Parker, and the judgment recovered by Ross against Holker and which he had paid.

3. The award was void because it was founded on a mistake of the law. It is true this mistake does not appear on the face of the award, but that is an objection at law only, and not in a court of equity, whieh may go into collateral circumstances, and may set aside the award if the law be mistaken.

The mistake in law was in supposing that the causes of action ou the judgments of Holker v. Parker, and Ross v. Holker, were barred by the indenture of six parts. Ross's judgment was obtained in 1795 and paid in 1796, and the indenture of six parts was made in 1788. Holker's covenant does not extend to judguents—it is only to "vacate, annul, discontinue and "withdraw all suits, aetions and proeeedings," clearly alluding to the attachments whieh Holker and others had then recently instituted against him. This covenant is further explained by the subsequent eovenant not to sue Parker until the expiration of 26 months from that date. The expression "suits, actions and proeeedings" does not inelude judgments. And if it did, yet the covenant of Parker to appear in Philadelphia within eight months and settle his accounts, was a condition precedent to the covenant on the part of Holker to vacate, and withdraw the proceedings then pending. This covenant is expressed to be "in consideration of the premises," which expression implies a prior performance on the part of Parker. It was quid pro quo. A man is not presumed to part with his right until he receive the compensation, unless he expressly stipulates so to do. The pleas do not state a performance on the part of Parker. (1 Lord Raymond, 662, Thorpe v. Thorpe; 2 Burr., 899, Collins v. Gibbs; Cro. El., 188; 7 Co. 9, 10, Hob., 106; 1 Esp. N. P., 128.)

4. The award was founded on a compromise entered into between the attorney of Holker and the agent of Parker, either by collusion or 446] by imposition of the latter *upon the former; and was without any authority from Holker. It was an award in form only, but was in fact a compromise.

General Hull, in his deposition, states it to have been a compromise, and that it was stated as such to the arbitrators. Mr. Deblois, the surviving arbitrator, says the award was made upon the defendant's acknowledgement alone, which implies a compromise. And Mr. Lowell admits there was an understanding that Parker's attorney should acknowledge a balance.

This, then, was a compromise founded on the collusion of the plaintiff's attorney, contrary to his duty to his client, and expressly contrary to his instructions, which were not to agree to arbitration unless Parker would give security to pay the award. Why did he waive this condition? Why not inform Holker of his right to dissent to the arbitration?

Holker repeatedly informed Lowell and Lloyd that the covenant was no bar, because Parker had never settled his accounts agreeably thereto. Yet the attorney yielded to the suggestion of the plea. Again, Holker's letters informed him that the judgment against Parker could not be opened; yet he waived that judgment (although it was at least prima facie evidence even if it could be opened), and admitted before the referees that the claims of Holker could not be supported. But if there were no collusion on the part of Lowell, he was imposed upon by Hull. He was made to believe that Parker was wholly insolvent, and might have believed that the amount of the attached effects was so much saved out of the wreck of his estate.

But if there was neither collusion nor imposition, the compromise was made without authority. Neither Lloyd nor Lowell had power to make it. Holker had forbidden a reference, but he knew nothing of a compromise.

And if it were not a compromise, yet the award was made by the arbitrators upon the supposition that there was one; and being founded on a mistake into which they were led by the opposite party, it is void.

447*] *If it is not void for these reasons, yet it is void for misbehavior in the arbitrators in not looking into the case. They had sufficient evidence before them, but confided in the representations of General Hull.

Amory and P. B. Key, contra.

In the articles of copartnership it is covenanted that all matters in dispute between the partners shall be left to arbitration; so that Holker could not refuse to agree to the rule of court.

Lowell and Lloyd were to have fifteen per cent. commission upon all moneys collected, and were therefore interested to recover as much as possible. The legal right to the debt was assigned to Russel's administrators with full power to collect it; so that Holker was fully represented.

The plea of the indenture was a good bar to the judgment in Pennsylvania. It was a covenant to open all judgments and go into a settlement of accounts. The parties could not have gone into a settlement of accounts without opening that judgment; for the judgment included all Holker's claims up to a certain time. If it be a covenant to release, it is equivalent to a release. The words of the covenant are, "immediately vacate, annul, discontinue and withdraw, all suits, actions, and proceedings whatever, which they or any or either of them, shall or may, at any time or times heretofore have commenced, brought, or prosecuted against the said Daniel Parker or his estate, goods, &c., in any court or place whatsoever in Europe or America, and shall and will place him, the said Daniel Parker, and his property in the same situation as they were before the commencement of such suits or proceedings." This is not limited to any suits or proceedings then pending, but includes all suits and proceedings which had been at any time before commenced. It included those which had been prosecuted to judgment as well as those then pending.

But a judgment by default in another state is not conclusive. This judgment was by foreign attachment in Pennsylvania. It was a proceeding entirely ex parte. It was in itself an imperfect voucher. It was examinable *every- [448 where—even in Pennsylvania. Nil debet was a good plea to an action upon it in that state; and a fortiori in another state. (1 Dall., 375, M'Clenachan v. M'Carthy.)

But the covenant was a good bar to it. The covenants on the part of Parker were not conditions precedent. They could not be so in the nature of things, for the actions, suits and proceedings were to be vacated immediately, and Parker was not to account until eight months afterwards. A covenant not to sue may be pleaded as a release. (2 Bac. Ab., 93; Cro. El., 352.)

A mistake of the law in a doubtful point is no ground to set aside an award. (Kyd on Awards; 2 Eq. ca. ab., 92; 9 Mod., 63; 2 Com. Dig., 146.)

Lloyd's power authorized a reference. It was to compel payment of all demands against every body, by all lawful ways and means. Whatever Holker could do in the premises, Lloyd could do. He was not confined to a jury trial. Having the general power to collect, he was of course to use all reasonable and usual means.

But Lowell, as attorney at law, had power to refer the case to arbitration (Kyd on Awards, 45; 1 Dall., 164); and under the circumstances of the case it was a discreet act. He was led by Holker's letter to suppose that he was to submit the case to arbitration if he could get security. He knew it to be impossible to get security, and therefore took the other part of his instructions and submitted to arbitration without security. The probability is that Lowell did give him notice of his right to dissent. Holker's letter of September, 1798, shows that he knew that all demands were submitted. Lowell, believing that the judgment was barred by the indenture, and being desirous to support the action and the attachment, thought that he was doing a benefit to Holker by extending the reference to all demands. But Lowell's mistakes of the law, if they be such, or even his mismanagement of the cause, cannot affect Parker. It is a matter entirely between Holker and his attorney.

The reference, then, was a discreet act, and fully authorized. The parties were bound then to produce their claims and their evidence, or 449] to be forever foreclosed. *Holker knew the time. He asked delay, supported by his affidavit, and obtained it. He knew that his personal attendance was not necessary; he knew that Lowell had not evidence to support the case, yet he neglected to furnish him with evidence, and abandoned his rights, if he had any, and cannot resume them when he pleases.

There was no compromise. Lowell swears expressly there was not. After writing the letter of the 24th of June, 1799, it is not probable that he would have taken such a responsibility upon himself.

The bill does not charge fraud in the referees. If it had, they ought to have been made parties. The object of the bill is to open an account which cannot now be settled with justice.

All the objections now alleged against the award were good in a court of law, and might have been urged upon the return of the award. Where a man has lost his legal remedy by his negligence, he shall not have relief in equity.

March 10th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

On the part of the appellants it is contended that an attorney at law has no power, without the consent of his client, to transfer a cause to other judges than those appointed by the laws, and to place it before a tribunal distinct from that before which the party himself has chosen to place it.

In this opinion however the majority of the court does not concur. It is believed to be the practice throughout the Union for suits to be referred by consent of counsel without special authority, and this universal practice must be founded on a general conviction that the power of an attorney at law over the cause of his client extends to such a rule. Were it otherwise, courts could not justify the permission which they always grant, to enter a rule of reference when consented to by counsel on both sides. In 450] this case, however, the letter *and affidavit of Mr. Holker of the 8th of September, 1798, manifests at least an acquiescence in the rule, which the opposite party had a right to consider as an assent to it.

The same letter and affidavit will meet the still stronger objection which has been made to the reference of matters not involved in the suit actually depending in court. They certainly impair very much the weight and influence of those arguments which have been urged against so much of the award as respects those demands of Holker which were not in suit.

The court, however, does not perceive in the transactions which took place previous to the award itself, any circumstance which could justify a decree to set it aside. The great and real question in the cause is, has the award been made under such circumstances, and is it of such a character, that it ought to bind the parties?

In examining this question it is natural to inquire whether this be in fact an award, in forming which the judgment of the arbitrators has been exercised, or a compromise wearing the dress of an award.

The evidence upon this point is thought very clear. Nothing can be more explicit than the testimony of General Hull, who was the attorney of Mr. Parker. He states an agreement in the most express terms between himself and Mr. Lowell on the sum for which the award should be given; and the arbitrator, whose deposition has been taken, declares that the award was made solely on the acknowledgment of the defendant's counsel.

To the deposition of Mr. Lowell himself great respect is due. He denies a compromise; but on examining his testimony the court is of opinion that his denial goes no further than to the form of an agreement. The facts he states prove one in substance. Believing himself that Holker's judgment against Parker was released, and that the referees would entirely disregard it—he himself not having insisted on it, or questioned the validity of the pleas in bar—he reminded Parker's attorney, in the presence of the referees, of his former offer to give $7,200 in satisfaction of all demands.

*It was impossible to misunderstand [451 this declaration. It was substantially a proposition to accept an offer which had been formerly rejected. General Hull replied that he would not now give that sum, but would give $5,000. Mr. Lowell did not agree to accept this offer, but he did not reject it. He looked on silently, and saw the referees about to make up an award, not on the testimony of the cause, but on a declaration on the part of the defendant that he would give $5,000, made in answer to one from himself apparently clinging to a former offer to give $7,200. The referees necessarily construed this silence into consent, and Mr. Lowell was not unwilling that they should put this construction on it. He thought it his duty, he says, to secure even this sum for his client rather than have an award that Parker owed him nothing; which would have been equally obligatory.

This then is substantially a compromise, and not an award. It is difficult to examine this cause, and to feel the clear conviction which was felt by Mr. Lowell, that the referees, had the case of Holker been brought as fully before them as it was in the power of his attorney to bring it, and pressed as earnestly on them as its importance deserved, would have awarded that Parker owed him nothing.

Had not the sufficiency of the pleas in bar been impliedly admitted; had the legal operation of the covenant of six parts been seriously contested; it is far from being clear that the referees would have affirmed the sufficiency of these pleas, or have construed the covenant to be a release of the judgment. There is certainly much reason to doubt whether the covenant of Holker, although it may be an independent covenant, amounts to a release of the judgment he had obtained against Parker. The mind of the referees does not appear to have been exercised on, or called to this question. They do not appear to have had a fair opportunity to form an opinion on it. It does not appear that the indenture itself was inspected by them, and the description given of it in the pleas is inaccurate. The pleas describe the covenant as containing the word "judgment," which it does not contain. The covenant is "to vacate, annul, discontinue and withdraw, all suits, ac-

452*] tions *and proceedings whatever." The pleas introduce the word "judgment" in their description of the covenant; a word which essentially varies its construction. Had the real case been brought before the referees, and their attention been directed to this circumstance, it cannot be assumed as certain that they would have considered the judgment as vacated, or would have refused to receive it as prima facie evidence of a claim to its full amount; open to such objections as Parker might make to it.

Had they even been of a different opinion, they could not have believed it certain that Parker, who had escaped from this country, leaving debts to an immense amount which Holker was compelled to pay, against whom, when only part of those debts were paid, Holker had obtained a judgment for $125,951.04 was not the debtor of Holker to a large amount. With this view of the case, had they understood that Holker was intercepted in his attempt to attend them, and detained by legal process, it ought not to have been supposed that they would have refused to suspend their award until the issue of his application to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania for the liberation of his person should be known.

To this court, then, it appears that this award is not the judgment of the arbitrators in the cause, but a compromise, between the attorneys, taking the form of an award, and a compromise made at a time when the cause was not so desperate as the attorney supposed it to be. It was a sacrifice of great and important interests at a time when that sacrifice does not appear to have been absolutely necessary. Has the attorney a right to make such a compromise?

Although an attorney at law, merely as such, has, strictly speaking, no right to make a compromise; yet a court would be disinclined to disturb one which was not so unreasonable in itself as to be exclaimed against by all, and to create an impression that the judgment of the attorney has been imposed on, or not fairly exercised in the case. But where the sacrifice is such as to leave it scarcely possible that, with a full knowledge of every circumstance, such a 453*] compromise could be fairly *made, there can be no hesitation in saying that the compromise, being unauthorized and being therefore in itself void, ought not to bind the injured party. Though it may assume the form of an award or of a judgment at law, the injured party, if his own conduct has been perfectly blameless, ought to be relieved against it. This opinion is the more reasonable because it is scarcely possible that, in such a case, the opposite party can be ignorant of the unfair advantage he is gaining. His conduct can seldom fail to be tainted with some disingenuous practice; or, if it has not, he knows that he is accepting a surrender of the rights of another from a man who is not authorized to make it.

The testimony in this cause accounts for the readiness with which Mr. Lowell acceded to the offer of General Hull. He acted under a mistake, and that mistake is fully disclosed in the record. He believed Parker to be irretrievably ruined. He thought him totally and absolutely insolvent. This impression was communicated to the referees. They too were of opinion that to drudge through the trunks of papers arrayed before them for the purpose of ascertaining how much one insolvent owed another, would be a useless waste of time.

Mr. Lowell was apparently of opinion that nothing beyond the attached effects was worth pursuing. He believed sincerely that an award of $700,000 would not avail his client more than an award for $7,000, and that he should ill perform his duty if he put the attached effects in any hazard in the vain attempt to get a judgment for a larger sum. He could not therefore venture on any measure which might have produced a release of those effects. They were the sole object of his contemplation and pursuit. Those he knew to be substance, every thing further he thought a shadow. This opinion seems to have influenced his whole conduct, and to have determined him to accede to the compromise offered by Parker's attorney.

It has been said that an award rendered under these circumstances ought not to bind Holker unless his own gross negligence may have deprived him of that equity which would otherwise belong to his case.

*Let his conduct be examined. [454

He appears to have been strongly impressed with the importance of his personal attendance on the arbitrators. Indeed it could scarcely be otherwise. Although his judgment against Parker might not be viewed as a nullity, it would certainly be opened, and all the items on which it was founded be liable to exception. His personal explanations would certainly be essential. They would also be essential in encountering the credits which might be claimed by Parker. His personal attendance was impossible.

He appears to have indulged the hope that he might be liberated in time, until the period allowed for appearing before the referees had passed away.

It is true that he ought to have transmitted his papers to his attorneys. The evidence now adduced, or a considerable part of it, might then have been obtained. That he was led to believe Parker insolvent, would not be a sufficient excuse for neglecting to do so, unless it could be shown that this impression was made by Parker himself, or by his agents. The evidence to this point does not amount to more than light suspicion.

Yet, when it is recollected that the plaintiff was embarrassed and detained by legal process; that he did not possess a clear and distinct knowledge of the testimony which would be required; that some apology for not making an early exertion to obtain that testimony is to be found in the hope he indulged of being enabled by the discharge of his person to attend the referees; that the expectation that the judgments in the hands of his counsel would be regarded by the referees, ought not to be considered as entirely unfounded; this court is of opinion that it would be too rigid an application of the rule which exacts, from those against whom iniquitous judgments have been obtained, evidence of having done all that was practicable at law, to deny relief in this case.

With the single exception of his omitting to furnish the evidence on which his judgment against Parker was obtained, and to furnish copies of other judgments rendered against 455] *him as one of the firm of Daniel Parker & Co., as he did in the case of Ross (of the efficacy of all which if furnished nothing decisive can be said), no negligence can be imputed to Holker. He has not rested under the decision against him, until Parker, confiding in his security, may have lost the means of protecting himself from an unjust demand, but has pursued him diligently in the courts of France. Finding this award and the judgment thereon to be an insurmountable bar to the examination of his claim in the courts of France, he has, without loss of time, instituted this suit. Nothing appears in the cause to induce an opinion that the claims of the parties may not now be as fairly and as fully examined as they could have been before the referees in 1799.

Upon a full view of the whole cause, this court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs; and that the decree ought to be reversed and annulled, with directions to set aside the award and the judgment rendered in October, 1799, and to direct an account between the plaintiff, Holker, and the defendant.

DECREE.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel: On consideration whereof this court is of opinion that the award made in October, 1799, in a suit brought by the plaintiff, John Holker, against the defendant, Daniel Parker, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, and referred by a rule of that court to referees therein named, and the judgment of the said court rendered thereon, ought not to bar the claim of the plaintiffs in this cause to an account of all the transactions of the parties, Holker and Parker, with each other as members of the firm of Daniel Parker & Co., and that there is error in the decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs. This court doth therefore decree and order that the decree of the Circuit Court be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court to be further proceeded in according to law.

456*] *After the opinion was delivered, P. B. Key mentioned that in the opinion the court had said that an account ought to be taken, but the decree only directs that the proceedings below should be according to law.

We wish for leave to answer fully before an account be taken, and wish it may be understood that this court does not mean to prevent a further answer.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. That is the meaning of the court.

BARNITZ'S LESSEE v. ROBERT CASEY.

Present—All the Judges.

The statute of descents in Maryland has not declared how an intestate estate shall descend, which was derived to the intestate from his half brother, or from his brother of the whole blood, or from his son or daughter, or from his wife; but such estates are left to descend as at common law.

A devise to A in fee, and if he shall die under the age of 21 years, and without issue, then to B in fee, is a good executory devise; and if B die before the contingency happen, it devolves upon his heir, and so from heir to heir until the contingency happen, when it vests absolutely in him only who can then make himself heir to B, the executory devisee. And although A be the heir at law of B, yet the executory devise thus devolving on him is not merged in the precedent estate, but on the death of A devolves to the next heir of B. One tenant in common cannot maintain ejectment against his cotenant, without actual ouster.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an ejectment brought by the lessee of Barnitz against Casey, to try the title of Barnitz to certain real estate in Baltimore.

The facts of the case were stated by STORY, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, as follows:

On or about the 6th of Feb., 1780, Daniel Barnitz died seized of the premises in the declaration mentioned, having, by his will, devised the same to his wife, Catharine Barnitz, in fee, and leaving issue, by his said wife, an only child and heir, Elizabeth Barnitz, who intermarried with one Charles M'Connell, by whom she had an only child, John M'Connell; after whose birth, and sometime in 1781, Charles M'Connell died. Afterwards, his widow, Elizabeth, intermarried with one John Hammond, by whom she had one child only, John Barnitz Hammond, and died on the 22d of April, 1788. After her death, John Hammond intermarried with Elizabeth Anderson, and died on the 7th of April, 1805, leaving issue by the last marriage, Jane B. Hammond and Henry Hammond, his heirs at law, who are now alive, under whom the defendant in ejectment claims. On the 7th of April, 1794, Catharine Barnitz died seized of the premises, *having [457 first duly made her last will and testament. By that will she devised to the said John M'Connell, in fee, two certain parcels of land. She then devised another parcel of land, including her mansion-house, to the said John Barnitz Hammond, to the intent and uses following, viz., subject (as to the rents thereof) to certain trusts for the maintenance and education of the said John Barnitz Hammond, and for the payment of certain specific debts of the testatrix, "to the use of John Hammond, the father, for "and during the minority of the said John B. "Hammond, if he shall so long live, provided "the said John Hammond shall maintain, "clothe and educate the said John B. Ham-"mond, out of the rents thereof during his "minority; and from and immediately after "the said John B. Hammond shall arrive to

"the age of 21 years, or the death of the said "John Hammond, his father, which shall first "happen," then to the said John B. Hammond in fee. The testatrix then provides, "and if "it should hereafter happen that the said John "M'Connell should die before he shall arrive "to the age of 21 years, and without issue, "then I give, devise, and bequeath all the "estate of the said John M'Connell, which is "hereby devised to him, to go immediately to "the said John B. Hammond, his heirs and "assigns forever. And if it should hereafter "happen that the said John B. Hammond "should die, before he shall arrive to the age "of 21 years, and without issue, then and in "such case, after the payment of my debts as "above mentioned, I give, bequeath, and de-"vise," &c. (the same land and mansion-house before devised to John B. Hammond) "to the "said John Hammond, his heirs and assigns "forever; and also all the residue of estate "herein before or after devised to the said John "B. Hammond, and not hereby otherwise dis-"posed of, I then, and in such case, give and "devise the same to the said John M'Connell, "to hold to him, his heirs and assigns forever, "from and immediately after the death of the "said John B. Hammond as aforesaid; and in "case of the death of both of my grandsons, "under age and without issue as aforesaid, "then I give, devise, and bequeath all that part "of my estate which I have herein before "given to the said John M'Connell, to Charles "Barnitz, of," &c., "to hold to him, his heirs "and assigns forever."

458*] *The testatrix then provides for the payment of her debts, by a sale, if necessary, of some of her lots of land, on or near Church Hill, in Baltimore, and then proceeds, "And I "give and devise all the rest and residue of "of the said lots on or near Church Hill afore-"said, and all my estate therein (subject never-"theless to the devises aforesaid) to my said "grandsons John M'Connell and John B. "Hammond, their heirs and assigns forever, "to be equally divided between them, share "and share alike, as tenants in common, and "not as joint-tenants." After some inter-mediate bequests, the testatrix devises "all the "rest, residue, and remainder of her estate, "real and personal, to the said John M'Connell "and John B. Hammond, their heirs and as-"signs forever, to be equally divided between "them, share and share alike."

John M'Connell attained his full age of 21 years, married, had issue, and afterwards, on the 7th of April, 1802, died without leaving any surviving issue. And John B. Hammond died on the 12th of February, 1808, under the age of 21 years, and without issue.

The lessors of the plaintiff are the children and heirs at law of Charles Barnitz, who was the only brother of Daniel Barnitz, the testator. And upon the defect of lineal heirs, the said lessors claim as next heirs, in blood, of John M'Connell, on the part of his mother Elizabeth Barnitz, the daughter of Daniel Barnitz. It is admitted that the inheritable blood is extinct on the part of Charles M'Connell, the father of John M'Connell.

At the death of John B. Hammond, the property consisted of four descriptions; which it may be proper to enumerate.

1. The land specifically devised to John M'Connell, with a limitation over to John B. Hammond.

2. The land specifically devised to John B. Hammond, with a limitation over in fee to his father.

3. The moiety of the Church Hill lots, and the residuary estate devised to John M'Connell, in fee.

*4. The moiety of the Church Hill [459 lots, and the residuary estate devised to John B. Hammond in fee, with a limitation over to John M'Connell.

At the time of the death of Catharine Barnitz (as she survived her daughter), her two grandsons, M'Connell and Hammond, were her heirs at law.

Harper, for plaintiff in error.

1. As to the devise to John M'Connell, with limitation over, in case of his death under age and without issue, to J. B. Hammond. This was a fee-simple in M'Connell, with a conditional limitation, and not an estate tail. (1 Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 9, 10, Dublin ed. 1795, id. 409; Powell on Devises, 261; 7 T. R., 589, Shears v. Jeffrey; Plowd., 408; 3 Co., 10; Carthew, 175; Dyer, 127.)

Upon J. M'Connell's arrival at full age he had an absolute estate in fee, because the condition never could happen which was to defeat his estate.

As he took by purchase, and not by descent, and as at the time of his death he left neither child, nor brother or sister of the whole blood, the estate descended, according to the statute of descents in Maryland, to his brother of the half blood, John B. Hammond.

J. B. Hammond took it by descent, through his mother, and therefore the estate descended to him "on the part of his mother," within the meaning of the statute.

He certainly took by descent, and not by purchase; and the commune vinculum, which connected him with his brother, must be traced through his mother.

The statute was intended to prevent escheats pro defectu sanguinis, and to provide for all cases.

The legislature meant to comprehend all cases in three classes.

1. Where the estate had descended to the intestate, on the part of the father.

2. Where it had descended, on the part of the mother; and

*3. Where it had vested in the in- [460 testate by purchase, and not derived from or through any of his ancestors.

The court will not suppose that the legislature has omitted to provide for the case where the estate has descended from a brother to a brother, but will rather place the present case in the second class.

The legislature did not mean to limit the 2d class to cases where the estate had descended from the mother, because it provides, that if there be no child or descendant of the intestate, the estate shall go to the mother: And it would be absurd to say, that an estate which had descended from the mother, should descend again to the mother. So if the estate had descended from the mother's father directly to the mother's son, it would be an estate which had descended to the son on the part of his mother, and yet it had not descended either from or through his mother, for the estate had never vested in her. The statute must mean every case where the blood must be traced through the mother; every case where the mother is a link of the chain which connects the intestate with the person from whom the estate descended to him.

This estate, therefore, must be understood, as having descended to J.B. Hammond, on the part of his mother; and therefore, inasmuch as at his death he left neither child nor descendant, nor mother, nor brother or sister of the blood of the mother, nor descendant of such brother or sister, nor grandfather on the part of the mother, nor descendant of such grandfather, nor father of such grandfather, and inasmuch as the lessors of the plaintiff are the descendants of the father of such grandfather, the estate must, by the provisions of the statute, descend to them.

2d. The devise to John M'Connell, in fee, of the moiety of the Church hill lots, and of the general residuum, vested in him a fee-simple estate from the beginning. He took by purchase under the will. It descended to J. B. Hammond by the same rule of descent as in the former case, and by the same construction of the statute has descended from him to the plaintiffs.

3d. The third case under this will, is that of the specific devise to J. B. Hammond, with 461] limitation over, in *case of his death under age and without issue, to John M'Connell.

J. B. Hammond died under age and without issue, so that the fee devised to him was defeated, and would have vested immediately in John M'Connell, if he had been alive, but he died in the life time of J. B. Hammond. In whom then did it vest? By the rules of the common law, John M'Connell had such an interest in the devise, as was descendible to his heirs. Who were his heirs? Not they who were such at the time of his death, but they who answered the description of his heirs at the time of the death of J. B. Hammond. (2 Fearne, 529; Id., 535; 2, Wilson, 29; Goodright v. Searle.)

John M'Connell, if he had been alive at the time of the death of J. B. Hammond, would have taken the fee by purchase, and the lessors of the plaintiff were the only persons who could at that time entitle themselves as his heirs, there being no heirs of the paternal line then living.

Martin and Pinkney, Attorney-General, contra.

The executory devises were void, because the contingency is the dying "without issue" indefinitely, and not limiting it to the case of dying without leaving issue alive at the time of his death. (1 Fearne, 411; 2 Fearne, 74, 144, 5, 154; 1 Sid., 148, Cotterson v. Right; 4 Bac. Ab., 251, Gwillim's Ed.; 2 Fearne, 187, 358; 1 P. Wms., 198, Nichols v. Hooper; 2 Fearne, 245; 2 Fearne, 206, 159, 154, 160; 2 H. Bl., 358.)

The limitations, over being void, each took an absolute fee-simple in the lands devised to him.

Upon the death of John M'Counell, the estate descended, according to the provisions of the statute, to J. B. Hammond, who took, not by way of descent at common law, but by force of the statute. The preamble of the statute shows that the legislature meant to abolish the law of descents altogether.

The expression "on the part of the mother," means, from or through the mother. Now this estate never came to J. B. Hammond from or through his mother. Under *the 3d [462 branch of the statute, every estate which comes to an intestate, "and not derived from or through either of the ancestors," is supposed to have come by purchase, and is to descend accordingly. This estate was not derived to the intestate, J. B. Hammond, from or through either of his ancestors, and therefore is to descend as if it came to him by purchase. This construction makes the statute provide for all cases, whereas the construction insisted upon by the plaintiffs, leaves the cases where the estate has descended or passed by force of the statute from brother to brother of the whole blood, or from son to father, or from husband to wife, or from wife to husband, wholly unprovided for; for these are not cases of purchase, nor of descent from ancestors.

If, however the case of Hammond be casus omissus, then the estate may descend at common law through the line of his father.

One argument of the plaintiff's counsel was built upon the absurdity of supposing that the statute directed an estate to descend to the mother, which had already descended from her. But the statute only directs it to descend to the mother, by way of illustration, so as to lead to the heir.

But if the limitations over were good, then John M'Connell died seized of an hereditament, a descendible interest, which went to his heir. Who was his heir? This same J.B. Hammond, so that either way the absolute estate in fee vested in him as a purchaser, and descended to his heirs. Again, the 3d section of the statute declares, "that no right in the inheritance "shall accrue to or vest in any person, unless "such person is in being, and capable in law "to take as heir at the time of the intestate's "death." Now these plaintiffs were not "capable in law to take as heirs" to John M'Connell "at the time of his death." So that they are prohibited by the statute from taking the benefit of this executory devise, even if they could do so by the common law. Under the statute, J. M'Connell had, at his death, an inheritable interest in the land devised to J. B. Hammond, with limitation over. The statute makes no difference between vested and contingent interests; they all descend alike.

*But there is a fatal objection to the [463 plaintiff's recovery in this case. The lessors of the plaintiff are tenants in common with the defendants; and one tenant in common cannot maintain ejectment against another, without proof of actual ouster. Such ouster is not proved.

Harper, in reply.

The defendants have confessed lease, entry and ouster, and therefore, an actual ouster need not be proved.

The whole question is as to the meaning of the words "descent on the part of the mother."

There are only two modes of acquiring property, viz., by purchase and by descent; by the act of the party, or by act of law.

Descents are either lineal or collateral. Lineal is from the ancestor in the direct descending line. Collateral, is where you first ascend to the common ancestor and then descend until you find the heir.

The construction of the statute adopted by the defendants, allows only one kind of descent —lineal. The statute uses the word "descent" generally, comprehending both kinds. It says from or through either of his ancestors. "From" applies to lineal descent; "through" to collateral. If the statute includes collateral descents, there is an end of the question. If a man takes an estate by reason of his mother, he takes through his mother. If a man takes as great grandson from I. S., the estate has not passed through the father or grandfather, yet he takes through them. So in tracing a collateral descent, the estate does not go through the intermediate links, yet the heir claims through them.

As to the executory devises. The contingency was not too remote nor indefinite. It must be determined within 21 years. If the contingency had been simply dying without issue, there would be weight in the objection; but it is dying under age, and without issue; so that if he came of age, or had issue, the estate became absolute. Here are not two conditions, but two facts making one condition.

464*] *The plaintiffs do not take as heirs, but as purchasers under the will by the description of their person; if they answer the description of heirs at the time the contingency happens on which the executory devise takes effect, they must take. A possibility is not descendible. They take as purchasers. This is an answer also to the objection raised upon the 3d section of the statute. They do not claim as heirs, and therefore are not within the statute. The statute refers to their natural capacity to take. It alludes to the disability of alienage, attaint, &c., and was intended to exclude posthumous children in cases of collateral descent.

March 11th, 1813. Present, MARSHALL, Ch. J., WASHINGTON, DUVALL and STORY, J. J.

The court having taken time since last term to advise,

STORY, J. (after stating the facts of the case), delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It is true, that the general rule is, that an heir shall not take by devise, when he may take the same estate in the land by descent. (1 Roll. Abr., 626. l. 30; Hob., 30; 1 Salk., 242; 1 Bl. Rep., 22.)

But it is not denied that all the estates which each of the grandsons derived under the will were estates by purchase. Admitting the executory devises over to be good, there could be no doubt as to any part of the estates; for the estates are of a quality different from what the parties would have taken in the course of descent.

It has been argued by the plaintiff's counsel, upon the foregoing facts, that as to the whole estate immediately devised to John M'Connell, the lessors of the plaintiff are entitled to recover, in the events which have happened, as his heirs ex parte materna; and that as to the estate devised to him upon the contingency of the death of John B. Hammond under age and without issue, the lessors of the plaintiff are entitled to recover as the heirs at law of John M'Connell, at the time when the contingency happened, although not heirs at the time of his death.

*The decision of these points depends [465 upon the true construction of the statute of descents of Maryland, and the application thereto of the principles of the common law.

This statute of descents (1786, ch. 45), after reciting that the law of descents which originated with the feudal system and military tenures, is contrary to justice, and ought to be abolished, enacts, "That if any person seized of an estate," &c., "shall die intestate thereof, such lands," &c., "shall descend to the kindred, male and female, of such person, in the following order, to wit: First, to the child or children, and their descendants, if any, equally, and if no child or descendant, and the estate descended to the intestate on the part of the father, then to the father, and if no father living, then to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the blood of the father, and their descendants equally, and if no brother or sister as aforesaid, or descendant from such brother or sister, then to the grandfather on the part of the father, and if no such grandfather living, then to the descendants of such grandfather and their descendants, in equal degree equally, and if no descendant of such grandfather, then to the father of such grandfather, and if none such living, then to the descendants of the father of such grandfather in equal degree, and so on, passing to the next lineal male paternal ancestor, and if none such, to his descendants in equal degree, without end: And if no paternal ancestor, or descendant from such ancestor, then to the mother of the intestate, and if no mother living, to her descendants in equal degree equally, and if no mother living, or descendants from such mother, then to the maternal ancestors and their descendants in the same manner as is above directed as to the paternal ancestors and their descendants. And if the estate descended to the intestate on the part of the mother, and the intestate shall die without any child or descendant as aforesaid, then the estate shall go to the mother, and if no mother living, then to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the blood of the mother, and their descendants in equal degree equally, and if no such brother or sister, or descendant of such brother or sister, then to the grandfather on the part of the mother, and if no such grandfather living, then to his descendants in equal degree equally, and if no such *descendant of [466 such grandfather, then to the father of such grandfather, and if none such living, then to his descendants in equal degree, and so on, passing to the next male maternal ancestor, and if none such living, to his descendants in equal degree, and if no such maternal ancestor, or descendant from any maternal ancestor, then to the father of the intestate, and if no father living, to his descendants in equal degree equally, and if no father living, or descendant from the father, then to the paternal ancestors and their descendants, in the same manner as is above directed as to the maternal ancestors."

"And if the estate is or shall be vested in the intestate by purchase, and not derived from or through either of his ancestors, and there be no child or descendant of such intestate, then the estate shall descend to the brothers and sisters of such intestate of the whole blood, and their descendants in equal degree equally, and if no brother or sister of the whole blood, or descendant from such brother or sister, then to the brothers and sisters of the half blood and their descendants, in equal degree equally, and if no brother or sister of the whole or half blood, or any descendant from such brother or sister, then to the father, and if no father living, then to the mother, and if no mother living, then to the grandfather on the part of the father, and if no such grandfather living, then to the descendants of such grandfather, in equal degree equally, and if no such grandfather, or any descendant from him, then to the grandfather on the part of the mother, and if no such grandfather, then to his descendants in equal degree equally, and so on without end, alternating the next male paternal ancestor and his descendants, and the next male maternal ancestor and his descendants; and giving preference to the paternal ancestor and his descendants; and if there be no descendants or kindred of the intestate as aforesaid to take the estate, then the same shall go to the husband or wife, as the case may be; and if the husband or wife be dead, then to his or her kindred in the like course as if such husband or wife had survived the intestate, and then had died entitled to the estate by purchase; and if the intestate has had more husbands or wives than one, and all shall die before such intestate, then the estate shall be equally divided among the kindred of the several husbands or wives in equal degree equally."

467*] *Three classes of cases are here in terms provided for.

1. "Estates descended to the intestate on the "part of the father."

2. "Estates descended to the intestate on the "part of the mother."

3. "Estates vested in the intestate by pur- "chase and not derived from or through either "of his ancestors."

The case of a propositus dying seized of an estate which descended to him from his brother who had taken the same by purchase or by descent not ex parte paterna or materna; and the case of a propositus dying seized of an estate which descended to him from his own child who had taken the same by purchase or by a like descent; are not directly within the language of the statute. For, by the common law, a descent from brother to brother is held to be an immediate descent, and not from or through the parents; and the express provision of the statute of Maryland as to estates of purchase, necessarily involves the same conclusion; and the same may be declared of a descent from a child to a parent under the same statute.

It has been argued that the legislature intended to form a complete scheme of descents; and that the court ought not to construe any case to be a casus omissus, if by any reasonable construction the words can be extended to embrace it. Both parties accede to this argument, but they apply it in a very different manner. The plaintiffs contend that the descent from brother to brother was meant to be included in the first and second classes of descents, as the parents were the common link of connection from and through whom the consanguinity was to be sought; that therefore the descent, in such case, is ex-parte paterna, or materna, as the father or mother happens to be the commune vinculum. And the plaintiffs rely on the words "and not derived from or through either of his ancestors," in the clause embracing the third class, as distinctly showing that the legislature deemed every case of descents to be completely within the preceding classes. On the other hand, the defendants contend that whatever might be the legislative supposition, it is impossible to support the position, that a descent from brother to brother, or from child to parent, is a descent ex-parte paterna or materna. *It is therefore, either a casus omissus, or the words "and not derived from or through either of his ancestors" are to be considered not as qualifying and limiting the preceding words, but as either constituting a fourth class of cases, embracing all such as are not included in the three preceding classes; or as explaining estates by purchase to include all cases which are not paternal or maternal descents. [468

There are certainly intrinsic difficulties in admitting either of these constructions. If the legislature have proceeded on a mistake, it would be dangerous to declare that a court of law were bound to enlarge the natural import of words in order to supply deficiencies occasioned by that mistake. It would be still more dangerous to admit that because the legislature have expressed an intention to form a scheme of descents, the court were bound to bring every case within the specified classes. In the present case, equal violence would be done to the ordinary use of the terms employed by adopting the construction contended for by either party.

It is not a descent from or through the paternal or maternal line, in the sense of the common law. Nor is it a purchase.

The words "and not derived from or through either of his ancestors" are manifestly used as explanatory of the legal import of purchase. They are the exact words which the common law selects to distinguish the estate of a purchaser from the estate of an heir.

It is obvious that the legislature use the words descent and purchase in their technical and legal sense. They have also expressly provided for the case of a descent from brother to brother, passing by the parents; and from a child to a parent, when there are no brothers or sisters. These descents must therefore be direct and immediate; and the former case is so deemed also at the common law. It is therefore in our judgment perfectly clear, that a descent from brother to brother is not within the statute, and of course is a casus omissus, to be regulated by the common law.

To apply this to the present case. By the arrival of John M'Connell at the age of 21 years, all the estates *devised to him [469 immediately became absolute estates in fee-simple. On his death they passed to his half brother, John B. Hammond; and upon his death they passed to the heirs at law of the latter. The lessors of the plaintiff have therefore made no sufficient title thereto.

Let us now consider the second question: whether the lessors of the plaintiff have any title to the estates which were devised over to John M'Connell upon the contingency of John

B. Hammond's dying under age and without issue.

It has been argued by the defendant's counsel that this executory devise is void because the contingency is too remote.

It is the acknowledged rule, that an executory devise is not too remote if the contingency may happen within a life or lives in being, or 21 years and a few months after.

In the present case the contingency must have happened within 21 years at all events. For if John B. Hammond attained his full age the estate vested absolutely. To have defeated the estate over, it was sufficient either that he attained his full age, or died under age leaving issue. The authorities are conclusive on this point. (1 Wils., 140, 270; 2 Burr, 873; 1 Taunt., 174; 2 Bos. and Pul., 38; 12 East., 288; 2 Str., 1175.) There is no validity therefore in this objection.

In the next place it will be necessary to consider what is the nature of an executory devise as to its transmissibility to heirs, where the devisee dies before the happening of the contingency.

And it seems very clear that at common law, contingent remainders and executory devises are transmissible to the heirs of the party to whom they are limited, if he chance to die before the contingency happens. (Pollexfen, 54; 1 Rep., 99; Cas. Temp. Talb., 117.) In such case, however, it does not vest absolutely in the first heir so as upon his death to carry it to his heir at law, who is not heir at law of the first devisee, but it devolves from heir to heir, and vests absolutely in him only who can make 470] himself heir to the first devisee at *the time when the contingency happens, and the executory devise falls into possession.

This rule is adopted in analogy to that rule of descent which requires that a person who claims a fee-simple by descent from one who was first purchaser of the reversion or remainder expectant on a freehold estate, must make himself heir of such purchaser at the time when that reversion or remainder falls into possession. (Co. Lit., 11, [b.] 14, [a.] 3 Rep., 42.) Nor does it vary the legal result that the person to whom the preceding estate is devised, happens to be the heir of the executory devisee, for though on the death of the latter the executory devise devolves upon him, yet it is not merged in the preceding estate, but expects the regular happening of the contingency and then vests absolutely in the then heir of the executory devisee. The case of Goodright v. Searle (2 Wils., 29), is decisive on this point, and indeed runs on all fours with the present.

But it is contended that the statute of descents of Maryland has changed the rule of the common law in this respect, and has made the death of the intestate the point of time from which the descent and heirship are in every case to be traced. The third section, which is relied on for this purpose, enacts as follows: "That no right in the inheritance shall accrue "to or vest in any person, other than to child- "ren of the intestate and their descendants, un- "less such person is in being, and capable in "law to take as heir at the time of the intestate's "death; but any child or descendant of the in- "testate, born after the death of the intestate, "shall have the same right of inheritance as if "born before the death of the intestate."

In our judgment, the conclusion drawn from this clause is not correct. The object of the section is to limit the natural capacity to take, as heirs to persons in being at the time of the death of the intestate, where the estate is then capable of vesting in possession; and not to make persons heirs, who, if in being at the time, would not, by the common law, answer the description of absolute heirs, or to give a vested absolute interest, where the common law had given only a possible contingent interest. The legislature had in view cases of *posthu- [471 mous children, and cases where a descent to an heir had been defeated by the subsequent birth of a nearer heir. The argument of the defendants on this point ought not, therefore, to prevail. No question has been made as to the land specifically devised to John B. Hammond in fee with a limitation over to his father in fee. As that limitation over was a good executory devise, and, in the events which happened, took effect, it is very clear that the lessors of the plaintiff cannot claim title thereto. This is indeed conceded on all sides.

The result of this opinion accordingly is, that the lessors of the plaintiff are entitled, as heirs of John M'Connell at the happening of the contingency, on the death of John B. Hammond, under age and without issue, to one moiety of the Church Hill lands, and the residuary estates as tenants in common with the heirs of John B. Hammond; but they are not entitled to any portion of the lands of which John M'Connell had an absolute vested fee at the time of his decease.

As, however, a tenant in common cannot in general maintain an action of ejectment against his co-tenant, and there are no facts found in this case to prove an actual ouster and to take it out of the general rule, the consequence is that the judgment, in the opinion of a majority of the court, must be affirmed with costs.

BLACKWELL
v.
PATTON & ERWIN'S LESSEE.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J. and TODD, J.

By the laws of N. Carolina and Tennessee a deed for land in Tennessee, executed in N. Carolina, by grantors residing there in the year 1794, proved in 1797, by one of the subscribing witnesses before a judge in N. Carolina, and recorded in 1808, in the proper county in Tennessee, is valid, and may be given in evidence in ejectment.

In ejectment the date of the demise in the declaration may be amended during the trial so as to conform to the title.

The first grant from the state of N. Carolina upon an entry, is valid, although issued upon a duplicate warrant, the original being in the hands of the Surveyor-General, although a subsequent grant issue upon the original warrant for other lands.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Tennessee, in an action of ejectment brought by the lessee of Patton and Erwin, against Blackwell, for 5,000 acres of land, in Bedford county, in the state of Tennessee.

At the trial the defendant took three bills of exceptions.

The first stated, that the plaintiff produced in evidence, at the trial, a deed of bargain and sale from I. G. and Thomas Blount, to whom 472] it was alleged *the land had been granted by the state of North Carolina, while it was a part of that state. The deed from I. G. and T. Blount, was executed on the 9th of October, 1794, to David Allison. On the 29th of September, 1797, it was proved by one of the subscribing witnesses before John Heywood, a judge of the Supreme Court of law and equity, for the state of North Carolina, and registered in Stoke's county.

On the 9th of December, 1807, the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, who were dead, and of the grantors, was proved before Samuel Powell, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of law and equity of the state of Tennessee, who ordered it to be registered. At November term, 1808, in the Supreme Court of Tennessee, for Mero district (in which the land lies), the hand writing of the grantors, and of the subscribing witnesses, was again proved, and on the 28th of December, 1808, the deed was recorded in the proper county. On the trial (which was in June term, 1810), the plaintiff offered parol evidence to prove the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses and their death before the month of December, 1807, and also to prove the handwriting of the grantors.

To the admission of this evidence the defendant below objected, but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the deed in evidence.

The 2d bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiff also offered in evidence a deed to his lessors, bearing date after the demise laid in the declaration, to the admission of which deed the defendant objected, but the court admitted it to be read in evidence, saying the date of the demise was immaterial, or the plaintiff might amend his declaration, which he did, before the jury retired from the bar, by altering the date of the demise.

The 3d bill of exceptions stated, that the defendant offered evidence to prove that the original grant or patent from the state of North Carolina to I. G. and Thomas Blount, was issued upon a duplicate warrant, while the original warrant was in the hands of the surveyor general; and that I. G. and Thomas Blount afterwards obtained another grant or patent 473] from the state *of North Carolina for other lands upon the original warrant. To the admission of this evidence, the plaintiff objected, and the court rejected it.

Martin, for the plaintiff in error.

1. The deed from I. G. and T. Blount to Allison, was not proved and registered according to the laws of North Carolina, or of Tennessee, so as to be valid.

The law of North Carolina (1715, ch. 30, § 5, p. 18) requires every deed to be acknowledged, or proved, in open court, or before the chief justice, and registered within 12 months after its date, in the county where the land lies. This deed bears date the 9th of October, 1794, was never acknowledged nor properly proved, and was not registered till the 28th of December, 1808.

By the law of England, a deed of bargain and sale is inoperative, until enrolled; in the same manner as a deed of feoffment does not operate until livery of seizen. A deed by a joint-tenant—a deed for the reversion and payment of rent to the bargainor are good before enrollment. The bargainee is not seized before enrollment, and if he dies before enrollment, his wife is not entitled to dower, although when enrolled it relates back to its date. (1 Bac. Abr., 473; 2 Bl. Com., 311; 3 Wood's Conveyancer, 32 to 34.)

2. The court ought not to have permitted the deed to the lessors of the plaintiff, dated after the demise, to be given in evidence on that declaration, nor to have suffered the plaintiff to amend his declaration after the jury was sworn. (2 Str., 1086, Beddington v. Parkhurst; Runnington, 87; Bul. N. P., 105, Basset v. Basset.)

Courts have gone no further in permitting amendments in ejectment, at the trial, than to enlarge the term which had expired, or to correct grammatical errors. Although the declaration is a fiction in form, yet what is of substance must be truly set forth.

3. The act of North Carolina (1783, ch. 2, p. 322, § 9, 10 and 11) which prohibits the issuing of a grant *upon a duplicate warrant, [474 was in force when this warrant was issued. It was a fraud upon the state, for only one warrant was paid for, and yet it was made to operate as two.

Campbell, contra.

1st. There were other laws of North Carolina, and of Tennessee, extending from time to time the term for registering deeds, so that any deed, even of 50 years standing, may now be registered.

The probate of the deed, before judge Haywood, on the 29th of September, 1797, brings the deed within the act of Tennessee (1809, Nov. 23, ch. 100, § 4, p. 129), by which it is enacted, "That all deeds, or mesne conveyan-"ces, for land within this state, which shall "have been made and executed out of the lim-"its of this state, and shall have been proven "by one or more of the subscribing witnesses "thereto, or acknowledged by the grantor or "grantors, before any judge of any court in "another state, or before the mayor of any "city or corporation in another state, and shall "have been registered in this state in the coun-"ty where the land or any part thereof lies, "within the time required by law for register-"ing the same, such probate and registration "shall be good and sufficient to entitle the same "to be read in evidence in any court within "this state."

But the probate and the admission to registration is conclusive on this point.

To show that the term for registering deeds had been kept open until the present time, he cited the following laws: Iredell's revisal of the laws of North Carolina, p. 83, 1741, c. 1, § 2, 3; p. 173. 1756, c. 6, § 2, 3; p. 196, 1760, c. 6, § 2; p. 213, 1764; p. 224, 1766; p. 246; 1770; p. 269, 1773; p. 289, 1777; p. 424, 1782; p. 487, 1784; p. 590, 1786; p. 640; 1 Sess. a. a. p. 665, 668. Laws of Tennessee, 1794, c. 22, § 3, id. 1796, 1797, 1801, c. 20, § 1; 1803, c. 57; 1805. c. 16, § 1; 1807, c. 85, § 1, 2; 1809, c. 100, § 4.

2d. MARSHALL, Ch. J. Pass over the 2d point.

Campbell.* 3d. This was the first [*475 grant which issued upon this entry. It was good when it issued, and cannot be invalidated by a subsequent grant on the same warrant. Both cannot be void. If either, it must be the last.

March 11th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The writ of error in this case is brought to reverse a judgment obtained by the defendants in error against the plaintiffs in an ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of West Tennessee. At the trial, the plaintiffs in that court offered in evidence in order to make out their title, a deed bearing date the 9th of October, 1794, from J. G. Blount and Thomas Blount, of North Carolina, to David Allison, of Philadelphia, which deed was recorded in the county in which the lands lie on the 28th day of December, 1808. The defendants objected to the admission of this deed, and excepted to the opinion of the court overruling the objection.

The original law requiring the enregistering of deeds, passed in North Carolina (then comprehending what is now the state of Tennessee), in the year 1715. This act requires that the deed shall be acknowledged by the vendor, or proved by one or more evidences upon oath, either before the Chief Justice for the time being, or in the court of the precinct where the land lies, and registered by the public register of the precinct where the land lies within twelve months after the date thereof. It was afterwards enacted, that the deed might be registered by the clerk of the county in which the land lies, and the time for the registration of deeds was prolonged until Tennessee was erected into an independent state, after which the time for enregistering of deeds continued to be prolonged by the legislature of that state.

In the year 1797, the legislature of Tennessee enacted a law, declaring that deeds made without the limits of the state should be admitted to registration on proof that the same was acknowledged by the grantor, or proved by one or more of the subscribing witnesses in open court, in some one of the courts of the United States, and on no other proof whatever, except where the party holding such deed shall have [476] the same proved *or acknowledged within the limits of the state of Tennessee, agreeable to the mode heretofore in force and use in that state.

It is contended by the counsel for the defendants in error, that the deed being recorded in the proper county, the judgment of a competent court has been given on the sufficiency of the testimony on which it was registered, and that judgment is not examinable in any other tribunal. But this court is not of that opinion. The proof on which a deed shall be registered is prescribed by law, and it is enacted that the deed shall not be good and available in law, unless it be so proved and recorded. The evidence therefore is spread upon the record, and is always attainable. The order that a deed should be admitted to record is an exparte order, and might often be obtained improperly if the order was conclusive. It is believed to be the practice of all courts, where the law directs conveyances to be recorded, and prescribes the testimony on which they shall be recorded in terms similar to those employed in the act of North Carolina, to hold themselves at liberty to examine the proof on which the registration has been made.

This deed in the present case was proved before Judge Haywood, in North Carolina, by one of the subscribing witnesses thereto, on the 29th of September, 1797, and registered in Stoke's County, in North Carolina.

On the 9th day of December, 1807, the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, who were dead, and of the grantors, was proved before Samuel Powell, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of law and equity, in the state of Tennessee, who thereupon ordered the deed to be registered; and afterwards in November term, 1808, the same proof was received in open court in the county where the lands lie, and was ordered to be registered by that court, which order was executed.

This court is of opinion, that the deed was not sufficiently proved according to the then existing law. The probate before judge Haywood was not sufficient to prove it as a deed made out of the state, because the act of 1797 required that such probate should be made in open *court. The proof made before [477 Judge Powell, and in open court, is sufficient, because it was not made by a subscribing witness.

On the 23d of November, 1809, the legislature of Tennessee passed an act, declaring that all deeds for land within the state, made out of the state by grantors residing without the state, and "which shall have been proven by one or more of the subscribing witnesses thereto, or acknowledged by the grantor or grantors before any judge of any court in another state, or before the mayor, &c., and shall have been registered in this state in the county where the land, or any part thereof, lies, within the time required by law for registering the same, such probate and registration shall be good and sufficient to entitle the same to be read in evidence in any court within this state."

This act appears to the court to cover the precise case. This was a deed for land lying within the state of Tennessee, made out of the state by grantors residing without the state, which had been proven by one of the subscribing witnesses thereto, before a judge of a court of another state, and had been registered in the county where the land lay, within the time required by law for registering the same.

This act gave complete validity to the registration made in December, 1808, and entitled the deed to be read in evidence. It looked back, in order to affirm and legalize certain registrations made on probates which did not satisfy the laws existing at the time, but which the legislature deemed sufficient for the future.

In tracing his title, the plaintiff in the Circuit Court gave in evidence a deed to himself which bore date posterior in point of time to the demise laid in the declaration of ejectment. The defendant, on this account, objected to the deeds going in evidence to the jury, but the court overruled the objection, and declared the date of the lease to be immaterial, and that it should be overlooked, or the plantiff have leave to amend. The declaration was amended by striking out the date of the lease mentioned in the declaration, and inserting a date posterior to the conveyance made to the plaintiff.

*In an ejectment the lease is entirely [478 a fiction invented for the purpose of going fairly to trial on the title. Courts have exercised a full discretion in allowing it to be amended. A plaintiff has frequently been allowed to enlarge the term when it has expired before a final decision of the cause. Between making the term extend to a more distant day, and commence at a later day, the court can perceive no difference in substance. They are modifications of the same power intended to effect the same object; and although not precisely the same in form, the one is not greater in degree than the other. The amendment therefore was properly allowed.

Although this court is of opinion, that the Circuit Court erred in saying that it was unnecessary to prove a title in the lessor of the plaintiff at the date of the demise laid in the declaration, yet it is an error which could not injure the defendants, or in any manner affect the cause. The amendment being allowed, the question whether the deed could have been read in evidence had the amendment not been made becomes wholly immaterial, and this court will not notice it.

For the purpose of showing that the original grant was void, the defendant then offered evidence to prove, that it was founded on a duplicate warrant issued by John Armstrong, entry-taker of western lands for the state of North Carolina, in the year 1793, the original warrant being still in the hands of the Surveyor-General of the middle district within which the original entry was situated; and that the grantees, after the said grant was issued, obtained the original warrant from the Surveyor-General, and procured another grant founded thereon for other lands. To the admission of this testimony, the plaintiff objected and the court sustained the objection. To this opinion also an exception was taken.

By the laws of North Carolina, under which this entry was made, any citizen was permitted to enter with the entry-taker any quantity of land not exceeding 5,000 acres, which it was his duty to describe specifically. After the expiration of three months the entry-taker was to give him a copy of the entry, with a warrant to the surveyor to survey the land. As no 479] other *land than that described could be surveyed under this entry and warrant, while the land really entered remained vacant, it was entirely unimportant whether the survey was made under the first or a second copy of the entry. If indeed two persons claimed the same land, under different surveys and grants, the elder patentee would of course hold the land at law. But no person other than such subsequent patentee, or one claiming under him, could contest the elder grant. To the state, and to all the world, it was perfectly immaterial when this grant issued, whether it emanated on the first copy of the entry, or on any other copy, as no other use had then been made of the first copy, and this grant was unimpeachable.

In 1784, a power was given to remove entries when they were made on lands previously granted or entered. But certainly this would not extend to the removal of an entry, and the survey of other lands on a copy thereof, which entry had already been executed and carried into grant, either on the first or on any other copy. The face of the grant gave no notice that it had issued on a second copy of the entry, and as the case was not provided for by law, it was not improbable that every copy given by the entry-taker would bear the same appearance. There was nothing which would indicate to a purchaser that some future fraud might possibly be practiced whereby another grant might be obtained, and which might caution him, that a title, good to every appearance, was infected by a circumstance into which the law did not expect him to inquire. Had no subsequent patent issued in this case for other lands, it would not be contended that this patent was either void or voidable, and it is perfectly clear that a patent which was valid when issued, never can be avoided in the hands of a fair purchaser, by a subsequent fraud committed by the original patentee. It is the subsequent patent which injures the state, and which is obtained by fraud. It is the subsequent patent, if either, the validity of which is questionable.

In the year 1795, an act passed directing the books of entry-takers to be delivered to the clerks of the several county courts in which such entry-takers respectively resided: And in 1796 an act passed prescribing the *man- [480 ner in which duplicates might be obtained, where the warrants were lost, and others had not been issued, while the books remained with the entry-takers.

It is strongly to be inferred, not only from the language of this act, but from the circumstance that no provision is made for duplicates to be issued by the entry-taker in future cases of lost warrants, that every copy of an entry which was granted by the entry-taker, was considered as an original, and as an equal authority to the surveyor to survey the land entered. The entry being once executed, it was his duty not to execute it again.

This act provides, that where duplicates shall issue from the clerk, by order of the court, the surveyor shall note the fact in his plat, and it shall appear on the face of the grant, that the same is issued on a duplicate, and shall be liable to become null and void, if it shall appear that a grant had been obtained on the original warrant.

This act applies only to grants issued on duplicates obtained in conformity with its provisions, and would seem to respect only the junior patent. It cannot affect the grant in this case, which was issued before its passage. But it affords strong reason for the opinion, that the state of North Carolina did not purpose to impeach its own grants, unless they conveyed notice to the world that they were impeachable, and even then they were voidable, not void. An individual not claiming under the same entry, could not avail himself of their liability to be avoided.

It is the opinion of the court that there is no error, and that the judgment be affirmed.

Nil debet is not a good plea to an action founded on a judgment of another state.

NOTE.—This case is founded on the U. S. constitutional provision that "Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other ment of the Supreme Court of the state of New York, to which the defendent below pleaded nil debet, which plea, upon general demurrer, was adjudged bad.

By the constitution of the United States (art. 4, sect. 1), it is declared, that "full faith and "credit shall be given, in each state, to the "public acts, records and judicial proceedings "of every other state. And the Congress may, "by general laws, prescribe the manner in "which such acts, records and proceedings "shall be proved, and the effect thereof."

The act of May 26th, 1790 (vol. 1, p. 115), after providing the mode by which they shall be authenticated, declares, that "the said rec- "ords and judicial proceedings, authenticated "as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit "given to them, in every court within the "United States, as they have by law, or usage, "in the courts of the state from whence the "said records are, or shall be, taken."

And by the supplementary act of March 27th, 1804 (vol. 7, p. 153, § 2), it is declared, that the provisions of the original act of 26th May, 1790, shall apply as well to the records and courts of the respective territories of the United States and countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States as to the records and courts of the several states.

F. S. Key, for plaintiff in error.

The true construction of that part of the constitution and laws of the United States will confine their operation to evidence only, and will not justify such an alteration in the rules of pleading. The "effect" to be given to such copies is their "effect" as evidence, for it 482] *is not pretended that an execution could issue here upon such a record.

If nul tiel record is the proper plea, or could be pleaded in such a case, there are no means of procuring and inspecting the original record (which is essential under such an issue): and the constitution and law, not having provided for this, it must be presumed did not intend it.

The record in this case is not the original—it is certified and authenticated as a copy; and therefore unless entitled to more faith and credit here than in New York, it could not be offered to the court upon the plea of nul tiel record, for under that issue this record, even in New York, would not be admitted. The original must be produced and inspected.

But if this record would be entitled to such consideration in another state, by force of the constitution and law, it is not entitled to it in this district, which is not a state. (1 Dall., 261, Phelps v. Holker; Id., 188, James v. Allen; 1 N. Y. T. R., 460, Hitchcock v. Aicken; 1 Mass. T. R., 401, Bartlett v. Knight.)

Jones, contra.

It is admitted that a record authenticated pursuant to the act of Congress, is to have the effect of evidence only: but it is evidence of the highest nature, viz., record evidence.

In every case of debt or contract the form and effect of the plea are determined by the dignity of that debt or contract; in other words by the dignity of the evidence, whether it be of record, by specialty, or simple contract.

The act of Congress makes the authenticated exemplification of the record equivalent to the original record in its proper state; and communicates to it the same effect as evidence, thereby making it capable of sustaining the same averments in pleading, and of abiding the same tests, as the original record. It therefore cannot be denied or controverted by any plea, such as nil debet, which goes to put in issue before the jury the matters averred by the record, and the existence of the record *itself; but [483 the defendant must either distinctly deny the record, or avoid it by pleading per fraudem, satisfaction, &c. (2 Dall., 302, Armstrong v. Carson.)

In allowing this conclusive effect to the evidence of the authenticated record, it is immaterial that it has not the further effect of enabling the ministerial officers of the law to issue an ex-state." Constitution of U. S., Art. 4, Sec. 1, and the act of Congress as to how records of a state may be authenticated, and providing that records, so authenticated, shall have such faith and credit in every court of the U. S. as they have by law in the courts of the state from which they are taken. 1 Stat. at Large, 122; Rev. Stat. U. S., Sec. 906.

There has been a difference of opinion in the construction of the constitutional provision and the statute. The decision in Mills v. Duryee, supra, has been reviewed in many cases, and it has been asserted that the jurisdiction of the court may be inquired into either as to the subject matter or person. Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn., 380; Hall v. Williams, 6 Pick., 232; Pennyart v. Foote, 27 Ohio St., 600; Curtiss v. Gibbs, 1 Penning, 399; Benton v. Bargot, 10 Serg. & R., 240; Folger v. Con. Ins. J., 286; Paine v. Moorland, 15 Ohio, 445; Marx v. Fordc, 51 Mo., 69; Rogers v. Coleman, Hardin (Ky.) 413.

In a late case in New York it is held that the jurisdiction of a court of another state in which a judgment has been rendered is always open to inquiry in the courts of New York, and the judgment may also be questioned collaterally for fraud. Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y., 217.

But a judgment rendered by a court having power lawfully conferred to deal with the general subject involved in the action, and having jurisdiction of the parties, although against the facts, or without facts to sustain it, is not void as rendered without jurisdiction, and cannot be questioned collaterally. Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y., 217; Pringle v. Woolworth, 12 N. Y., Week. Dig., 554. Jurisdiction in such case will be presumed. Pacific Co. v. Wheelock, 80 N. Y., 278.

Nil debet cannot be pleaded to an action of debt on judgment rendered in a court whose records import absolute verity. Wheaton v. Doolittle, 23 Wend., 375; Sackett v. Andross, 15 Hill (N. Y.), 327.

Record of judgment of another state conclusive where it shows personal service of the process. Miller v. Brcabane, 68 N. Y., 83.

A decree of divorce, obtained in another state, against an absent defendant, without service in the mode prescribed by the law of such state, may be impeached in a collateral proceeding, on proof of the omission of such service; such decree is without jurisdiction, or based on fraud. Stanton v. Crosby, 9 Hun., 370; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 46 N. Y., 30.

The case of Mills v. Duryee, supra, is explained and limited in D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How., 165, 175, and distinguished in M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet., 312.

Where the record discloses jurisdictional facts, and where such record cannot be impeached as to such facts in the state where such judgment was rendered, it cannot be controverted in the tribunals of another state. Zepp v. Hager, 70 Ill., 223; Craft v. Clark, 31 Iowa, 77; Westcott v. Brown, 13 Ind., 83.

The record will be evidence of jurisdictional facts. Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend., 447.

ecution thereon, for that objection would be equally valid against the record when used in its proper state, but out of the jurisdiction of its proper court; and also against the sentences of foreign courts of admiralty under the law of nations.

The act of Congress communicates to the authenticated record the effect of record evidence in all courts within the United States, and does not limit it to the courts in any state, as supposed by the plaintiff in error.

March 11th. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The question in this case is, whether nil debet is a good plea to an action of debt brought in the courts of this district on a judgment rendered in a court of record of the state of New York, one of the United States.

The decision of this question depends altogether upon the construction of the constitution and laws of the United States.

By the constitution it is declared that "full "faith and credit shall be given in each state "to the public acts, records and judicial pro- "ceedings of every other state; and the Con- "gress may, by general laws, prescribe the "manner in which such acts, records and pro- "ceedings shall be proved and the effect there- "of."

By the act of 26th May, 1790 (ch. 11), Congress provided for the mode of authenticating the records and judicial proceedings of the state courts, and then further declared that "the "records and judicial proceedings, authentica- "ted as aforesaid, shall have such faith and "credit given to them in every court within "the United States as they have by law or 484] "usage in the courts of *the state from "whence the said records are or shall be taken."

It is argued that this act provides only for the admission of such records as evidence, but does not declare the effect of such evidence when admitted. This argument cannot be supported. The act declares that the record duly authenticated shall have such faith and credit as it has in the state court from whence it is taken. If in such court it has the faith and credit of evidence of the highest nature, viz., record evidence, it must have the same faith and credit in every other court. Congress have therefore declared the effect of the record by declaring what faith and credit shall be given to it.

It remains only then to inquire in every case what is the effect of a judgment in the state where it is rendered. In the present case the defendant had full notice of the suit, for he was arrested and gave bail, and it is beyond all doubt that the judgment of the Supreme Court of New York was conclusive upon the parties in that state. It must, therefore, be conclusive here also.

But it is said that admitting that the judgment is conclusive, still nil debet was a good plea; and nul tiel record could not be pleaded, because the record was of another state and could not be inspected or transmitted by certiorari. Whatever may be the validity of the plea of nil debet after verdict, it cannot be sustained in this case. The pleadings in an action are governed by the dignity of the instrument on which it is founded. If it be a record, conclusive between the parties, it cannot be denied but by the plea of nul tiel record; and when Congress gave the effect of a record to the judgment it gave all the collateral consequences. There is no difficulty in the proof. It may be proved in the manner prescribed by the act, and such proof is of as high a nature as an inspection, by the court, of its own record, or as an exemplification would be in any other court of the same state. Had this judgment been sued in any other court of New York, there is no doubt that nil debet would have been an inadmissible plea. Yet the same objection might be urged that the record could not be inspected. The law however is *undoubted that [485 an exemplification would in such case be decisive. The original need not be produced.

Another objection is that the act cannot have the effect contended for, because it does not enable the courts of another state to issue executions directly on the original judgment. This objection, if it were valid, would equally apply to every other court of the same state where the judgment was rendered. But it has no foundation. The right of a court to issue execution depends upon its own powers and organization. Its judgments may be complete and perfect and have full effect independent of the right to issue execution.

The last objection is, that the act does not apply to courts of this district. The words of the act afford a decisive answer, for they extend "to every court within the United States."

Were the construction contended for by the plaintiff in error to prevail, that judgments of the state courts ought to be considered prima facie evidence only, this clause in the constitution would be utterly unimportant and illusory. The common law would give such judgments precisely the same effect. It is manifest however that the constitution contemplated a power in Congress to give a conclusive effect to such judgments. And we can perceive no rational interpretation of the act of Congress, unless it declares a judgment conclusive when a court of the particular state where it is rendered would pronounce the same decision.

On the whole the opinion of a majority of the court is that the judgment be affirmed with costs.

JOHNSON, J. In this case I am unfortunate enough to dissent from my brethren.

I cannot bring my mind to depart from the cannons of the common law, especially the law of pleading, without the most urgent necessity. In this case I see none.

A judgment of an independent unconnected jurisdiction *is what the law calls a for- [486 eign judgment, and it is every where acknowledged that nil debet is the proper plea to such a judgment. Nul tiel record is the proper plea only when the judgment derives its origin from the same source of power with the court before which the action on the former judgment is instituted. The former concludes to the country, the latter to the court, and is triable only by inspection.

If a different decision were necessary to give effect to the 1st section 4th article of the constitution, and the act of 26th May, 1790, I should not hesitate to yield to that necessity. But no such necessity exists; for by receiving the record of the state court properly authenticated as conclusive evidence of the debt, full effect is given to the constitution and the law. And such appears, from the terms made use of by the legislature, to have been their idea of the course to be pursued in the prosecution of the suit upon such a judgment. For faith and credit are terms strictly applicable to evidence.

I am induced to vary in deciding on this question from an apprehension that receiving the plea of nul tiel record may at some future time involve this court in inextricable difficulty. In the case of Holker and Parker, which we had before us this term, we see an instance in which a judgment for $150,000 was given in Pennsylvania upon an attachment levied on a cask of wine and debt brought on that judgment in the state of Massachusetts. Now if in this action nul tiel record must necessarily be pleaded, it would be difficult to find a method by which the enforcing of such a judgment could be avoided. Instead of promoting then the object of the constitution by removing all cause for state jealousies, nothing could tend more to enforce them than enforcing such a judgment. There are certain eternal principles of justice which never ought to be dispensed with, and which courts of justice never can dispense with but when compelled by positive statute. One of those is, that jurisdiction cannot be justly exercised by a state over property not within the reach of its process, or over persons not owing them allegiance or not subjected to their jurisdiction by being found within their limits. But if the states are at liberty to pass the most absurd laws on this 487] subject, and we *admit of a course of pleading which puts it out of our power to prevent the execution of judgments obtained under those laws, certainly an effect will be given to that article of the constitution in direct hostility with the object of it.

I will not now undertake to decide, nor does this case require it, how far the courts of the United States would be bound to carry into effect such judgments; but I am unwilling to be precluded, by a technical nicety, from exercising our judgment at all upon such cases.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J. and TODD, J.

The length of time a vessel may wait to take in her cargo, without discharging the underwriters, does not depend on the usage of the trade.

The danger which will justify a vessel in remaining in port a long time, without discharging the underwriters, must be obvious, immediate, directly applied to the interruption of the voyage, and imminent, not distant, contingent and indefinite.

If, according to the usage of the trade, a vessel be permitted to go from one port to another to collect her cargo, and she unnecessarily exhaust at one port the whole time allowed according to the usage of the trade to complete her cargo, she cannot go to the other port without being guilty of such a deviation as will avoid the policy.

What is a reasonable apprehension of danger is a question of law to be decided by the court. (Quære.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland. The case arose upon a policy of insurance on the Snow Comet, "at and from "Baltimore to Barcelona, and at and from "Barcelona back to Baltimore."

She arrived at Barcelona on the 25th of July, 1807, and after remaining forty days under quarantine, went up to the city where she remained until the 8th of January, 1808. She then proceeded to Salou for the principal part of her cargo, which she took in there and sailed from thence on her return voyage to Baltimore on the 28th of January, 1808, and was captured by the British and condemned under the orders in council of the 7th of November, 1807.

At the trial the defendants insisted on the delay at Barcelona and the stopping at Salou as deviations which destroyed the plaintiff's right to recover upon the policy. The plaintiff justified the stopping at Salou *by the [488 usage of the trade. To justify the delay at Barcelona he relied on two grounds, 1st, a reasonable apprehension of capture; and 2d, the usage of the trade. But the court below decided that these excuses, under the circumstances stated in the bills of exceptions, were insufficient. Verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendants, and the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

The circumstances relied upon to show a reasonable apprehension of danger were stated in the captain's protest to be as follows: that hearing, in the month of August, news respecting the dispute between Great Britain and the United States respecting the Chesapeake frigate, the agents recommended their remaining in Barcelona until they should hear how the differences should terminate, as part of their return cargo was to be purchased by bills on London. That when they were in the act of sailing for Salou on the 1st of December, they were informed that the Algerine cruisers were out capturing American vessels, and they were advised to remain until they received further information.

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1st. That the vessel had a right, under the usage proved, to remain at Barcelona till her cargo was provided at Salou, and then to go to Salou to take it in. And, 2d. That she had a right to remain at Barcelona till the danger of the Algerine cruisers had passed away. (1 Marshall, 204; 1 Johnson, 181, 301; 2 Johnson, 138; 3 Johnson, 352.)

Martin and Pinkney, contra,

Did not deny that a reasonable apprehension of great danger would justify a reasonable delay; but contended there was no sufficient evidence of such reasonable apprehension. And with regard to the usage of trade they insisted, that if the vessel exhausted her time for loading at Barcelona, she was not justified by the usage of the trade in going to Salou. That the court, and not the jury, was to judge from the facts whether the apprehension of danger was reasonable.

Harper*, in reply, contended, [*489

That the question, whether there was reasonable apprehension of danger, was a question of fact for the jury to decide; or it was a question in which the law and fact were so blended as to be a matter properly cognizable by the jury.

March 13th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was an action brought on a policy insuring the Snow Comet at and from Baltimore to Barcelona and at and from thence back to Baltimore. The Comet arrived at Barcelona on the 25th day of July, in the year 1807, where she was compelled to perform quarantine. On the 28th of November, the Comet cleared out from Barcelona for Salou, a port of Catalonia, about sixty miles south of Barcelona, where her return cargo was ready to be taken on board. On the first of December, when in the act of sailing, the officers of the vessel were informed that the Algerine cruisers were out capturing American vessels. They were advised to remain until they received further information. On the 8th day of January, 1808, they sailed for Salou and arrived on the 10th. They were detained by high winds till the 28th of January, when they sailed for Baltimore. On the 5th of February the vessel was captured by a British cruiser, while on her return voyage, and carried into Gibraltar, where she was condemned under the orders of council of the 8th of November, 1807. Evidence was given that it was usual for vessels trading to Barcelona to touch at Salou or some other port on the same coast, to take in the whole or part of their return cargo, and that in some instances vessels had remained in the port of Barcelona four, six, and even eight months, waiting for a return cargo.

On this evidence the counsel for the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover in this cause by reason of the length of time the vessel remained at Barcelona. The court refused to give the direction as prayed, but did instruct the jury that, if they believed the facts stated, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover 490] unless from the whole *testimony in the cause they should be of opinion that the vessel did not remain longer at Barcelona than the usage and custom of trade at that place rendered necessary to complete her cargo. To this direction of the court the plaintiff, by his counsel, excepted.

This exception was not much pressed at the bar, nor does it appear to this court to contain any principle to which he could rightly object.

Unquestionably an idle waste of time, after a vessel has completed the purposes for which she entered a port, is a deviation which discharges the underwriters. If the Comet remained without excuse at Barcelona an unnecessary length of time while her cargo was ready for her and she might have sailed, she would remain at the risk of the owners—not of the underwriters.

There is however some doubt spread over the opinion in this case in consequence of the terms in which it is expressed. The vessel might certainly remain as long as was necessary to complete her cargo, but it is scarcely to be supposed that this was regulated by usage and custom. The usages and customs of a port or of a trade are peculiar to the port or trade. But the necessity of waiting where a cargo is to be taken on board until it can be obtained is common to all ports and to all trades. The length of time frequently employed in selling one cargo and procuring another may assist in proving that a particular vessel has or has not practiced unnecessary delays in port, but can establish no usage by which the time of remaining in port is fixed. The substantial part of the opinion however appears to have been, and seems so to have been understood, that the plaintiff could not recover, unless the jury should be of opinion that the vessel did not remain longer at Barcelona than was necessary to complete her cargo, of which necessity the time usually employed for that purpose might be considered as evidence.

The defendants then moved the court to instruct the jury that if the said vessel continued at Barcelona as long as was justifiable by the usage of trade at that place for completing and taking in her cargo, and did not complete and take in her cargo there, but afterwards *went to Salou and remained there the [491 length of time as stated in the said protest, in such case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

The court instructed the jury that if the vessel remained at Barcelona as long as the usage of trade justified for the purpose of taking in a cargo there, that she could not afterwards go to another port and take it in without vacating the policy.

To this opinion also the counsel for the plaintiff excepted. Upon this exception there was some difference of opinion in this court. For myself, I considered the direction as attaching the departure, which would avoid the contract, to the act of sailing to and continuing in Salou for the purpose of completing her return voyage, and am of opinion that although the Comet might have remained at Barcelona long enough to have taken in a return cargo there, for which she might or might not be blamable, yet that no additional fault was committed by touching at Salou for the purpose of completing her cargo, if to touch at Salou for that purpose was the usage of the trade.

A majority of the court, however, is of a different opinion. The usage to stay at Barcelona for a return cargo, and to touch at Salou for a return cargo, as disclosed in the plaintiff's evidence, are considered by them not as independent but as auxiliary usages which are to be taken in connection in ascertaining whether there was or was not unreasonable delay in the conduct of the voyage. The assured had a right, under these usages as they are called, to take in part of the cargo at Barcelona and part at Salou, or the whole at either port. The delay necessary for these purposes would be justifiable at either port; but if the assured exhausted the whole time at one port, which, according to the usage, was allowable only for the purpose of taking in the whole cargo, the subsequent delay at another port, for the purpose of taking in the cargo, must be considered as unreasonable. The delay at Barcelona, under such circumstances, could not be necessary for the purposes of the voyage, and therefore would determine the policy. But the deviation would rest merely in intention, until the time of sailing for Salou, 492*] for until that *time the assured would have a right to lade his cargo at Barcelona, and thus retroactively justify his stay there under the usage. The delay could not be a consummated deviation until the whole time allowed by the usage was exhausted and the party had definitively abandoned the lading of a cargo which would justify that delay. The opinion of the court below appears to the majority of this court to have procceded ou this ground, and to be correct.

The plaintiff then, in addition to the former testimony, gave evidence that it was usual for vessels to remain at Barcelona until their return cargoes, or so much thereof as might be neccssary for their completion, was provided and collected at Salou, or some other southern port in Catalonia, and then to sail to such port, for the purpose of taking in the cargoes so collected.

The defendants then moved the court to instruct the jury that since it appeared from the protest of the master and others on board the Comet, and from the sentence of condemnation produced by the plaintiff, that all the return cargo, which the said vessel took in at Barcelona, was taken in on or before the 28th of November, that the said vessel was then ready for sea, and was actually cleared out on the first of December; and that being there, and about to sail immediately for Salou, the said Snow Comet, in consequence of a report that the Algerine cruisers were out cruising in the Mediterranean against American vessels, remained at Barcelona until the 8th of January, 1808, before she sailed from Barcelona, if the jury believed these facts the plaintiff could not recover. This opinion was given by the court, and the plaintiff excepted to it.

Had not the testimony on which this application was founded been spread upou the record the court would have found some difficulty in deciding on the propriety of the opinion which was given from the terms employed in stating the applicatiou to the Circuit Court. It appears however from a comparison of the application to the court with the testimony on which it was founded, to have been intended to obtain from the court the opiniou that the testimony respecting the report that the Algerines were out capturing American vessels was 493] *not a suffieient justification for remaining at Barcelona from the 1st of December, 1807, till the 8th of January, 1808.

No doubt is entertained that the danger of capture from the Algerines, if proved to be real and immediate, would justify the continuance in the port of Barcelona.

And the apprehension of such danger, if fouuded on reasonable evidence, would produce a like effect. But in each case the danger must not be a mere general danger, indefinite in its application and locality. If it were so, in time of war, any delay, however long, in a port, would become excusable, for there would always be danger of capture from the enemy's cruisers. Nor is it sufficient that the danger should be extraordinary, for then any considerable increase of the general risk would authorize a similar delay. The danger, therefore, must be obvious and immediate in reference to the situation of the ship at the particular time. It must be such as is then directly applied to the interruption of the voyage, and imminent; not such as is merely distant, contingent and indefinite. In the present case it is not shown that there was any danger in proceeding from Barcelona to Salou. No Algerine force is shown to be interposed between those ports. Whatever might be the danger elsewhere, if there was none in proceeding to and remaining in Salou, it was the duty of the captaiu to have proceeded to that place, taken in his cargo, and remained there for further information. The captain was bound to have gone as far on his voyage as he could consistent with the general safety.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

LIVINGSTON, J.

I concur in the opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed; but in coming to this result I have thought it necessary to examine only the fourth exception which was taken below. It is, according to my view of this cause, very immaterial to inquire whether the plaintiffs succceded in establishing the usage, as it has been incorrectly termed, for a vessel to remain several months at Barcelona for the purpose of obtaining *a return [494 cargo: or whether at one period the master of the Comet entertained a well grounded apprehension of danger of capture by British vessels; or whether it was the course and usage of the trade for vessels bound from Barcelona to any foreign ports to touch at Salou, or at some other port south of Barcelona, on the coast of Catalonia, in order to take in their return cargoes; I say, whether these facts were established, or what opinion the court gave on them in the course of the trial, are, in my judgment, as this case comes up, totally irrelevant in the decision of it, because there are other facts proved, and that by the plaintiffs themselves, which are in the opinion of the whole court fatal to their claims. The facts are these: "That after all fear from British cruisers had "ceased, to wit: ou the 28th of November, "1807, being ready for sea, the vessel cleared "for Salou on the 1st day of December follow- "ing, and when in the act of sailing, informa- "tion was received that the Algerine cruisers "were out capturing American vessels; the "master was therefore advised to remain in "port uutil they received other intelligence, "and did not sail for Salou until the 8th of "January, 1808."

On this evidencc the Circuit Court instructed the jury, that if they believed these facts to be true, the plaintiffs were not eutitled to rccover. In giving this opinion the court in effect said, that the information which was received at Barcelona respecting the Algerine cruisers did not justify a stay there from the 28th of November to the 8th of January.

To this opinion two objections are made.

The one is, that the court took upon itself to decide whether the delay last mentioned proceeded from a justifiable cause, instead of leaving it to the jury to determine both the law and the fact. In doing so, I think the court committed no error. What will excuse a delay, apparently unreasonable, so as to repel the charge of a deviation on that account, must ever be and ought to be a question of law, to be decided by a court under all the circumstances of the particular case. In this way only can anything like certainty be attained; but if it be left to a jury not only to find the facts, 495] which is *exclusively within their province, but also to pronounce what is the law resulting from them, it will be next to impossible to form a system of rules by which a merchant may safely regulate his conduct. Nor will it help the matter to consider it as a mixed question of law and fact, because that gives to the jury a right to disregard the opinion of the court, which they will have no right to do in case it be considered exclusively as a question of law on which the court alone has a right to decide. In civil cases every man has an interest in confining a jury as much as possible to their proper sphere, which is to decide on facts; while a court does not encroach on their province, care should be taken not to encourage any improper encroachment on their part by unnecessarily throwing on them any exercise of what are the legitimate functions of a court. Among these none appear to me to be better settled than that it is the exclusive privilege and bounden duty of a court to decide whether an act, which is to be done within a reasonable time to entitle a party to maintain his action, has been performed within such time or not. So, also, where a party sets up an excuse for an act which will otherwise defeat his right to recover, it appertains exclusively to the court to decide on the sufficiency of the matter alleged, and if a jury, after deciding on the facts, take upon themselves the further office of determining the legal effect thereof as to the case under consideration, in opposition to the declared opinion of the court, they forget their duty and act contrary to law.

But if this be a question of law, the plaintiff still supposes that the Circuit Court erred in not thinking that the facts proved constituted a valid excuse for the last forty days' stay at Barcelona, and in not instructing the jury accordingly. This excuse was, in my opinion, properly disposed of by the judge below, but instead of stating at length why I consider the alleged apprehension of capture by the Algerines as furnishing no justification for this delay, it is sufficient to say that I entirely concur, not only in the opinion which has already been delivered on this point, but in the whole of the reasoning on which it is founded.

STORY, J., concurred with Judge Livingston.

496*] *MARSHALL, Ch. J. My own opinion was that the jury was to find the fact whether there was danger in passing between Barcelona and Saloñ; and that they ought to have been instructed that if there was danger it justified the delay, otherwise not.

BRIG CAROLINE, WILLIAM BROADFOOT, CLAIMANT.

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

A libel for a forfeiture must be particular and certain in all the material circumstances which constitute the offense.

An informal libel, or information in rem, may be amended by leave of the court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, in a case of seizure for violation of the acts of Congress respecting the slave trade.

The libel was in the words following:

"At a special district court for South Carolina district, Be it remembered, That on the day of in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and the United States of America, by Thomas Parker, their attorney for the district aforesaid, came here into court and gave Thomas Bee, Esq., judge of the said court, to understand and be informed that on the day of they, the said United States, by their proper officers of the customs, did cause to be seized, arrested and secured, a certain brig or vessel called the Caroline, her tackle, furniture, apparel and other appurtenances, as forfeited to them, the said United States; for that the said brig or vessel since the twenty-second day of March, 1794, was built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared within a port or place of the said United States, by a citizen or citizens of the said United States, or a foreigner, or other persons coming into, or residing in the same, either as master, factor, or owner of the said brig or vessel for the purpose of carrying on trade or traffic in slaves to a foreign country; and also for that, the said brig or vessel, since the day and year last aforesaid, *was [497 built, equipped, loaded or otherwise prepared within a port or place of the said United States, or caused to sail from a port or place within the said United States by a citizen or citizens of the said United States, or a foreigner or other persons coming into or residing within the same, either as factor, master or owner of the said brig or vessel for the purpose of procuring from a foreign kingdom, place or country, the inhabitants of such kingdom, place or country, to be transported into a foreign place or country, port or place, to be disposed of and sold as slaves, in violation of a certain act of Congress of the said United States, passed the 22d March, 1794, entitled 'An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave-trade from the United States to any foreign place or country.' Also for that since the 1st day of January, 1808, the said brig or vessel was built, fitted, equipped, loaded or otherwise prepared in some port or place within the jurisdiction of the said United States, or caused to sail from some port or place within the said United States by some citizen or citizens of the said United States, or some other person for the purpose of procuring negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color from some foreign kingdom, place or country, to be transported to some port or place within the jurisdiction of the said United States to be held, sold, or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, in violation of a certain act of Congress of the United States, passed the second day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven, entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight.' Wherefore the said

United States, by Thomas Parker, their attorney aforesaid, pray the advice and opinion of this honorable court in the premises, and that on due proof of the allegations aforesaid, the said brig or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture and other appurtenances, may be decreed and adjudged as forfeited to them, the said United States, and that such proceedings may be had thereon as are agreeable to law and justice, and the style, usage, and practice of this honorable court. THOMAS PARKER,

"Attorney United States, S. C. District."

498*] *To the transcript of the record which came up was annexed the following statement of facts:

"The information which was filed in this case against the Caroline was founded upon an alleged violation either of the 1st section of an act of Congress, passed the 22d of March, 1794, entitled 'An act to prohibit the carrying on 'the slave trade from the United States to any 'foreign place or country,' or of the 2d section of an act, passed on the 2d of March, 1807, entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight.' By the act of 1794, the fitting or sailing of a ship, for the purpose of a traffic in slaves to any foreign country, subjects the ship, concerned in such traffic, to forfeiture."

"The act of 1807 enacts, that if any ship within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be fitted out or caused to sail by any person, either as master, factor or owner, 'for 'the purpose of procuring any negro, mulatto 'or person of color from any foreign country 'to be transported to any place whatsoever 'within the jurisdiction of the United States, 'to be held, sold, or disposed of as slaves, or 'to be held to service or labor,' she shall be forfeited to the United States. It was admitted by the claimant that the Caroline came into this port equipped like any common merchant vessel, that she did, after her arrival, receive fitments and take on board articles calculated for the slave trade only. It was satisfactorily proved that the claimant, after receiving information that such equipments were illegal, restored the Caroline to the condition in which she was when she entered this port, but that this was not done till after her seizure; and that the wooden parts of the fitments for slaves were marked as they were taken out of the vessel. That in such condition she left Charleston, bound to the Havanna and to no other port. That she arrived at the Havanna on the 28th of June, 1810, and that there she was sold about the 6th of August, 1810, to Spanish subjects, who fitted her out for the African slave trade. His Honor the Circuit Judge, upon the ground of sufficient evidence having been adduced of intention to carry on the slave trade, either *abroad or at home, and a con- [499 sequent violation either of the act of 1794, or of the act of 1807, decreed that the Caroline should be condemned as forfeited to the United States.

"We agree in the above statement of the case.

"WILLIAM DRAYTON,
"Proctor for Appellant,
"THOMAS PARKER,
"District Attorney."

C. Lee, for the appellant, contended,

1st. That the libel was not sufficient to support the condemnation; and,

2d. That the offense was not made out in point of fact.

1. The libel does not state any certain specific offense. It is altogether in the alternative. It does not state when, nor where, nor by whom the vessel was seized—nor when, nor where, nor by whom, nor in what manner the vessel was fitted out. It is altogether vague, uncertain and informal.

An information in rem ought to be as precise and formal as an information in personam. The civil law requires that a libel should be certain and positive in all material circumstances.

2. The statement of facts is as imperfect as the libel. The vessel is only liable to forfeiture when she shall have been actually fitted, equipped or prepared—not while she is fitting, equipping, or preparing. The degree of equipment ought to have been stated that the court might judge whether it were such fitting or equipment as is contemplated by the law. Upon every information for a penalty, the offense should be fully proved. (Parker, 22.) This case is like that of Moodie v. Ship Alfred, (3 Dall., 307,) in which this court *decided [500 that the ship was not illegally fitted out, although she had taken on board some articles calculated for war.

J. R. Ingersoll, contra,

Contended that the case and the libel were sufficiently explicit. The intent was clearly shown. It is not necessary that everything necessary for the voyage should be on board before the forfeiture accrues. The libel states the offense in the words of the act of Congress.

The court, after taking time to consider, directed the following sentence to be entered:

"This cause came on to be heard on the "transcript of the record and was argued by "counsel, on consideration whereof, it is the

NOTE.—In the case of the Caroline, p. 496, 500, the ground upon which the sentence of this court was founded is understood to be as follows:

"The only offenses in the statute of the 22d of March, 1794, (Ch. 11) for which a vessel could be forfeited, are that the same vessel is 'fitted out' or 'caused to sail' for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade.

"The libel in this case alleges, in the alternative, that the brig Caroline 'was built, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared,' &c., or 'caused to sail,' &c., for the purpose of carrying on the slave trade. It does not, therefore, positively allege that the vessel 'was fitted out' or 'caused to sail;' and the libel might be true in the manner in which the charge was stated, and yet no offense committed which would induce a forfeiture of the vessel. For if the vessel was 'built, or loaded, or prepared' for the purpose of the slave trade, the alternative averment in the libel would be completely satisfied; and yet if she was not 'fitted out' or 'caused to sail' she could not be forfeited. The facts, therefore, constituting the offense, not being directly averred, the libel could not be sustained. But the court did not mean to decide that stating the charge in the alternative would not have been sufficient if each alternative had constituted an offense for which the vessel would have been forfeited.

The same observations are applicable to the count founded on the act of 2d of March, 1807 (Ch. 67)."

"opinion of the court, that the libel is too im-"perfectly drawn to found a sentence of con-"demnation thereon. The sentence of the said "Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the "cause remanded to the said Circuit Court, "with directions to admit the libel to be amend-"ed."

The same point was also decided at this term, in the cases of the schooner Hoppet, the schooner Enterprize, the ship Emily, and the schooner Ann.

RIGGS v. LINDSAY.

Absent—TODD, J.

The defendants having ordered the plaintiff to purchase salt for them, and to draw on them for the amount, and he having so purchased and drawn, they are bound to accept and pay his bills; and if they do not, he may recover from them the amount of the bills and damages and costs of protest (if he has paid the same) upon a count for money paid, laid out, and expended, and the bills of exchange may be given in evidence on that count.

If one defendant produce in evidence a letter from his co-defendant to the plaintiff, the latter may give in evidence the written declarations of that co-defendant to discredit the letter.

If, after the protest of the bills, the plaintiff sell the salt without orders, it shall not prejudice his right of action, although he render no account of sales to the defendants.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, in an action of assumpsit in which the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, Lindsay.

The case was now argued by Jones and Harper, for the plaintiff in error, and by F. S. Key and Morsell, for the defendant.

The former contended, that Riggs was not to be considered as a joint contractor, but a sub-501] purchaser; and *that if the defendants were jointly interested in the purchase, they were severally interested in the sales. In support of this position, they cited Watson on Partnership, 24; 1 Vez., 242; Cowp., 449; 2 H. Bl., 298; Doug., 371, and 1 H. Bl., 37.

The facts of the case are stated in the opinion of the court, which was delivered as follows, by

LIVINGSTON, J.:

This was an action brought by the defendant in error, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, against William Stewart, Charles J. Nourse, Aquila Beall, and the plaintiff in error, Elisha Riggs, as copartners, to recover from them the amount of certain bills of exchange and damages which had been drawn on them by the defendant in error to reimburse him for certain salt which he had purchased on their account, and which bills, being protested for non-payment, were afterwards paid, with damages, by the plaintiffs below. The defendant, Beall, was not found; the defendants, Nourse and Stewart, confessed judgment, and the other defendant, Riggs, pleaded the general issue.

The declaration contained several counts on the bills of exchange, and two general counts, the one for money laid out, expended and paid, the other for money had and received, under which last counts a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

It appeared in evidence, that some time in November, 1809, Stewart and Beall, two of the defendants below, wrote a letter to the plaintiff, ordering a purchase of salt, and stating that two other persons were concerned in the said order. This letter directed him to purchase from 10 to 30,000 bushels, and authorized him to draw for the amount of such purchases on the defendants, Stewart and Beall, or on George Price & Co., of Baltimore. Purchases of salt were accordingly made by Lindsay, who from time to time apprized Stewart and Beall of the same. On the 4th of January, 1810, one of the defendants wrote to Lindsay as follows:

*"SIR: [*502

"You will hold up what salt you may have "purchased, and send us a statement of your "purchases. You have no doubt received "Stewart and Beall's orders, requesting no "further purchase. We shall some time hence "direct you as to the disposal of the quantity "purchased. In the meantime you may draw "upon us, or upon Stewart and Beall, for the "amount," &c.

It appears that Lindsay afterwards drew several bills of exchange on the parties who had subscribed the last-mentioned letter, and who were the defendants, in favor of certain persons therein named, including his commission for purchasing. These bills were presented to the drawees, who refused to accept or pay the same, on which they were protested and returned to Lindsay, who took them up. By the laws of South Carolina ten per cent. damages are allowed on the return of such bills under protest, and there was proof that these damages had also been paid by Lindsay. After the return of these bills and payment of them by Lindsay, he sold the salt, and the proceeds on such resale were stated by Lindsay's counsel at the trial to the jury, who were desired to deduct the same from his demand against Riggs, which was done, and a verdict given for the balance. There was no other evidence of the proceeds than such admission, and the defendant, Riggs, denied that the sum stated by Lindsay's counsel was the amount thereof.

In the course of the trial, the counsel of Riggs produced a letter from Nourse to the plaintiffs, which, as he supposed, contained a statement favorable to his client. To discredit this statement, the plaintiff produced certain interrogatories, which had been exhibited to Nourse, with his answers, which were at variance with the letter produced by Riggs.

The first exception taken, at the trial, to the conduct of the court, was to its admission of proof of the several bills which had been drawn by Lindsay, and protested and paid by him, and the instruction which it gave to the jury, that under the count for money paid, laid out, and expended, Lindsay might recover, not his *commissions which were included in [*503 the bills, but the ten per cent. damages, if the jury were satisfied that they had been actually paid by him.

Neither in the admission of this testimony, nor in the instructions given on it, was any error committed by the Circuit Court. As Lindsay was expressly authorized to draw, by the letter of the 4th of January, 1810, he certainly had a right to do so, and whether the defendants accepted his bills or not, so as to render themselves liable to the holders of them, there can be no doubt that as between Lindsay and them, it was their duty, and that they were bound in law to pay them. Not having done so, and Lindsay in consequence of their neglect having taken them up, he must be considered as paying their debt, and as this was not a voluntary act on his part, but resulted from his being their surety (as he may well be considered from the moment he drew the bills), it may well be said that in paying the amount of these bills, which ought to have been paid, and was agreed to be paid by the drawees, he paid so much money for their use. Nor can any good reason be assigned for distinguishing the damages from the principal sum, for if it were the duty of the defendants to pay such principal sum, it is as much so to re-imburse Lindsay for the damages which, by the law of South Carolina, he was compelled to pay, and which may therefore also be considered as part of the debt due by the defendant in consequence of the violation of their promise contained in the letter which has just been mentioned.

The second exception which appears on the record is to the admission of certain interrogatories which had been propounded to the defendant, Nourse, with his answers to the same, having an indorsement upon the same, purporting to be an acknowledgment of Nourse that the same were correct.

In the opinion of this court, this paper was rendered proper evidence by the conduct of the defendant, Riggs, who had read as evidence for himself a letter from Nourse to Lindsay, dated the 14th April, 1810, containing, as he supposed, some matters favorable to his defence. This letter having been thus produced 504] by Riggs himself, *it was certainly right to allow Lindsay to discredit the representations made in that letter by showing that Nourse had himself at another time given a very different account of the same transaction.

The other opinions of the court below, to which exceptions were taken, may be comprised in these two: that the court erred in thinking the defendants jointly liable as copartners, and that the resale of the salt did not destroy the Plaintiff's right of action. In both these opinions this court concur with the Circuit Court.

It is perhaps as clear a case of joint liability as can well be conceived. Whatever doubt there might be independent of the letter of the 4th of January, 1810, most certainly that letter puts this question at rest. Every one of the defendants sign it, and there is now no escape from the responsibility which they all thereby incurred to the plaintiff. Nor did Lindsay's selling the salt after he had taken up these bills destroy his right of action against the defendants. If he has acted irregularly in so doing, he will be liable, in a proper action, for the damages which the defendants have sustained by such conduct, but such sale could not be pleaded or set up in bar to the present suit. Nor will the defendant, under the circumstance of this case, be injured by the sum which the jury have discounted from Lindsay's demand, if it shall hereafter appear that as much was not allowed the defendants on that account as ought to have been.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

M'INTIRE v. WOOD.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J., and TODD, J.

The power of the circuit courts of the United States to issue the writ of mandamus, is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

THIS case came up from the Circuit Court for the District of Ohio, upon a certificate stating that the judges of that court were divided in opinion upon the question, whether that court had power to issue a writ of mandamus to the register of a land-office in Ohio, commanding *him to issue a final certifi- [505 cate of purchase to the plaintiff for certain lands in that state.

Harper, for the plaintiff, referred the court to the case of Marbury v. Madison (ante vol. 1, p. 137).

The constitution of the United States extends the judicial power to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution and laws of the United States.

By the 11th sect. of the judiciary act of 1789 (vol. 1, p. 55), the circuit courts have original cognizance of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds the value of 500 dollars, &c. And by the 14th sect. of the same act they have power to issue all writs necessary for the exercise of their jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. This is a suit of a civil nature at common law, and the matter in dispute exceeds the value of 500 dollars. The writ of mandamus is necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction, and is agreeable to the principles and usages of law. (3 Burr. 1266.)

The power given by the constitution is divided between the supreme and the circuit courts. It has been decided, that the power to issue a mandamus, in such a case, does not belong to the Supreme Court; it must, therefore, be in the circuit courts.

March 15th. JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

I am instructed to deliver the opinion of the court in this case. It comes up on a division of opinion in the Circuit Court of Ohio, upon a motion for a mandamus to the register of the land-office, at Marietta, commanding him to grant final certificates of purchase to the plaintiff for lands to which he supposed himself entitled under the laws of the United States.

This court is of opinion that the Circuit Court did not possess the power to issue the mandamus moved for.

Independent of the particular objections which this case presents from its involving a 506*] question of freehold, *we are of opinion that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus, is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Had the 11th section of the judiciary act covered the whole ground of the constitution, there would be much reason for exercising this power in many cases wherein some ministerial act is necessary to the completion of an individual right arising under laws of the United States, and the 14th section of the same act would sanction the issuing of the writ for such a purpose. But although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the legislature have not thought proper to delegate the exercise of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases. When questions arise under those laws in the state courts, and the party who claims a right or privilege under them is unsuccessful, an appeal is given to the Supreme Court, and this provision the legislature has thought sufficient at present for all the political purposes intended to be answered by the clause of the constitution which relates to this subject.

A case occurred some years since in the Circuit Court of South Carolina, the notoriety of which may apologize for making an observation upon it here. It was a mandamus to a collector to grant a clearance, and unquestionably could not have been issued but upon a supposition inconsistent with the decision in this case. But that mandamus was issued upon the voluntary submission of the collector and the district attorney, and in order to extricate themselves from an embarrassment resulting from conflicting duties. Volenti non fit injuria.

LIVINGSTON & GILCHRIST
v.
THE MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., and TODD, J.

To constitute a representation (in making insurance), there should be an affirmation or denial of some fact; or an allegation which would plainly lead the mind to the same conclusion.

If, by the usage of the trade insured, it be necessary that certain papers should be on board, the concealment of those papers cannot affect the plaintiff's right to recover upon the policy.

In general, concealment of papers amounts to a breach of warranty.

A Spanish subject who came to the United States in a time of peace between Spain and Great Britain, to carry on a trade between this country and the Spanish provinces, under a royal Spanish license, and who continues to reside here and carry on that trade, after the breaking out of war between Great Britain and Spain, is to be considered as an American merchant, although the trade could be lawfully carried on by a Spanish subject only.

If the letter submitted to the underwriters, ordering the insurance, refers to another letter previously laid before them, which letter contained information that the vessel had permission to trade to the Spanish colonies, the underwriters are bound to notice that fact and to know that the vessel would take all the papers necessary to make the voyage legal.

The usage of trade may be proved by parol, although such usage originated in a law or edict of the government of the country.

The question whether the abandonment were made in due time, is not a question of fact to be exclusively left to the jury, but to be decided by them under the direction of the court.

No acts, justifiable by the usage of the trade, and done by the plaintiffs to avoid confiscation under the laws of Spain, can avoid the policy.

If the plaintiffs do any act which increases the risk of capture and detention according to the common practice of the belligerent, it may avoid the policy. It is not necessary that the risk thus increased should be the risk of rightful capture according to the law of nations.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant upon a policy of insurance *(against capture [507 only) upon the cargo of the ship Herkimer, "from Guayaquil, or her last port of departure in South America, to New York," "warranted American property, proof of which to be required in the United States only," "and warranted free from seizure for illicit trade." The declaration was on a loss by capture.

The case was stated as follows by MARSHALL, Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court:

Julian Hernandez Baruso, a Spanish subject, having obtained from the crown of Spain a license to import from Boston into the Spanish provinces of Peru and Buenos Ayres, in South America, in foreign vessels, a certain quantity of goods in the license mentioned, and to take back the proceeds in produce on payment of half duties, came to New York in September, 1803, (Spain being then at peace with Great Britain), for the purpose of carrying on trade under his said license.

On the 24th of August, 1804, he entered into a contract with a certain Anthony Carroll for the transportation of a certain quantity of goods to Lima, in Peru, under the said license. Carroll died without carrying the contract into full effect.

On the 25th of January, 1805, war having then broke out between Great Britain and Spain, B. Livingston, who had been bound as Carroll's surety for the performance of the contract, entered into a new contract with Baruso for the transportation of the same goods.

The preamble recites the license, and says: The said Baruso has agreed with the said B. Livingston to make an adventure to Lima, on the conditions and stipulations following, to wit:

1. In consideration, &c., he agrees to the following partnership with the said B. L., in virtue of which he transfers to the said firm all his powers, &c., (under the license) of sending an American vessel belonging to the said L. or chartered, in which vessel shall be embarked goods to the amount of 50,000 dollars, the funds and vessel to be furnished and advanced by said L.

*2. Baruso to obtain the necessary [508 papers from the Spanish consul. and B. L. to pay the duties. Baruso answerable for detention or confiscation by the Spanish government or vessels on account of any defect of right to send under said license, &c.

3. L. agrees in four months to embark the goods on board a vessel to Lima, to proceed thither, and to return to the United States with a cargo.

4. L. to choose the supercargo and instruct him; and as the adventure will appear on the face of the papers to belong to B., he shall give the supercargo a power, and recognize him the master of the cargo, so that the consignees at Lima shall follow literally his orders. The consignees, who were partners of B., to receive a commission.

6. The said L. and B. agree to divide equally, and part and part alike, the profits of the adventure. L. to have commissions on sale.

7. Optional in L. to sell in United States, or convey the return cargo to Europe. If he sells in the United States, B. may take out, at the price of sales, as much as will be equal to his rights.

8. If L. sends the cargo to Europe, he is to choose the supercargo, but the consignees to be chosen jointly.

9. In case of loss B. to claim nothing, as his share in the profits only accrues on the safe return of the vessel to the United States. Optional with L. to insure or not. L. not to be allowed for risk, if no insurance, more than 15 per cent. No insurance to be on the risks of the Spanish government.

12. If any loss accrues from causes not stipulated, B. to lose only his privilege. If loss on sale of return cargo, B. to sustain half.

Livingston soon afterwards chartered the ship Herkimer for the voyage, and entered into a contract with the other plaintiff Gilchrist, one James Baxter, and Edward Griswold, for joint-509*] ly carrying on, with them, *the said voyage. The cargo was purchased with their joint funds, and was shipped to Lima, where, and at Guayaquil, a return cargo was received, purchased with the proceeds of the original cargo.

On the 25th of March, 1806, Mr. Gilchrist addressed to Alexander Webster & Co., at Baltimore, a letter containing an order for insurance on the cargo of the ship Herkimer, from Guayaquil, or her last port of departure in South America, to New York, against loss by capture only, warranted American property, and free from all loss on account of seizure for illicit or prohibited trade. It says, "the owners are already "insured against the dangers of the seas and all "other risks, except that of capture." "You "have already had a description of the ship "from Messrs. Church and Demmill, the agent "of Mr. Jackson, and which I presume is cor-"rect." "I think proper to mention that the "insurance will be on account of Mr. Brock-"holst Livingston and myself. Mr. Baxter and "Mr. Griswold are also concerned, but the first "gentleman thinks there is so little danger of "capture, that in his letter from Lima, he ex-"pressly directs no insurance to be made for "him against this risk, and Mr. Griswold is not "here to consult. Both these gentlemen, as "well as those for whom you are desired to "make insurance, are native Americans."

The letter of Church and Demmill was dated 13th Feb., 1806, and after describing the ship, adds, "she sailed from Boston the 12th of May "last for Lima, with liberty to go to one other "port in South America, not west of Guaya-"quil, and from there to New York. She "has permission to trade there."

This letter was laid before the board of directors, and the application at that time rejected.

The letter from Gilchrist to Webster & Co. was afterwards laid before the board, and the company made the insurance for the plaintiffs at 10 per cent.

The Herkimer, on her return voyage, was captured near the port of New York, by the Leander, a British ship of war, and sent to Halifax, where she was condemned.

*The plaintiffs gave the underwriters [510 notice of the capture, and obtained their permission to prosecute a claim for restoration without prejudice to their right to abandon. On receiving notice of the condemnation, they wrote a letter of abandonment, which was delivered to the underwriters, who refused to pay for the loss, whereupon this suit was brought.

On the return voyage, just after doubling Cape Horn, Baxter, who was supercargo and part owner, gave to Edward Giles, the third mate, a bundle of papers, partly in Spanish, telling him at the same time that in all probability they might fall in with privateers, who might overhaul the trunk in the cabin, and if they found the papers, it was probable the vessel might be detained as the papers were in Spanish, and they might not be able to translate them. Giles put the papers in his trunk.

After the capture, Giles was taken out of the Herkimer into the Leander, and on being asked if he had any objection to have his trunk searched, replied that he had not. The trunk was then searched, and this bundle discovered. It contained papers, covering the cargo as the property of Baruso, mixed with others which showed that in fact it was the property of the plaintiffs and of Baxter and Griswold. Evidence was given to prove that the usage of the trade made these papers necessary. There was also an estimate of the probable value of the cargo, if shipped to Europe.

The Herkimer arrived before the Leander; and Baxter, upon his examination on the standing interrogatories, described truly the character of the voyage, and stated correctly the property in the cargo, but denied his knowledge of any papers other than those which were exhibited as belonging to the ship.

Issue was joined on the plea that the defendants had not broken their covenant, and the jury found a verdict in their favor.

On the trial, 28 bills of exception were taken, partly by the plaintiffs and partly by the defendants. Only those taken by the plaintiffs are now before the court.

*The plaintiffs prayed the court be- [511 low to instruct the jury, that the letter, ordering the insurance, does not contain a representation that no person, other than the said Livingston, Gilchrist, Griswold & Baxter, was interested in the return cargo of the Herkimer; nor that all the persons interested therein were native Americans. The judges were divided on this point, and the instruction was not given.

The 5th bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the testimony offered by them, then there was no such concealment of the said papers as can affect the right of the plaintiffs to recover in this action, which instruction the court refused to give, but directed the jury that if they should be of opinion that from the usage and course of trade it was necessary to have the Spanish and other papers delivered by Baxter to Giles, the 3d mate, as aforesaid, than the delivery by Baxter to Giles, and the finding and taking of the said papers by the officers of the Leander, was not such a concealment as affects the right of the plaintiffs to recover.

The 6th bill of exceptions states, that the plaintiffs then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that Baruso having removed to New York, in the United States, while Spain was neutral, for the purpose of carrying on trade, and having continued to reside in New York until after the capture of the Herkimer, the said Baruso could not, at the time of the voyage, be considered as a belligerent. This instruction the court also refused to give, but did instruct the jury that if they should be of opinion that the said Baruso settled in New York before the war between Spain and Great Britain, and remained there domiciliated and carrying on trade generally until the capture of the Herkimer, he is to be considered as a neutral; but if they should be satisfied from the testimony that he went to New York for no other purpose but to carry on trade as a Spanish subject, which he could not engage in as a neutral, and that he was not engaged in any other trade than as a Spanish subject, he cannot be considered as a neutral.

The 7th bill of exception states, that the court then, on the prayer of the defendant, gave to the jury the following opinion:

512*] *"The court having already given "an opinion, that Baruso was not a joint own- "er with the plaintiffs and Griswold and Bax- "ter, in the return cargo of the Herkimer, do, "in compliance with the opinion of the Su- "preme Court, leave it to the jury to deter- "mine whether Baruso had an interest in the "return cargo which increased the risk of the "said voyage, and if the risk was increased, "that the policy was thereby vitiated." This opinion was given on the prayer of the defendants to instruct the jury, that the non-communication to the underwriters of papers showing Baruso to have an interest, and to be a Spanish subject, vitiated the policy.

The 8th bill of exceptions stated, that the defendants then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion that the papers which were delivered to Giles by Baxter, or any of them, increased the risk, and that if any of the papers which did so increase the risk were not necessary by the laws and usages of Spain, or the course and usage of trade between the United States and Lima, and that it was not communicated to the defendants that such papers would accompany the cargo, then the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. The court gave the opinion.

The 9th bill of exception stated, that the plaintiffs prayed an instruction to the jury, that in estimating the increase of risk on the return voyage of the Herkimer, they were to consider it as a voyage which the defendants were informed, in and by the letter of Church and Demmill, was carried on under a license from the Spanish government; and the question for them to decide was, whether the risk of such a voyage, carried on under such a license, was increased by any of the circumstances relied on by the defendants to show an increase of risk in this case. This opinion the court refused to give.

The 11th bill of exception stated, that the plaintiffs produced a witness to prove the usage of the trade, who said that by the laws, regulations and usages of the trade, it was necessary that the property imported into, or exported from the colony, by a foreigner, should be under a Spanish license, and appear to be Spanish *property. Whereupon the de- [513 fendants moved the court to instruct the jury, that this evidence is not competent to prove the municipal laws of Spain, or the usage and custom of trade established by their municipal laws. The opinion of the court was, that "no parol evidence is admissible to the jury, or if given, can be regarded by them, to prove the legislative edicts or acts of the Spanish government, or to prove any usage, custom or course of trade conformable to such edicts or acts; but that such evidence is admissible to prove the general usage and course of trade that may depend on instructions to the government of Peru."

The 13th bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiffs produced witnesses, ignorant of the laws of Spain, to prove their understanding of the usage of the trade; and the defendants produced counter testimony on the usage; whereupon the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury, that the testimony of the plaintiffs, if believed, was not competent to show the usage or course of trade that the Herkimer, on her return voyage, should be accompanied with papers giving the cargo the appearance of Spanish property. The court refused to give this opinion, but instructed the jury, that if they were of opinion that the usage or course of trade from or to the province of Peru by foreigners, was to have a license from the King of Spain to trade, and to have Spanish papers on board, to show or give color that the cargo was Spanish property, the defendants were bound to take notice of such course of trade; but if the jury should be of opinion that the trade was prohibited by the laws of Spain, the plaintiffs must prove that the defendants had notice or information of such prohibition.

The 20th bill of exceptions is to an opinion of the court, that whether the abandonment was in reasonable time or not, is not a fact to be exclusively left to the jury, but to be decided by them under the direction of the court.

The 24th bill of exceptions stated, that the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury, that the insurers are not liable for any increase of risk, in consequence of any acts done by the insured to avoid seizure *and confisca- [514 tion under the laws and regulations of the Spanish government, which instruction the court gave.

The 25th bill of exceptions stated, that the counsel for the plaintiffs then moved the court to instruct the jury, that the right of the plaintiffs would not be affected by any increase of risk produced by such acts as were stated in the preceding exception, if such acts were according to the course and usage of trade on the voyage insured. This opinion the court refused to give.

The 28th bill of exceptions stated, that the plaiutiffs moved the court to instruct the jury, that the increase of risk, by which alone the right of the plaintiffs to recover in this action can be effected, is an increase (by reason of some act or omission of the plaintiffs, or their agents) of the danger of rightful capture or condemnation under the law of nations. The court refused to give this opinion.

The verdict and judgment being against the plaintiffs, they sued out their writ of error.

Harper, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. The 1st question is that upon which the court below was divided in opinion, viz., whether the letter of Gilchrist to Webster & Co., ordering the insurance, contains a representation that no other person than Livingston, Gilchrist, Griswold and Baxter was interested in the return cargo of the Herkimer, or that all the persons interested therein were native Americans. It certainly does not contain a direct affirmation of either of those facts. It contains at most a negative pregnant; an ambiguity of which the underwriters, if they deemed it important, should have required an explanation. Nothing can amount to a representation which is not certain to a common intent; so certain as not to admit of a doubt, provided the veracity of the party be not questioned, and he be not uuder a mistake. There is no difference between a representation and a warranty, except that the one is contained in the policy and the other is out of it. They must both be equally certain.

STORY, J. Do you admit this question to be relevant to the cause?

515*] Harper*. No. That is another branch of the argument; I shall contend that it was immaterial whether Baruso were a neutral or not; but that he was, quoad hoc neutral.

2. The second question arises upon the 5th bill of exceptions, which was the first takeu by the plaiutiffs. It is to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that there was no such concealment of papers as could affect the plaintiff's right to recover; and to the opiniou which the court gave, whereby they made the effect of the concealment depend upon the question whether the papers were necessary according to the usage and course of the trade, the plaintiffs object to the opinion giveu.

1. Because it makes the effect of Baxter's conduct relative to the papers depend on the usage and course of the trade; whereas, independently of any such usage, that conduct could not affect the right of recovery; inasmuch as it did not amouut to a concealment of papers, and as the concealment of papers cannot affect such a right.

2. Because it requires that the usage and course of the trade. in order to make this couduct of Baxter inuocent, should render it necessary to have those papers on board; whereas, if the usage and course of trade permitted the having them, it was sufficient.

3. Because it extends to all the papers delivered by Baxter to Giles, many of which were perfectly immaterial and inuocent in themselves, iudependently of any usage or course of trade.

The act did not amount to a concealment. It was only putting the papers from one trunk to another less liable to be searched. It must be such au act as would be likely to prevent discovery; and it must be done with intent to deceive the belligerent, and to defraud him of some belligerent right. When the prayer for an instruction is hypothetical, the facts constituting the hypothesis are to be considered as found by special verdict. If these facts had been fouud by a special verdict, they would uot have been a finding of a concealment. But concealment of papers is not a violation of neutrality. It is no ground for condemnation, nor even *for [516 detention. The answer to the Russian memorial expressly disclaims concealment and even destruction of papers as a legal ground of condemnation. It is only a ground to refuse costs or damages on restitution; or to refuse further proof, where there is prima facie ground of condemnation independent of the concealment. (1 Rob. append. 5, answer to the Russian memorial, 2 Rob., 88; the Rising Sun.) Even spoliation of papers would affect Baxter's property only; and the plaintiffs would be permitted to give further proof.

Some of the papers delivered to Giles were wholly unimportant, and unnecessary to the prosecution of the voyage in safety, and yet the opinion of the court (to be in favor of the plaintiffs) required that they should be necessary according to the usage and course of the trade. Among those papers was an estimate of the value of the cargo if reshipped from New York to Cadiz. This certainly was not necessary by the usage of the trade. There were several other papers equally unimportant. Yet in the opinion of the court the concealment of these papers violated the warranty of neutrality.

3. The 3d question arose on the 6th bill of exceptions which was to the opinion of the court which made Baruso's character, as a neutral or belligerent, depend upon the kind of trade he carried on, as well as upon his domicile.

The plaintiffs object to this opinion, 1st. Because the place of domicile acquired in time of peace is the criterion of a man's character as neutral or belligerent, and not the nature of the trade. In the case of the Harmony (2 Rob., 266), G. W. Murray residing in France, was considered as a belligerent, while his partners in the same adventure, residing in the United States, were considered as neutrals. (3 Rob., 21, The Indian Chief; 3 Rob., 37, The Citto; 1 Rob., 323, standing interrogatories: 12th interrogatory as to resideuce of the parties; 5 Rob., Appendix, order in council of the 24th of June, 1803, relating to inhabitants of certain colonies; 8 T. R., 31, Wilson v. Marryat; 1 Caine's cases in error, 25, Duguet v. Rhinelander.) The nature of the trade has nothing to do with the question. If neutral by domicile he may trade with belligerents, provided *it [517 be not in articles contraband of war. His neutrality was not inconsistent with his privilege as a Spanish subject. He does not lose his privilege by becoming a neutral American. As between him aud the government of Spain, he was still a Spanish subject. But as between him aud the government of Great Britain, he was, according to the principles of the British prize courts, an Americau merchant.

The plaintiffs also object to the opinion of the court because there was no evidence upon which the court could ground the hypothesis that Baruso came to this country to carry on that trade only. Although the fact might be that he carried on no other trade, yet it does not follow that he came here for no other purpose.

4. The 4th question arises under the 7th bill of exceptions, which states that the court (in compliance with the opinion of the Supreme Court[1]) left it to the jury to determine whether Baruso had an interest in the return cargo which increased the risk of the voyage; and directed the jury that if the risk was increased, the policy was thereby vacated.

The plaintiffs object to this opinion of the court,

1. Because it leaves it to the jury to decide a mere question of law, viz., whether the contingent interest of Baruso in the voyage could have the effect of defeating the plaintiff's right to recover, by increasing the risk; instead of directing them, as ought to have been done, that such an interest was not subject to capture; that the plaintiffs were not bound to disclose it; and that therefore it could not in law affect their right to recover.

2. Because it does not, as it ought to have done, make the effect of Baruso's interest on the right of recovery depend on his national character, it being clear, as the plaintiffs contend, that if he was a neutral, and not a belligerent, his property was not liable to capture, and no interest which he had in the voyage could affect their right.

518*] *3. Because it does not, as it ought to have done, make the effect of this interest on the right of recovery depend on the usage and course of the trade; it being clear as they contend, that if the usage and course of the trade authorized the use of a Spaniard's name to cover the voyage, a mere contingent interest of that Spaniard in the voyage could not, nor could any interest which he could have in it consistently with the warranty, effect the right of the plaintiffs.

4. Because the defendants, having protected themselves, by a warranty of neutrality, against the effect of any belligerent interest in the voyage, were not entitled to a disclosure of that of Baruso, even could it be considered as a belligerent interest.

The court below misunderstood the opinion of this court upon every point on which an opinion was given when this cause was before this court on the former writ of error. (Ante, vol. 6, p. 274.)

Whether Baruso had an interest in the return cargo was a question of law dependent upon the construction of this contract.

The opinion of this court was that if Baruso had an interest in the return cargo, the materiality of that interest to the risk of the voyage was a fact to be decided by a jury under the direction of a court. This court did not decide that the question whether Baruso had such an interest was to be left to the jury. The court below ought to have directed the jury that Baruso had no interest. He was not to share the loss unless that loss happened by a defect in his license. He was only to share in the profits after the vessel should arrive. It was only a contingent interest in the success of the voyage, like the interest of a consignee who is to have a commission on the sales. Suppose a consignee in a neutral country should be a subject of a belligerent nation, would his contingent interest vitiate the policy? It would afford no just ground of interference by a belligerent. The question is not what would furnish a just pretext for rapacity, but what would be a just ground of detention under the law of nations. (1 Caine's Ca. *in error, 25, Duguet v. [519 Rhinelander; 9 East, 282, Baker v. Blakes.)

The court below ought to have told the jury that Baruso, being domiciliated in the United States, was to be considered as a neutral, and as such, his property was safe under the law of nations, whatever pretext his name might have afforded to a rapacious cruiser.

The connection of a belligerent interest with a neutral interest does not render void a policy on the neutral interest.

Besides, the course of the trade made it necessary that the property should be in the name of Baruso, and this was known to the underwriters.

But with submission to any opinion which this court may have given, the interest of Baruso was wholly immaterial to this case. The defendants have guarded themselves by the warranty of neutrality. If the property be neutral their mouths are stopped. When they take a warranty, they waive all questions of this kind. The premium was calculated upon the warranty. When a contract is reduced to writing all antecedent negotiations are merged in the conclusive act. The plaintiffs were not bound to give notice of any belligerent interest. As to everything against which the warranty is a protection, no disclosure was necessary. (Marshall, 475.) If Baruso's interest did not violate the warranty it was immaterial.

5. The 5th question arose upon the 8th bill of exceptions which was taken to the opinion of the court, "that if the jury should be of "opinion that the papers which were delivered "by Giles to Baxter, or any of them, increased "the risk, and that if any of the papers which "did so increase the risk were not necessary by "the laws and usages of Spain, or the course and "usage of trade between the United States and "Lima, and that it was not communicated to "the defendants that such papers would ac-"company the cargo, then the plaintiffs were "not entitled to recover."

To this opinion the plaintiffs object,

*1. Because it requires that those [520 papers, in order to be considered as innocent, should be necessary by the usage and course of the trade; whereas, it was sufficient if the usage authorized them, although it might not have rendered them necessary.

2. Because the defendants, having protected themselves by a warranty of neutrality against unneutral conduct, were not entitled to a disclosure of the fact that those papers would be on board.

The effect of the Spanish papers was neutralized by the real American documents on board, showing clearly the real state of the interest of the plaintiffs. If the Spanish papers had stood alone they might have been a ground of detention, or perhaps of further proof; but they of themselves showed a neutral character, though not the same ownership. They showed the property to belong to Baruso, and that he was a resident of Boston. But the papers which accompanied them in the same bundle, showed the real ownership and clear neutrality of the cargo. The Spanish papers, therefore, did not prove the property to be belligerent; and if they did not falsify the warranty, they were perfectly immaterial.

1.—See ante, vol. 6, p. 274.

6. The 6th question was upon the 9th bill of exceptions, which was taken to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that in estimating the risk they were to take into consideration the circumstance that it was a voyage which the defendants were informed was carried on under a license from the Spanish government. It is clear that the connection of Baruso with such a voyage could not increase the risk.

7. The 7th question was upon the 11th bill of exceptions, which was taken to the opinion of the court that parol evidence was not admissible to prove any usage, custom, or course of trade, conformable to the legislative edicts or acts of the Spanish government. But that such evidence was admissible to prove the general usage or course of trade, that might depend upon instructions to the government of Peru.

The plaintiffs object to this opinion because it precluded them from parol proof of the usage [*521] and course *of trade, in case that usage and course thould have arisen out of, or even should happen to be in conformity with the legislative acts or edicts of Spain. Whereas the usage and course of trade are in all cases facts capable of parol proof, and seldem susceptible of any other.

8. The 8th question arose upon the 13th bill of exceptions, which was taken to the opinion of the court that the defendants were bound to take notice of the usage and course of trade, but not of the laws of Spain prohibiting the trade.

To the latter part of this opinion the plaintiffs object,

1. Because, whether the trade was generally prohibited by the laws of Spain or not, was a matter wholly immaterial; and their right of recovery ought not to depend on the knowledge which the defendants might or might not possess of an immaterial fact.

2. Because if the prohibition of this trade by the laws of Spain was legally proved, and was a material fact, the defendants were bound to take notice of it.

3. Because there was no legal evidence given in the cause, or stated in any of the bills of exceptions, that this trade was generally prohibited by the laws of Spain; the only evidence being that it could not, according to the usage and course of the trade, be carried on to a foreign port, except under a special permission, a Spanish name, and Spanish papers. Therefore it ought not to have been left to the jury to find that this trade was prohibited by the laws of Spain, as a foundation for requiring the plaintiffs to prove that the defendants had notice of the prohibition.

9. The 9th question was on the 20th bill of exceptions, which was taken to the opinion of the court, that the question whether the abandonment was or was not in reasouable time, was not a question of fact to be exclusively decided by the jury, but was to be decided by them under the direction of the court. The plaintiffs contend that under the opinion of this court in this case upon the former writ of error (antc, vol. 6, p. 274) *it is a merc ques- [*522] tion of fact to be found by the jury. But as some doubt arose in consequence of what was said by this court in the case of the Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Starke (antc, vol. 6, p. 268), this bill of exceptions was taken that the opinion of this court may be fully understood.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., said he understood that the court might instruct the jury that certain facts constitute reasonable notice; but that in a special verdict it must be stated whether the time was reasonable.

Harper.

10. The 10th question arises upon the 24th and 25th bills of exception, in which the court instructed the jury in substance that the insurers were not liable for any increase of risk in consequence of any acts done by the insured to avoid seizure and confiscation under the laws and regulations of the Spanish government, although such acts were according to the usage and course of the trade on the voyage insured.

The plaintiffs object to this opinion,

1. Because it is in vague and indefinite terms; whereas, it ought to have specified the acts which were to have the effect in question; to the end that they might appear to be acts of which there was evidence before the jury, and which, if proved, were capable in law of producing that effect.

2. Because the effect of those acts on the right of recovery is not made to depend on the course and usage of the trade.

11. The 11th question was upon the 28th bill of exceptions, which was taken to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury in substance that the only risk, the increase of which could affect the plaintiff's right to recover, was the risk of rightful capture under the law of nations.

The plaintiffs contend that what would give a mere pretext for unjust capture, was not sufficient to charge *the plaintiffs with an [*523] increase of the risk insured against, so as to avoid the policy. Everything was immaterial which did not increase the risk of rightful capture and condemnation; and which did not furnish at least a ground of condemnation which the belligerent has holden to be a rightful ground.

Baruso had no interest in the ship, and yet the ship as well as the cargo was condemned—no doubt on the principle that it was a trade in time of war, not permitted in time of peace. But the license diminished the risk because it showed that it was a trade permitted in time of peace.

Pinkney, Attorney-General, contra.

1. As to the division of opinion in the court below.

It is true the letter ordering the insurance does not in direct terms deny that no other person had an interest in the cargo, but it contains a strong implication to that effect. If any transaction requires bona fides it is a representation for insurance. It is the act of the insured and they ought not to shelter themselves under an ambiguity. If it be calculated to mislead it is sufficient.

It is true that nothing is stated negatively.

But why name others as concerned who were not to be insured, unless to inform the underwriters respecting the whole transaction with reference to the national character of all parties concerned. It is calculated to excite in the minds of the underwriters a belief that it contains information on that subject. They who undertake to convey information must take care that it do not excite an idea which they did not mean to convey.

This point, however, is not considered as of very great importance.

2. The next question is much more important. This question arises on the 5th bill of exceptions.

The court gave, in substance, the instruction which the plaintiffs prayed, and yet the plaint-524*] iffs excepted because *it was not exactly in their own words. The plaintiffs had, among other things, given evidence that the papers found in Giles's trunk were necessary according to the usage and course of the trade, and then prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believed the evidence so offered, then there was no such concealment of the said papers as could affect the right of the plaintiffs to recover; and this was in truth the direction which the court gave.

But the court ought not to have given the direction as prayed. The concealment of the papers was unneutral; although the parties were justifiable in using them to protect their illegal trade. The whole transaction was unneutral: first, in concealing the papers, and secondly, in denying a knowledge of them. The belligerent had a right to see the papers. It was a clear belligerent right flowing from the right of search.

No court of admiralty, however rapacious, has ever considered concealment of innocent papers as, per se, a ground of confiscation. But this was not a concealment of innocent papers. It was a concealment of papers tending to prove the property to be belligerent. It increased the suspicious already excited by other circumstances. Baxter was supercargo, and his acts bind the others, although he was a partner. All the partners are affected by the fraud of any one of them. (1 Rob., 105, The Welvaart.) If this unneutral conduct brought the property into suspicion it is sufficient. If it subjects the property to such detention as would authorize abandonment, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the opinion prayed in the 5th exception. In a case where there was concealment of such papers as were calculated to induce such suspicion as would require further proof, and this concealment followed by prevarication, we could not expect a prize court to acquit. It would at least produce detention continued by an adjournment of the case.

This concealment, connected with the other circumstances, justified the condemnation. There were documents showing the property to be in four Americans. Among the concealed papers was a copy of the royal Spanish license, au-
525*] thorizing a Spanish subject resident *in Boston to import goods into the United States from the Spanish colonies. The adventure appeared to be Spanish. It could only be carried on by a Spaniard. There was also concealed another paper of great effect—a power of attorney from Baruso to Baxter, the supercargo, in which Baruso says the cargo "is laden for me and on my account and risk." It proved the property to be in Baruso, and that he was a Spanish subject. It calls him a Spanish merchant. It showed his national character to be belligerent, although he was resident in a neutral country.

It is not residence only which gives the national commercial character. The intention, the nature of the erraud, the permanency of the residence, are all necessary ingredients.

The circumstances of suspicion were very strong. Baxter's receipt, &c., states him to be the agent of Baruso. The letters from Baruso's friends, the clearances, &c., &c., were all "on account of the royal license," and stated that the cargo was to be delivered to Baruso. He was the cloak of the transaction, and he could only be a cloak by his Spanish character. When there are two sets of documents it is immaterial to the captors which they wished to conceal. All these circumstances created too strong a suspicion to justify an acquittal. The case might have been explained but for the unfortunate conduct of the supercargo, which induced a denial of further proof. He, who could and ought to have explained the concealment, did not, but increased the suspicions by his prevarication. There were only three alternatives before the court—to acquit, to condemn, or to allow further proof. The suspicion was too strong to acquit—the prevarication precluded further proof. There was nothing left but to condemn.

The first and most essential of all belligerent rights is that of visitation and search. The right to see all the documents is a necessary consequence of that right, or it would be nugatory. It was the duty of the supercargo, as a neutral, to show all the papers. Why did he show the neutral papers only? The object of the supercargo was to defeat an acknowledged belligerent right, and he endeavored to deceive the adjudicating court.

*STORY, J. I wish you to consider [526 whether, if the trade be necessarily belligerent, the concealment of these papers can be considered as material.

Pinkney. That is, whether they can make the case worse? Perhaps not.

3. The third point is as to the neutral character of Baruso by reason of his residence in the United States.

Locality is something; but not everything. So is the time of emigration.

The general principle of the law of nations is, that the belligerent character belongs to the subject of the hostile nation wherever found. Mere change of place does not alter the character. It is easier for a neutral to slide into the character of an enemy, than for an enemy to fall into that of a neutral. But even in such cases, that great expounder of the law of nations, Sir W. Scott, examines all the circumstances of the case, time of removal, permanency of residence, motive, and nature of his business. The case of Collett (8 T. R., 31, Wilson v. Marryat) has no bearing upon this case. The special verdict found Collett to be a citizen of the United States, and the case depended upon the treaty of 1794.

The case of Mr. Johnson is not more to the point. His office of American Consul prevented his residence in London from affecting his national character. If he had not had the animus revertendi before the voyage of the Indian Chief was commenced, and had not departed before the arrival of the ship, the trade would have been adjudged unlawful.

The next case is that of G. W. Murray. Sir W. Scott not only forgot to administer justice in mercy, but pushed his principles of commercial law infinitely too far. The commissioners, under the 7th article of the British treaty,[1] gave Murray compensation on the ground that the decision of Sir W. Scott was 527] wrong. *But, even upon the principles on which that case was decided, residence alone does not constitute national character. The time of his removal and the nature of his employment were also considered.

So also in the case of the Citto (3 Rob., 38), the nature of Mr. Bowden's residence in Holland was examined.

The question always is, whether he has become, not a citizen or subject, but a merchant of that country; i. e., a general merchant. But did Baruso become a general American merchant? Was his trade American? Was it neutral? No. He carefully wrapped himself up in the folds of his license, and fenced himself round to exclude the American character.

The case of Duguet v. Rhinelander is not more applicable than the others. The plaintiff was a naturalized citizen, had been long resident, and was embarked in the general trade of the country.

As to the plaintiff's 2d objection to the opinion—because there was no evidence upon which the court could raise the hypothesis that Baruso came to this country for no other purpose than to carry on that particular trade—the fact is otherwise. There was evidence from which the jury might infer the fact supposed by the court; and they have found it.

4. The 4th question arises upon the 7th bill of exceptions, and is whether the court ought to have left it to the jury to decide whether Baruso had an interest in the cargo.

Perhaps it was a question of law dependent on the construction of the contract, and ought to have been decided by the court. But the plaintiffs cannot complain that the court left it to the jury to decide a question of law which the court ought to have decided against him. Baruso had an interest. He was a partner. The written contract says "he agrees to the following partnership." It is not contended that they are bound by the word "partnership" if the contract does not in law amount to a partnership. But the term may explain other doubtful expressions. Livingston was to 528] contribute *vessel and funds—Baruso the license, and services, as far as his services were necessary to give effect to the license. Here was a joint contribution for common benefit. It was not necessary that the losses should be equally borne, nor the profits equally divided. Here was also a participation of profits, even in an equal degree, in a certain event. So there was a contribution in loss. If the expedition failed, Livingston would lose his goods, and Baruso the use of his license for a certain time. The suffering, in their own estimation, would be equal. In case of loss upon the sales, Baruso was to contribute, and if the cargo should be lost by reason of a defect in the license, the whole loss would fall upon him. He is guaranty also for the consignees in South America. He had also an interest in the specific goods. In a certain case he was to have a right to take a portion of the goods themselves. The policy was underwritten while the vessel was on her return voyage, and while he had this interest. It was not a mere contingency, but a vested interest.

It is contended that if the usage and course of the trade authorized the use of a Spanish cover, a real Spanish interest would not increase the risk. But the warranty of American property forbids a mixture of a belligerent interest; at least it would in a court of admiralty.

5. The fifth question was upon the 8th bill of exceptions.

This opinion will not bear the construction which the plaintiffs have put upon it. It does not mean to say that the papers to be innocent must be necessary according to the usage of the trade; but if it was the usage of the trade to have such papers, then they were innocent.

6. The plaintiffs were not entitled to the instruction prayed for in the 9th bill of exceptions, because it was an instruction as to a fact; viz., that the defendants had notice that the voyage was to be carried on under a royal Spanish license. Whether they had such notice depended upon the question whether they recollected the letter of Church and Demmill, and whether they knew it was the same ship and the same voyage.

*7. The 7th question was upon the [529 11th bill of exceptions, and was whether parol evidence could be given of an usage which grew out of a law, inasmuch as the law itself was not proved by competent evidence.

It was supposed that the law should be first proved before evidence could be given of the usage dependent on that law.

8. The 8th question arose on the 13th bill of exceptions, and was whether the defendants were bound to take notice of the Spanish laws of trade.

There is no adjudged case which requires underwriters to take notice of such laws, although they are bound to know the usage of the trade. If there was no evidence of the law, the opinion was immaterial and could not injure the plaintiffs.

9. The 9th question arose upon the 20th bill of exceptions, and was whether reasonable notice was a question exclusively for the jury.

The plaintiffs had no right to except to this opinion.

Reasonableness of time is a matter of fact to be found by a jury under the direction of a court. And the court may direct them from certain facts, whether it be reasonable. In the same manner as, in trover, the court may instruct the jury that a demand and refusal are evidence of a conversion.

10. The 10th question arises upon the 24th and 25th exceptions, and was whether the defendants were liable for an increase of risk in consequence of any acts done by the plaintiffs to avoid seizure and confiscation by the Spanish government for illicit trade, the plaintiffs having taken that risk upon themselves.

The principal objection to this opinion seems to be that it is too abstract, and does not state the facts which were supposed to increase the risk. But there were facts enough stated in the bill of exceptions to ground the instruction upon. All the paraphernalia of the Spanish garb were acts done to protect the cargo from 530] *confiscation by the Spanish government for illicit trade, and certainly increased the risk of capture by the British, which was the only risk which the defendants took upon themselves. (1 Marshall, 416, Condy's edition; 1 N. Y. T. R., 549.)

1.—Of whom Mr. Pinkney was one.

11. The 11th question arose upon the 28th bill of exceptions, and was whether the risk, the increase of which could affect the plaintiff's right to recover, could be any other than the risk of rightful capture under the law of nations.

It was not necessary that the risk should be of just condemnation under the law of nations. It was sufficient if it increased the risk of condemnation upon any principle recognized by the courts of the captor.

The court was not bound to give an opinion unless prayed; and if the opinion prayed be not correct the court is not bound to give any other. (1 Marshall, 473, Condy's American edition, Sterry v. Delaware Insurance Co.)

Harper, in reply.

1. Even if the letter ordering the insurance did contain the intimations supposed, yet it did not amount to a representation; which must always be a positive affirmance or denial of some fact. (See the opinion of this court in this cause, ante, vol. 6, p. 274, and Marshall, 33).

2. As to the 5th exception, it is said that the court gave in substance the opinion prayed; yet if the prayer and opinion were both wrong, the plaintiffs had a right to except. But it is not in substance the same. Perhaps if taken alone it might be so considered, but when taken in connection with the refusal to give the instruction as prayed it is, or must be understood as being different.

It was not merely the delivery of the papers to Giles, but it was also the conduct of Baxter in denying the existence of the papers, &c., which was insisted upon by the defendants as constituting the concealment. The defendants were still at liberty to argue to the jury that 531] *the concealment by Giles, in connection with the conduct of Baxter, was such a concealment. By refusing the plaintiffs' prayer and giving the instruction as they did, the inference was plain that it did amount to such a concealment.

But there is another more important objection to the opinion. The concealment, even of criminal papers, is not a ground even of detention—nor even to deny further proof. Spoliation alone has that effect. (See the answer to the Prussian memorial in the case of the Silesia loan.) If the papers are found and produced, it excites only a slight suspicion that other important papers may be concealed. But even if it did authorize a denial of further proof, yet it is only in a case where so strong a suspicion exists from other circumstances that the court cannot acquit. But here no such suspicion was raised by the other circumstances. The concealed papers themselves proved the neutrality of the property.

The case did not need further proof. The power of attorney of Baruso was irrevocable—if not expressly, yet by implication.

There is no case which decides that concealment of papers is a ground to refuse further proof. There is a great difference between concealment and spoliation of papers, as to the degree of suspicion excited. When the papers are destroyed, the mind is left to conjecture and the strongest suspicion may be justified. But when the papers are found and produced, the whole extent of their criminality appears at once.

It is true that the act of an agent binds his principal—but civiliter, not criminaliter.

Spoliation is a criminal act in the eye of a court of admirality.

Upon the whole, then,

1. This was not a case which required further proof. 2. Concealment even of criminal papers is not a ground to refuse further proof if the case required it; and, 3. The papers were innocent.

This trade was within the exception of the order in council of the 25th June, 1802, and therefore the property * was not liable [532 to condemnation on account of Baruso's being a Spanish subject, he being an inhabitant of a neutral country, and so stated to be upon the face of the papers. It was a trade from an enemy's colony to a neutral country. The papers therefore, in the eye of a court of admiralty, were perfectly innocent. The king in council has a right to relinquish part of the belligerent rights which the nation might claim according to the law of nations. He has done so. He has said that the property of a Spanish subject, being an inhabitant of a neutral country, shall not be liable to confiscation.

If the papers had been destroyed, suspicion might have been thrown upon the transaction because their innocence could not appear. But when found they showed Baruso's interest to be as free from capture as Livingston's.

3. As to the 6th exception.

We admit that something more than mere residence is necessary to constitute national character. We admit there must be an intent to trade. Time also is a necessary ingredient. But no particular length of time is required. The residence must be so long only as to show his real intention. It is not necessary that he should embark in all the trade of the country. It is sufficient if he carry on a part of it. It is sufficient to make it the trade of this country, if the benefits of it belong to this country and not to Spain. He employed our ships, our seamen and our merchants, all of whom were to make a profit. It was a trade between a Spanish colony and the United States. Great Britain never complained of such a commerce as this. She complained only of a commerce between the colony and the mother country. If he had come to this country with a view to the war, and to carry on a trade belligerent in its nature, or not usual in time of peace, there might be some ground for the objection. But this commerce was neutral in its nature. The court meant to say that if the trade was such that a neutral could not carry it on, then, &c. There was no evidence that he came to carry on a trade which, as a neutral, he could not carry on. It is true it was a trade which, as an *American, he could not carry on; but [533 that did not make the trade belligerent. The Spanish government might have permitted an American to carry it on, and it would still have been a neutral trade.

4. As to the 7th bill of exceptions.

If the question of Baruso's interest be a question of law, then we contend that he had no such interest as could falsify the warranty.

He was not a partner. To constitute a partnership there must be an universal participation in gain and loss in all events. But in some events he was not to participate in either. In one event only was he to share the gain, and in one only was he to participate in the loss. He was not a joint owner of the cargo. In trover or replevin, he could not have proved an interest. If he had sold the cargo the vendee would have had no title. If he had given a note in the name of all, he only would have been bound. This interest was merely contingent, like that of a consignee in his commissions.

5. As to the 8th bill of exceptions.

The warranty of neutrality was a protection to the defendants against all belligerent interests and belligerent appearances, and therefore it was not necessary to disclose the belligerent cover of the real neutral interest. It is sufficient that the property insured was strictly and really neutral.

6. As to the 9th exception.

The letter of Church and Demmill, stating that the vessel was to trade under a license, was referred to in the letter which ordered the insurance and which was laid before the defendants. It is a principle of law that they are supposed to know what they had the means of knowing and what it was their interest to know. It was proved that the letter of Church and Demmill had been laid before them on a former day, and when they were again referred to it, they ought to have recollected its contents, or have asked for it again.

7. As to the 11th bill of exceptions.

534*] *An usage cannot be against law, and yet we were prevented from proving it, because it was conformable to law. According to the opinion of the court, we were bound to prove that the usage was contrary to law before we could prove it by parol.

8. As to the 13th bill of exceptions.

The defendants were as much bound to know the laws of the trade as the usages of the trade.

10. As to the 24th and 25th bills of exceptions.

The knowledge which the defendants had of the trade and its usage at the time of underwriting the policy, authorized the plaintiffs to use all the means necessary to make the voyage legal.

11. As to the 28th bill of exceptions.

The case cited is, that if there be an edict under which the belligerent does condemn, although unlawfully, it ought to be disclosed.

But here was no such edict, the condemnation was not only unlawful but unauthorized.

The court ought not wholly to reject the opinion prayed, if it be not exactly correct; because it leaves the jury to infer that no part of it is correct. They ought to go on and state what the law is.

March 15th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This perplexed and intricate case, which is rendered still more so by the manner in which it has been conducted at the circuits, has been considered by the court. Their opinion on the various points it presents will now be given.

If the question on which the court was divided be considered literally, the answer must undoubtedly be, that the letter of the 25th of March, 1806, contains no averment that no person other than Livingston, Gilchrist, Griswold, *and Baxter, were interested in the re- [535 turn cargo of the Herkimer, nor that all the persons interested therein were native Americans. This would be perceived from an inspection of the letter itself, and there would be no occasion for an application to the court concerning its contents. But the real import of the question is this: Is the language of the letter such as to be equivalent to an averment that the owners named in it are the sole persons who were interested in the return cargo? If it does amount to such an averment, then it is a representation, and if it be untrue, its materiality to the risk must determine its influence on the policy. A false representation, though no breach of the contract, if material, avoids the policy on the ground of fraud, or because the insurer has been misled by it.

Upon reading the letter on which this insurance was made, the impression would probably be that the four persons named in it were the sole owners of the return cargo of the Herkimer. The inference may fairly be drawn from the expressions employed. Such was probably the idea of the writer at the time. The writer, however, might have, and probably had other motives for his allusion to other owners than to convey the idea that there were no others. The premium might in his opinion be affected in some measure by stating the little apprehension from capture, which was entertained by others, and especially by that owner who was the supercargo. If, however, it was not supposed by Mr. Gilchrist that the persons named in his letter were the sole owners of the cargo, or if in fact they were not the sole owners, he has expressed himself in so careless a manner as to leave his letter open to misconstruction, and, in the opinion of some of the judges, to expose his contract to hazard in consequence of it.

But that part of the court which entertains this opinion, is also of opinion, that the letter ought not to be construed into a representation of any interest to grow out of the voyage distinct from actual ownership of the cargo. "The owners," says Mr. Gilchrist, "are already insured against the dangers of the seas," &c. His application was for the owners; and when he proceeds to state that others were concerned, he must be understood to say that they were concerned as owners. Consequently, if the letter implies an averment that he has named all the owners, *it implies noth- [536 ing further, and ought not to be construed into a representation that there were no other persons interested in the safe return of the cargo.

Others are of opinion, that to constitute a representation there should be an affirmation or denial of some fact, or an allegation which would plainly lead the mind to the same conclusion. If the expressions are ambiguous, the insurer ought to ask an explanation, and not substitute his own conjectures for an alleged representation. In this opinion the majority of the court is understood to concur. The instruction, then, applied for by the counsel for the plaintiffs, on which the circuit judges were divided, ought to have been given.

5th. A majority of the court is also of opinion that the instruction prayed for as stated in the 5th exception ought to have been given. If the jury believed the facts offered in evidence by the plaintiffs—which were, that by the usage of the trade to Peru from any foreign port, it was necessary for the ship to have on board, on her return voyage, the Spanish and other material papers delivered by Baxter to Giles, then there was no such concealment of said papers as can affect the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action. In general, concealment of papers amounts to a breach of warranty. But when the underwriters know, or, by the usage and course of the trade insured, ought to know, that certain papers ought to be on board for the purpose of protection in one event, which, in another, might endanger the property, they tacitly consent that the papers shall be so used as to protect the property. The use of the Spanish papers was to give a Spanish character to the property in the Spanish ports; and, of the American papers, to prove the American character of the property to other belligerents. But to have exhibited the Spanish papers to a British cruiser and thus to induce a suspicion that the property was belligerent, would have been not less improper than to have exhibited the proofs of American property in a port of Peru, and thus to defeat the sole object for which Spanish papers were necessarily taken on board.

6th. A majority of the court is also of opinion, that under all the evidence in the cause, 537] Baruso was to be *considered as an American merchant, whether he carried on trade generally or confined himself to a trade from the United States to the Spanish provinces. The Circuit Court, therefore, erred in making the neutral character of Baruso to depend on the kind of trade in which he was engaged, instead of its depending on residence and trade, whether general or limited.

7th. The instruction of the Circuit Court to which the 7th exception was taken, is obviously formed on a plain and total misconstruction of the former opinion of this court. In no part of that opinion has the idea been indicated that the interest of Baruso was a question solely for the consideration of the jury unaided by the judge. It is certainly a question on which it was proper for the judge to instruct the jury. The opinion given by this court was, that "if the jury should be of opinion that the Spanish papers, mentioned in the case, were material to the risk, and that it was not the regular usage of trade to take such papers on board, the non-disclosure of the fact that they would be on board, would vitiate the policy; but if the jury should be of opinion that they were not material to the risk, or that it was the regular usage of the trade to take such papers on board, that they would not vitiate the policy." The instruction of the Circuit Court to the jury ought to have conformed to this direction. Instead of doing so, those instructions were to exclude entirely from the consideration of the jury the regular usage of trade. They refuse to allow any influence to a fact to which this court attached much importance. It is the unanimous opinion of this court, that in giving this instruction the Circuit Court erred.

8th. The Circuit Court seem also to have varied from the directions formerly given by this court, in the opinion to which the 8th exception is taken. This court placed the innocence or guilt of having on board the Spanish papers, mentioned in the case, on the regular usage of trade; the Circuit Court has made their innocence to depend on their being necessary.

The counsel for the defendants contends, that this is a distinction without a difference; but it is impossible to say what difference this distinction might make *with the jury. [538 It is also the opinion of this court that, in estimating the materiality of the papers to the risk, their effect, taken together, should be considered, not the effect of any one of them taken by itself.

9th. The opinion which the court refused to give, to which refusal the 9th exception is taken, depends on several distinct propositions which must be separately considered.

The letter, on which this insurance was made, contains a direct reference to a previous letter written by Church and Demmill, which was laid before the company, for a description of the ship. The first question to be considered is, did this reference make it the duty of the directors to see that letter, and are they, without further proof, to be considered as having read it? The letter was addressed to, and it is to be presumed remained in the possession of, the agent who made this insurance.

It is a general rule that a paper which expressly refers to another paper within the power of the party, gives notice of the contents of that other paper. No reason is perceived for excepting this case from the rule. It is fairly to be presumed that, on reading the letter of Gilchrist, the board of directors required the agent of the plaintiffs to produce the letter of Church and Demmill, unless they retained a recollection of it. In that letter they were informed that the vessel had sailed for Lima, with liberty to go to one other port in South America, and that "she had permission to trade there."

What was the amount of the information communicated by this letter?

The permission to trade was unquestionably a permission granted by the authority of the country. It was a permission from the Spanish government. But whether this permission was evidenced by a license, or by other means, was to be decided by other testimony; whether it conveyed notice to the underwriters that such a license was on board the ship, depends, in the opinion of part of the court, on the usage of the trade. Those who entertain this opinion think, that as this was submitted *to [539 the jury, the court committed no error in refusing to say that the defendants were to be considered as knowing that the Herkimer sailed with a Spanish license on board. In estimating the increase of risk, it was certainly the duty of the jury to consider it as a voyage known to the underwriters to be carried on for the purpose of trading to Lima, and that the Herkimer had such papers on board as were usual in such a trade, but whether the license be such a paper or not, the jury were to judge as of other facts.

A majority of the court, however, is of a different opiniou. The uuderwriters, having full notice that the voyage was permitted, might fairly infer that it was licensed by the Spanish government; because in uo other way would it be permitted. The whole question turned upon the construction of a written document which it belonged to the court to make.

11th and 13th. The 11th and 13th exceptious may properly be considered together, since they are taken to opiuious giveu on the same subject, aud do not essentially vary from each other. The Circuit Court appears to have supposed that the geueral usage and course of trade could not be given in evidence, or, if given in evidence, ought to be disregarded, if the jury should be of opinion that such usage was fouuded ou the laws or edicts of the government of the country where the usage prevailed. That is uot the opinion of this court. The usage may be proved by parol, and the effect of the usage remains the same, whether it originated in an edict or in instructions given by the government to its officers. Any conjectures, which the jury or the wituesses may make on this subject, can be of no importance, and ought to have no influence on the case. Neither can it be more necessary to give notice of a usage founded upon statute, than of a usage founded on instructions. The Circuit Court, therefore, erred in directing the jury that the underwriters were not bound to take notice of the usage of trade, if they should be of opinion that the trade was prohibited by the law of Spain.

20th. The opinion of the Circuit Court to which the 20th exception was taken, appears to be entirely correct.

540*] *24th and 25th. The 24th and 25th exceptions are to the same opiuion somewhat varied in form, and rendered more explicit, on the application of the plaintiffs, than it had been in the instruction given on the motiou of the defendants. It is essentially the same with that to which the 7th exception was taken, and appears to have been founded on a total misapprehension of the former opinion given by this court. In that opinion it was expressly stated, that such papers as, conformably to the regular usage of trade, were to be taken on board a vessel, would not vitiate the policy. "The acts done by the insured to avoid seizure and confiscation uuder the laws and regulations of the Spanish government," which are mentioued in the applicatiou made to the court by the counsel for the defendants, comprehend these papers. This question, therefore, was decided by this court ou the former argument of this cause, and the court is now unanimously of opinion that the Circuit Court erred, both in granting the prayer of the defendauts and refusing that of the plaintiffs.

28th. In the opiniou, to which the 28th exceptiou was taken, this court coucurs with the Circuit Court. The direction asked by the counsel for the plaintiffs ought not to have been giveu. It is expressed in terms which, if assented to, might misguide the jury. Rightful capture according to the law of natious might be construed to mean capture for a cause which would justify condemnatiou according to the law of nations as construed in the United States. But capture will always be made ou suspicion of what the belligerent construes to be cause of forfeiture, and capture authorizes abandonment. Such acts or omissions, therefore, of the plaintiffs, as would induce a capture aud detention according to the common practice of the belligerents, are proper for the consideration of the jury iu estimating the risk.

This court is of opiniou, that there is error in the proceedings of the Circuit Court iu this cause, in refusing to give the opinion on which that court was divided; and also in the opinions to which the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 11th, 13th, 24th and 25th exceptions are taken. This court doth therefore reverse and annul the judgmeut rendered by the Circuit Court, and doth remand the cause to the said court that a venire facias de novo* may be awarded, [541 and other proceedings had therein according to law.

STORY, J.

I concur in the judgment of reversal which has just been pronounced. But as in some instances I differ from the opinions expressed by the majority, aud in others I concur upon grouuds somewhat variant, I have ventured to express my own views at large upon the important poiuts which have been so fully and ably argued.

The first question which presents itself is on the certificate of division. To constitute a representation there should be an explicit affirmation or denial of a fact, or such au allegation as would irresistibly lead the mind to the same couclusion. If the expressions are ambiguous, or such as the parties might fairly use without inteuding to authorize a particular conclusion, the insured ought not to be bound by the conjectures, or calculations of probability, of the underwriter. The latter, if in such case he deems the facts material, ought to make further inquiries. In the letter of the 26th of March, 1806, there are no words negativing the existeuce of other iuterests thau those of the plaintiffs and Messrs. Griswold aud Baxter.

The negative, if any, is to be made out by mere inference or probable conjecture, and as there is no reason to suppose that the statement was made with that intent, I am satisfied that it did uot amount to a representation negativing the existence of such interests. The court below ought therefore to have given the direction prayed for by the plaintiffs' counsel.

But, even admitting that the letter did contain the representation contended for, I am well satisfied that it was substantially true. It is not pretended that any other person except Baruso had auy iuterest in the cargo; and it is very clear that, whatever might be his contingent interest in the possible profits of the voyage, he had no vested interest in the cargo itself. He was not a partuer, for he wanted one of the essential characteristics of partnership—a direct vested interest in the joint funds. He possessed a mere possibility which, in *the successful termination of the voy- [542 age, might entitle him to a right of action for a proportion of the profits, or, in a specified case of election, to take a proportion of the property itself. But it was not such an interest as was liable to capture, or such as could be claimed or condemned in a prize court.' It was less certain than even a respondentia or bottomry interest, which have not been allowed to be asserted before the prize jurisdiction. The commissions of a supercargo upon the sales might, with as much propriety, be deemed a vested interest in the cargo consigned to his care.

I pass over, for the present, the fifth exception.

The sixth exception points to the national character of Baruso. As Baruso emigrated from Spain to the United States during a time of peace, no question arises as to the ability of a belligerent subject to change his national character flagrante bello.

It is clear by the law of nations that the national character of a person, for commercial purposes, depends upon his domicile. But this must be carefully distinguished from the national character of his trade. For the party may be a belligerent subject and yet engaged in neutral trade; or he may be a neutral subject and yet engaged in hostile trade. Some of the cases respecting the colonial and coasting trade of enemies have turned upon this distinction.

But whenever a person is bona fide domiciled in a particular country, the character of the country irresistibly attaches to him. The rule has been applied with equal impartiality in favor and against neutrals and belligerents. It is perfectly immaterial what is the trade in which the party is engaged, or whether he be engaged in any. If he be settled bona fide in a country with the intention of indefinite residence, he is, as to all foreign countries, to be deemed a subject of that country. Without doubt, in order to ascertain this domicile, it is proper to take into consideration the situation, the employment, and the character of the individual. The trade in which he is engaged, the family that he possesses, and the transitory or fixed character of his business are ingredients which may properly be weighed in deciding on the nature of an equivocal residence or 543] *domicile. But when once that domicile is fixed and ascertained, all other circumstances become immaterial.

The prayer of the plaintiffs (which was refused by the court), in effect asked that if Baruso was bona fide settled in New York, and had no domicile elsewhere, he was not to be considered as a belligerent. The court in effect declared that the character of his trade, and not his mere domicile, fixed his national character. There was therefore error both in the refusal and in the direction of the court.

The seventh exception arose from a misconception of the opinion of the Supreme Court. The court did not mean to intimate that whether an interest increased the risk or not was a mere question of fact for the jury. On the contrary, the court considered that it was a mixed question of law and fact on which the court were bound to direct the jury as to the law. As the court below were of opinion that Baruso was not a joint owner of the cargo (in which opinion I concur), the question ought not to have been left to the jury in the broad and unqualified terms which are used. Strictly and legally speaking, Baruso had no interest in the cargo; and, therefore, "his interest could not be material to the risk;" and if the point meant to have been left to the jury was, whether the concealment of the name or the possibility of interest of Barnso increased the risk, it should have been left with proper directions as to the effect of the usage of trade and neutral character of Baruso in settling that question. If the usage of trade allowed or required such cover, or if Barnso were a neutral, I am not prepared to say that, in point of law, the risk could thereby have been increased. It would have been a mere inquiry into the possible hazards from the rapacity of belligerents, or the possible effects of one Spanish name instead of another. Men reason differently upon such speculations.

Nor am I prepared to say that it is ever necessary for the assured to declare the national character of other distinct interests engaged in thesame adventure, unless called for by the underwriter. If such interests are not warranted or represented to be neutral, the underwriter must be considered as calculating upon the possible *existence of belligerent interests, or as [544 waiving any inquiry.

The fifth and eighth exceptions may be considered together, as they are founded upon the legal effect of the taking on board and the concealment of the papers, by Baxter, from the belligerent cruiser. The prayer of the plaintiffs in the 5th exception was for a direction that under all the circumstances of the case there was no such concealment as would avoid the plaintiffs' right to recover. And if, in point of law, the plaintiffs were entitled to such direction, the court erred in their refusal, although the direction afterwards given by the court might, by inference and argument, in the opinion of this court, be pressed to the same extent. For the party has a right to a direct and positive instruction; and the jury are not to be left to believe in distinctions where none exist, or to reconcile propositions by mere argument and inference. It would be a dangerous practice, and tend to mislead instead of enlightening a jury.

The opinion of the court in effect was, that the concealment of any papers, which were necessary to be on board by the usage and course of the trade, did not affect the plaintiffs' right to recover. But (in conformity with the prayer of the defendants in the eighth exception) that if any of the papers increased the risk, and were not necessary by the usage and course of trade, and the fact that such papers would accompany the cargo was not disclosed to the underwriters, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

It is undoubtedly true that the warranty of neutrality extends, not barely to the fact of the property being neutral, but that the conduct of the voyage shall be such as to protect and preserve its neutral character. It must also be conceded that the acknowledged belligerent right of search draws after it a right to the production and examination of the ship's papers. And if these be denied, and the property is thrown into jeopardy thereby, there can be no reasonable doubt that such conduct constitutes a breach of the warranty.

Concealment, and even spoliation of papers, do not ordinarily induce a condemnation of the property; but *they always afford [545 cause of suspicion, and justify captnre and detention. In many cases the penal effects extend in reality, though indirectly, to confiscation. For, if the cause labor under heavy doubts—if the conduct be not perfectly fair, or the character of the parties are not fully disclosed upon the papers before the court—the concealment or spoliation of papers is made the ground of refusing further proof to relieve the obscurity of the cause; and all the fatal consequences of a hostile taint follow on the denial.

But the question must always be whether there be a concealment of papers material to the preservation of the neutral character. It would be too much to contend that every idle and accidental, or even meditated concealment of papers, manifestly unimportant in every view before the prize tribunal, should dissolve the obligation of the policy. And if, by the usage and course of trade, it be necessary or allowable to have on board spurious papers covered with a belligerent character, whatever effect it may have upon the rights of the searching cruiser, it would be difficult to sustain the position, that the concealment of such papers, which, if disclosed, would completely compromit or destroy the neutral character, would be a breach of the warranty. In such case the disclosure of the papers produces the same inflamed suspicions, the same legal right of capture and detention, the same claim for further proof, and the same right to deny it, as the concealment would. If the concealment would induce the conclusion that the interest was enemy's covered with a fictitious neutral garb, the disclosure would not in such a case less authorize the same conclusion. In such case it would depend upon the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case, to allow the veil to be drawn aside, and admit or deny the claimant to assume his real character. Whenever, therefore, the underwriter has knowledge and assents to the cover of neutral property under belligerent papers, (as he does in all cases where the usage of the trade demands it) he necessarily waives his rights under the warranty, so far as the visiting cruiser may demand the disclosure of such papers. In other words, he authorizes the concealment in all cases where it is not necessary to assume the belligerent national character for the purpose of protection.

546*] *If this view be correct it is clear that the court ought to have given the direction prayed for by the plaintiffs. Sitting here under a clause in the policy which enables us to look behind the sentence of condemnation, we see that the property was really neutral; and if the jury believed the evidence, the concealment was of papers which were authorized by the course of trade for the voyage, and so far from giving a hostile character, was the only means of preventing a strong presumption of that character. If we but consider the known course of decisions in the British courts on questions of this nature, we shall find that, independent of the question of the neutral or hostile character of the ostensible owner, the trade between the belligerent mother country and its colony affects with condemnation the property engaged in it, although such property be neutral, and there be an interposition of a neutral port in the course of the voyage. On examining the papers in this case it will be found that they point, though obscurely, to such an ultimate destination. And at all events the existence of contradictory papers, one set American, the other Spanish, would, in a Spanish trade, afford an almost irresistible inference in a prize court that the property was really Spanish—Noscitur ab origine. It would take its character from its origin.

But it is immaterial, in my view, whether a prize court would under such circumstances acquit or condemn. When the cover of a Spanish character was allowed, it was allowed for the purposes of protection; and the disclosure of it was not required elsewhere than in the Spanish dominions. One of the risks against which the insured meant to guard himself was, in my judgment, a loss on account of the use of the Spanish character; a loss which might have been more plausibly resisted, if there had been a disclosure instead of a concealment of it.

The court also erred in declaring (in the eighth exception) that the taking on board of any of the papers, which were not necessary by the usage of the trade, if the risk thereby were increased, avoided the plaintiffs' right to recover. The effect of the whole papers should have been taken together. The evidence did not authorize the court to consider and separate the effect of *each single paper. If [547 one unnecessary paper might have increased the risk, if singly considered, and yet, if accompanied by the others, it would not have had that effect, certainly the existence of that paper with the others would not have destroyed the right of the plaintiffs. Yet the opinion of the court would have authorized the jury to draw a different conclusion.

The court should have directed the jury that if the papers were authorized by the usage and course of the trade, the concealment of them, under the circumstances, did not vitiate the policy; and that if some were authorized and others not, yet the possession or concealment of the latter with the former did not vitiate the policy, unless the unauthorized, so connected with the authorized, papers increased the risk.

The question presented by the 9th exception, is whether the defendants are to be considered as having notice that the voyage insured was to be pursued under a Spanish license. The letter of the 26th March, 1806, expressly refers to the letter of 17th of February, 1806, which had been laid before the underwriters; and they must therefore be deemed conversant of all the facts therein stated. A party shall be taken to have notice of all facts of which he has the means of knowledge in his own possession, or is put directly upon inquiry by reference to documents submitted to his inspection. In the letter of the 17th February the ship is declared to have a permission for the voyage, which in this trade can be understood in no other sense than a license. The court ought therefore to have given the direction prayed for by the plaintiffs.

The court erred in the opinion expressed in the 11th exception. The course and usage of trade may in all cases be proved by parol, whether such course and usage of trade arise out of the edicts or out of the instructions of the government, and whether the trade be allowed or prohibited by such edicts or instructions.

The court erred also in the latter part of their direction to the jury under the 13th exception. It was immaterial whether the trade was or was not prohibited by the laws of Spain. In either 548] case the underwriters *were bound to take notice of the usage and course of the trade. The public laws of a country, affecting the course of the trade with that country, are considered to be equally within the knowledge and notice of all the parties to a policy on a voyage to such country.

The 20th exception cannot be supported. The opinion of the court was entirely correct.

The 24th and 25th exceptions ought to be considered together in order to present the opinion of the court below with its full effect. It is clear that any acts done by the assured in the voyage according to the course and usage of the trade, although such acts may increase the risk, do not vitiate the policy. This opinion was pronounced by this court on the former argument of this case, in reference to the Spanish papers to which the present application of the defendants obviously pointed. The court, therefore, erred in granting the prayer of the defendants, and in refusing that of the plaintiffs.

The last (the 28th) exception cannot be sustained. The proposition is conceived in too general terms, and might mislead the jury. Any acts or omissions of the insured or his agents which, according to the known edicts or decisions of the belligerents, though not according to the law of nations, would enhance the danger of capture or condemnation, might, if such acts or omissions were unreasonable, unnecessary or wanton, form a sound objection to the right of recovery. The insured can have no right to jeopardize the property by any conduct which the fair objects of the voyage, or the usage of the trade do not justify.

YOUNG v. GRUNDY.

Although the consideration of a promissory note fail, by reason of the failure of the payee to perform his part of the agreement upon which it was given, yet if a new agreement as a substitute for the old one be entered into between the original parties to the note, this failure of the original consideration creates no equity in favor of the maker of the note against the indorsee, even in Virginia.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria, as a court of equity.

549*] *Young brought a bill in equity against Grundy to be relieved from a judgment at law, obtained by Grundy against him on a promissory note given by him in Virginia, to one William Chambers from whom it passed, by several intermediate indorsements, to Grundy. It was given in 1795 for part of the purchase money of a large tract of land in Virginia, which Chambers and others contracted to sell and convey to Young. It was afterwards discovered that Chambers and others had been imposed upon, and that they had title only to a very small part of the land they had sold to Young; whereupon a new agreement was entered into on the 6th September, 1798, between Chambers and others and Young, by which the original contract was rescinded and compensation made to Young for the injury he had sustained by their breach of contract, and provision was made to re-imburse him the moneys he had paid and to take up paper of his, equivalent to that which was then outstanding, and which he had issued for the original purchase money.

Young, in his bill contended, that Chambers and others had not complied with this new agreement, but that they owed him more than enough to cover this note.

In the court below the injunction was dissolved, and upon final hearing the bill was dismissed. Young appealed to this court.

E. I. Lee, for the appellant,

Contended, that there was an original defect of consideration for this note, which, according to the laws of Virginia, followed it into the hands of the present holder. (Laws of Virginia, vol. 1, p. 36; 1 P. Wms., 497, Turton v. Benson; 1 Dall., 23, Wheeler v. Hughes's ex'r; 2 Wash., 233, Norton v. Rose; 6 Cranch, 204, Stewart v. Anderson).

Swann, contra.

There is no ground of equity as to Grundy.

There was no original want of consideration. Young held the bond of the payee to convey the land, and had *his remedy upon [550 that bond. The new contract was a substitute for the old one, and was made after Grundy became the holder of the note without notice of any defect of consideration. By the new agreement it was understood that Young should take up this paper, unless it was taken up by Chambers and others, who had an option to take up this or any other equivalent paper of Young's.

March 16th. LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Whatever equity the complainant may once have had against the payee or holder of the note for 433*l.* 15*s.* which was assigned to George Grundy, in consequence of the non-performance of the agreement of the 15th of May, 1795, this court is of opinion that all such equity was done away by the contract of the 6th September, 1798. This last contract was made for the express purpose of making the complainants a compensation for the loss they had sustained, by the non-performance of the other, and was evidently received as an equivalent or substitute therefor. By this latter contract, then, they were placed, as it respected the holders of all their notes, precisely in the same situation as if there had been no want or failure of consideration of the agreement made in 1795. Whether the agreement of 1798 has been complied with it is not material to inquire, because previous thereto, this note was held by Grundy, who cannot be affected by any claim which the complainant may have against the other defendants in consequence of any subsequent transactions between the parties.

The court is of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court be affirmed with costs.

PALMER v. ALLEN.

Absent—TODD, J.

In the District of Connecticut, the marshal may, upon an attachment for debt, without a mittimus, commit the defendant to prison for want of bail.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Errors of the state of Connecticut, in an action of assault and battery and false imprisonment, 551] *brought by Allen against Palmer, who was a deputy-marshal of the United States for the District of Connecticut and had served a process of attachment upon Allen, and committed him to prison for want of bail, without such a mittimus as is usual upon commitment on like process issuing from the state courts.

Palmer pleaded a special justification under the writ of attachment issued out of the District Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. His plea was, upon demurrer, adjudged bad, for want of showing a mittimus; and that judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of errors.[1]

The question was now submitted to this court, who were furnished with copies of the following opinions, delivered in the court below:

Opinion of Judge Brainard, in which the majority of the court below concurred.

"The original action was trespass, for an assault and battery and false imprisonment, in which the defendant in error was plaintiff; and to which the defendant below, now plaintiff in error, pleaded specially that he was a deputy to the marshal of the United States for the district of Connecticut, and in that capacity had in his hands to serve a writ of attachment issued under the authority of the United States, returnable to the District Court of the United States for the said district; in virtue of which he attached the body of the plaintiff below, read the writ in his hearing, and for want of bail committed him to the keeper of the jail in New Haven, &c., with whom he left a true and attested copy of said writ and process which he avers to be the same imprisonment and pretended trespass complained of, &c., to which there was a demurrer and joinder in demurrer, and adjudged by the superior court to be insufficient. On which this writ of error is brought—plea nothing erroneous.

552*] *"The first action was debt brought on a statute law of the United States for an alleged breach thereof.

"Whether that law be constitutional or not, as it is unnecessary, it would perhaps be indecorous to discuss; and whether debt be the proper action to be brought on it or not, is unimportant for my purpose. The process was under a law, issued under the authority, in the hands of a marshal of, and returnable to a court, all of the United States. The service appears to be arrest of the defendants body, reading in his hearing, and for want of bail, commitment, &c. The authority of the jailer to receive and keep the defendant was a copy of the process without a mittimus.

"Is this a justification? Is this a defense?

"The first question is, in the state of Connecticut, in an action of debt, for instance, in point of service of an attachment returnable to a state court, is a mittimus necessary to authorize a committment? If not, it settles this case, and there is manifest error. But if it be, the next question is, whether a mittimus be necessary in a process issued under the laws and authority of the United States, returnable to and cognizable by a court of the United States, to be served in this state on a citizen of the same.

"This proposition I think correct, that such is the constitution of the state of Connecticut, and from the infancy of her laws and jurisprudence has been.

"That no man's person shall be imprisoned unless by judgment of court, or direction and order of a magistrate.

"In every instance of final process there is an order of commitment, a mittimus, contained in the body of the instrument—in the execution itself.

"In all cases where the subject matter has been adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, the officer's duty is pointed out and the extent of the debtor's or delinquent's liability is ascertained, the result is made, the end is known.

*"On attachments, it will be agreed [553 on all hands, that a man shall not be committed to prison, if he procure reasonable bail of the reasonableness or sufficiency of this bail, who is to judge? is the officer in all instances? I apprehend not.

"In case of an attachment, the direction to the officer indeed is, for want of estate, to attach the body of A B, and him safely keep and have to appear before the court. But the mode of this safe keeping and having to appear is pointed out and provided for by law.

"The most ancient statute I find on the subject, entitled 'An act for regulating jails and jailers,' says, that no person or persons whatsoever shall be committed to prison, although arrested or seized by attachment, execution, or any other writ, or for non-payment of rates, debts or fines, or for any misdemeanor or capital, or criminal offense, or any other cause, without a mittimus, granted and signed by civil authority, declaring the cause and ground of his commitment, requiring the jailer to receive and keep such person or persons in the prison until discharged according to law.

"In a subsequent statute passed in May, 1706, entitled 'An act concerning officers levying executions,' it is enacted, that when any officer shall have a writ of execution to levy, &c., and doth seize the body, &c., and commit him to prison, a copy of the writ of execution signed by the officer and delivered to the jailer, shall be sufficient warrant or order for him to receive such person, and him hold in safe custody till delivered by law.

"In the revision of the statutes, in the year 1750, the phraseology of the former statute was altered, and the latter was incorporated with it, under the title of 'An act concerning arrests and imprisonments for debt, damages, fines,' &c. This statute has remained the same ever since, and its reading in relation to this subject is: That no person or persons for the non-payment of rates, fines, debts, or for any crime or offeuse, shall be committed to prison without a mittimus grauted and signed by eivil authority, declaring the cause and ground of his eommitment, requiring the jailer or keeper of the prison, to receive and keep such person or per-554] sons in the *prison until diseharged aeeording to law, unless where any proper offiecr, for want of estate, seize the body or bodies of any person or persons by an execution or distress or warrant for fines and rates, and comunit him or them to prison, in whieh case a copy of the exeeution or distress attested and signed by such offieer, and delivered to the jailer or keeper of the prison, shall be a sufficient warrant or order for him to receive sueh person or persons, and him or them to hold in safe custody till delivered by law.

"From the broadness of the aneient statute it is apparent that in relatiou to all proeess, civil or criminal, mesne or final, no person could be committed to prison without a mittimus, an instrument statiug the eause, orderiug the reeeption, and directing the detention, signed by a magistrate, or as the expression is, eivil authority.

"In 1706, it oecurred to the legislature that part of this provision was unneeessary; that in final process there was a mittimus in relation to that subject from the highest authority; henee the legislative dispensation with mittimus in cases of exeeutions.

"Wheu the legislature in 1750, ineorporated the latter statute, whieh had made a distinetiou between final and mesne proeess, into the former, can it be supposed that they intended to narrow the grounds of the aneient provisions aud regulations?

"At the revision iu 1750, it also occurred to the legislature that there were other eases than exeeutions where a mittimus, in the sense generally understood, would not only be unnecessary, but improper; henee the exemption was extended to distress or warrants for fines or rates.

"The present statute says, that no person, for the non-payment of rates or fines, shall be committed to prison without a mittimus, uuless, indeed, a distress or warrant for such rates and fines has been granted by proper authority, having eompetent jurisdietion.

"The word debts, iu the statute, still remains 555] to be *satisfied with a fair and reasonable eonstructiou. The original title of the aet was an aet eoncerning arrests and imprisonments for debt, damage, fines, &e. Suppose the reading to be that, in an aetion for debt, no person shall be imprisoned without a mittimus. This would comprehend all aetions of debt in a proper and technieal sense, of course the present.

"But this I suppose is too narrow a construction. The true meaning is commensurate with all aetions by attachment, which sound in or claim debt or damage, and whieh by the proeess of a court may be redueed into debt or damage. In all which eases, while in mesne proeess, before adjustment, there shall be a mittimus to authorize a commitment, after whieh, when liquidated, the execution speaks the order of the court.

"But the statute, sinee its existenee in its present form, seems pretty generally to have had an uniform practieal eonstruction; the best comment perhaps that ean now be made upon it. So far as I ean learn, it has received in practiee, in relation to mesne process, the same construction that was given to the former statute in relation to the same subjeet, aud whieh the words of that statute absolutely and necessarily require. Both under the former and present statute, iu all eases of attachment, a mittimus has been deemed neeessary to authorize a commitment.

"But the second and perhaps more important question remains.

"In a mesne process by attachment for debt, issued under the law and authority of the United States, returnable to a eourt of the United States, to be served on a eitizen of this state, within the same, to authorize a eommitment, is a mittimus neeessary?

"The United States have a right to preseribe what mode of service for their own proeesses they may deem proper; and if they have poiuted out a mode, that mode must be pursued; if they have not, it should seem fair reasoning to couclude that they had left that subject to the existing regulations of the several states. The Uuited States have a statute, entitled 'An act for regulating *proeesses in the eourts [556 of the United States,' in which, section 2d, volume 2d, laws of United States, page 103, it is enacted, 'that the form of writs, exeeutions aud other proeesses, exeept their style, and the forms and mode of proeeeding in suits at common law, shall be the same as are now used in the said eourts respectively, in pursuauee of the aet entitled 'An aet to regulate the proeesses in the courts of the United States.'

"What those forms and modes are the statute nowhere specifies, other than by the above referenee; and the saune statute expressly repeals the whole of the act referred to.

"On recurrence, however, to that statute, we find it there enacted, 'That the forms of writs, &e., and modes of proeess in the circuit and district eourts, in suits at eommon law, shall be the same in each state respectively, as are now used or allowed in the supreme courts of the same.'

"But it has been said that mittimus is no part of the proeess. If I am eorrect in my conelusion on the first point, it is, by the law of this state, a part, and essential to the eompletion, of service in case of eommitment.

"If part of the serviee, it is part of the proeess—process in one sense is the method taken by law to eompel a complianee with the original writ, by giving the party notiee to obey it—a warning to appear in court at the return of the original writ. On failure of obedienee, further process is said to be had by attachment, &e.

"I understand that the word proeess, as used by the legislature of the United States, in the statute referred to, is to be received in its broadest and most extensive sense. It is to be taken for all proceedings, in any action from the beginning to the end.

"Mode of process includes mode of serviec. Whatever is necessary to complete the serviee of a writ returnable to a state eourt, is by that statute made necessary to eomplete the serviee of a writ returnable to a district or eircuit eourt. A mittimus is as necessary in the one case as in the other.

procuring a mittimus; that, of course, there may be a failure of justice. When the legislature of the United States referred to the laws of the several states, they were bound to know them and to make provisions correspondent with them; and I am not prepared to say that they have not. I am not prepared to say that it would not be the duty of the judge and justices of this state, on application of the marshal, to grant a mittimus. Besides, they have in each district at least one judge peculiarly their own. Sufficient is it that they have the power of making all necessary provision. They do in many instances call into their service the judges and justices of the state courts, and make them pro hac vice their own: such as taking bonds of recognizance in cases of prosecutions for breaches of the laws of the United States, and various other instances. But in the words of a great man and eminent judge, 'If the law does not work right, let the legislature mend it; it's their business. I am of opinion that there is no error.'"

Opinion of Judge Baldwin, in which Judge Swift concurred..

"I differ in opinion, only on the necessity of a mittimus, for a legal commitment by the marshal of the United States, for the Connecticut District, on an attachment for debt.

"I am of opinion that a mittimus is not necessary, by the statute of Connecticut, to authorize a commitment on attachment, in any civil cause, and if it were, it is doubted whether it would be obligatory on the marshals of the United States.

"Before proceeding to give the reasons for my opinion on either of these points, I would remark, that it is presumed it will uot be contended that the marshals are bound by a mode of proceeding which may have been used by the executive officers of the state, unless the same was required, or has been sanctioned, by the laws of the state.

"If the practical construction of the state officers can give a binding effect to the statute 558] of the state on *them, which the letter does not require; I apprehend that a contrary construction, by the marshals, sanctioned by the subsequeut act of Congress in 1792, requiring that the forms of proceedings in suits should be the same in future as had then been adopted, and used in pursuance of the former act, will be equally binding on them.

"I do not know that there has ever been a judicial construction of the statute in question. I admit that the practice among our state officers (through abundant caution) has been to commit, by mittimus, in all cases of arrests, except on executions; but it will also be admitted that the practice was never followed by the marshals of the United States.

"Ever since the establishment of the judiciary of the United States, a period of more than twenty years, they have uniformly committed, in cases of attachment, by copy of their writ; we ought, then, as the question now comes up for judicial decision, to give the proper effect to the provisions of the two statutes, independent of such practical constructions.

"I will then examine, whether the statute of Connecticut requires a mittimus for commitment on attachments.

"1. This statute, owing to repeated alterations and compilations, from materials enacted at different times, is not explicit, or very intelligible. Its history will probably give some aid in its construction.[1]

"As early as 1650, it was enacted that no man's person should be arrested, or imprisoned for any debt or fine, if satisfaction could be found from his estate.

"At that time no arrest, or attachment of the person, was allowed for debt.[2]

*"The ordinary process was by sum- [559
mons, and on default of appearance, an attachment for the coutempt issued by order of the court.

"By subsequent provisions, and particularly at the revision in 1672, an attachment was allowed as au original process in certain cases, and the form was then given. Iu 1702, the plaintiff was allowed a summons, or an attachment at his option, in all civil actions.

"In 1693, a mittimus was first required to authorize a commitment, and at the revision of 1702, it was extended and made necessary in all cases, civil or criminal. The words are, 'that no person shall be committed to prison, although arrested or seized by attachment, execution, or any other writ, or for non-payment of rates, debts or fines, or for any misdemeanor, or capital or criminal offense, or any other cause, without a mittimus,' &c.

"Inconvenience was soon experienced, and in 1706 a commitment by copy was authorized, in case of arrest on execution.

"At the revision in 1750, the statute took its present shape, viz., 'That no person shall be arrested and imprisoned, for any debt, damage or fine, where sufficient of satisfaction can otherwise be found from his estate. Provided, that no person, for the non-payment of rates, fines, or debts, or for auy crime or offense, shall be committed without a mittimus, granted and signed by civil authority,' &c., 'unless the body has been taken by execution, or distress, or warrant for fines or rates, in which case a copy of the execution or distress, attested, and signed by the officer, and delivered to the jailer, shall be a sufficient warrant or order,' &c.

"By omitting in the last statute, in the clause requiriug a mittimus, the expressions 'arrested by attachment, or any other writ, or any other cause,' and by adding to the exception, 'an arrest by distress or warrant,' for which a copy only is requested, it is evident the legislature meant to limit the necessity of a mittimus. By the letter of the act as it now appears, it is not required on an attachment for trespass, tort, case, or any other civil cause, unless it is on an *attachment [560 for debt, and it can hardly be presumed that the legislature would thus dispense with it in all other cases, and retain it in that; or that under an expression of doubtful import they meant to include all manner of attachments.

"All doubt, it appears to me, will be removed by giving that meaning to the word debt, as here used, which it had when first introduced into the statute, before an attachment of the person was allowed on mesne process in any case.

"It there evidently means a judgment debt (for there could then be no arrest for non-payment of any other), in which sense it will include as well damages recovered for tort as for money due on contract.

"As no mention is made in the existing statute of mesne process by attachment in any case, and the word debt cannot apply to the variety of demands which may be the subject of attachment, and as no reason can be assigned why that alone should be selected, I conclude the legislature, when they altered the statute, did not mean to include any arrest, by attachment, on mesne process.

"The terms, also, of the ancient statute were, that no person shall be committed without a mittimus, although arrested by attachment, or for non-payment of rates, debts or fines.

"Those of the present statute are only, that no person for 'non-payment of rates, debt, or fines,' shall be committed without a mittimus, unless by executions, &c. The first makes a distinction between a commitment on attachment, and a commitment for non-payment of a debt, &c.—a distinction which is obvious. At the time of the attachment, no debt is ascertained—the officer has no power to collect any. He is merely to secure the appearance of the person attached, before the proper court, to try the question of indebtedness. The officer has no power to commit, if the person attached will procure bail for his appearance, if not, he is to be imprisoned, not for the non-payment of the debt, but to secure his appearance at court. Whether he is in debt, is a question sub lite; to 561] say he withholds the debt, is to *prejudge the cause. I am therefore of opinion, that the non-payment of the debt mentioned in the statute has no reference to mesne process, and that there is no occasion by our statute for a mittimus, to commit in any case except for crimes. Such I contend is the true construction of the statute in question, and such I think is the construction all would give it, if a different practice of our officers had not created a doubt.

"2. If it were evident that our statute required a mittimus in such case, doubts are entertained whether it is applicable to the process of the United States.

"It seems to be agreed that the mittimus required by our statute must be 'granted and signed by civil authority' of this state. This they are neither authorized nor compelled by any law either of the United States or of this state to do in such case.

"In cases where it is deemed necessary for the civil authority of this state to aid in executing the laws of the Union, power is specially given them to do so; as in all cases of a criminal nature, and in taking depositions, &c. But there is no authority given to them, or duty imposed on them as magistrates, to aid the execution of their civil process, and to expect it of them, or leave it optional with them to give or withhold the aid, would be derogatory to the general government.

"They are an independent sovereignty. Their officers must have all the power incident and necessary to the execution of the duties of their offices.

"By a statute of this state, passed in 1794 (stat. p. 368), 'permission is given to marshals and other offices of the United States, to use our jails, to confine persons under the authority of the United States, with the same authority in the keeping of prisoners, under the authority of the United States, as the keepers of said jails, under the authority of this state have.' The effect is, and was intended to be, to take away all control or responsibility from keepers of the jails, under the authority of this state, as to prisoners confined by the authority of the United States. The prison-keeper of the sheriff, as such, has no power to receive a prisoner under the *authority of the United States. [562 He must have a special power from the marshal, to enable him to act as keeper under their authority. Such part of the prison as may at any time be used for such purpose by the officers of the United States, is as distinct from the other, and from the control of the state officers, as though it were a distinct building. Neither the sheriff nor the county are responsible for the safe-keeping of the prisoners. The keepers may be, and some times are, different; or if the same person is the keeper of both, he acts in different capacities, and under different authority.

"Hence, I infer, that the keeper of the prison of the United States has no power to commit on civil process by the authority of the state, nor, I contend, have the civil authority of the state any power to require it; and yet, if a mittimus is necessary by our statute, it must be 'granted and signed by civil authority' of the state, directed to the keeper of the jail of the United States, commanding him by authority of the state of Connecticut to receive and hold the prisoner, under the authority of the United States. I may add, also, that if the mittimus is to be considered as a writ or process, included in the act of Congress, its form must be that of commitment, but the style, that of the United States; that is, it must issue by the authority of the United States, bear test of the proper judge, and be sealed and signed by the clerk; but in such case, it would not have the requirements of our statute, by being granted and signed by civil authority of the state; and the United States have no analogous civil authority to execute the power.

"Does it then follow, as has been said, that the process by attachment must be abandoned? I think not. The party claiming a debt has a right to the advantages of such a writ, and when the officer shall have done his duty, in making the arrest, if no provision is made by law directing the mode of commitment, he must take a reasonable course, such as would be sanctioned by the principles of the common law, and such as was probably used before we had any law requiring a mittimus in any case.

"Having arrested the prisoner by legal process, the *officer became responsible for [563 his appearance at court, and on failure to procure bail, he was bound to hold him in custody. His place of custody is the prison.

"The same warrant which commanded the arrest required the officer to keep his prisoner safely, so that he might be had before the court. The officer was therefore authorized to commit. Still it is reasonable and proper that the keeper of the prison should be able to show the cause and ground of the commitment, and of his holding the prisoner in custody. This he will be enabled to do more fully, and more satisfactorily, by the copy of the process, and the doings of the officer thereon, than by the mittimus usually granted. This is the course required by our statute, on commitment by execution, distress, or warrant, and is that which I apprehend the common law in similar cases would require.

"It therefore appears to me, that on either ground, and most clearly on the first, there was no occasion of a mittimus to complete the justification of the officer, and that his plea was sufficient, and ought so to have been adjudged."

March 16th. JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of this court as follows:

This suit comes up from the state court of Connecticut, to reverse a judgment of that court. The defendant here brought an action below, against Palmer, and recovered damages for a supposed assault and false imprisonment. The facts of the case were these: Palmer is a deputy-marshal, and in that capacity arrested the body of Allen, on a writ sued out by the United States, to recover a penalty which Allen was charged with having incurred by a violation of a law of the United States. In this suit bail was demanded, and upon Allen's failing to give it, he was committed to prison. The illegal act with which Palmer was charged was committing the defendant to jail without a mittimus from a magistrate. It appears that it is the practice of that state, and in this case the majority of the judges decided it to be the law, that such a mittimus must be obtained before a defendant in a civil suit can be committed 564] *to prison. The practice, however, in the courts of the United States in that district, has been the reverse.

To this action the defendant pleaded a justification; and on demurrer, the state court adjudged the plea insufficient, for want of setting forth such a mittimus; no question was made of the correctness of taking the body of Allen, or detaining him, until he should give bail. It was supposed that the law of the United States which enacts, that the form of writs, executions, and other processes, "and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits of common law, shall be the same as are now used" in the state courts respectively, gives efficacy to the laws of Connecticut on this subject, and imposes upon the officers of the United States an obligation to conform their conduct to the provisions of those laws.

But this court are unanimously of a different opinion. The plea made out a sufficient justification and ought to have been sustained as such. A writ, known to the jurisprudence of that state, issues to the marshal in the alternative, commanding him to attach the goods of the defendant to a certain amount, and for want of such goods, to take his body; under this writ, not only in conformity to the literal meaning, but according to the established usage and received opinions of that state, the officer was sanctioned in taking the person of the defendant into actual custody—and the 56th section of the collection law of March 2d, 1799, expressly authorizes a demand of bail. Detention, therefore, until bail was given, was strictly authorized by law, and the defense to the assault and imprisonment was complete. Committing the defendant to the state prison was but one mode, and the least exceptionable mode of detaining his person, and if it was not so, it would only be the ground of a special action on the case against the officer for maltreatment, or oppression.

But it is equally clear to this court, that the law above alluded to, commonly called the process act, does not adopt the law of Connecticut, which requires the mittimus in civil cases. This is a peculiar municipal regulation, not having any immediate relation to the progress of a suit, but imposing a restraint upon their *state officers in the execution of the [565 process of their courts, and is altogether inoperative upon the officers of the United States, in the execution of the mandates which issue to them. The judgment below must be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant.

YOUNG ET AL. v. BLACK.

If three joint owners of a cargo employ the master of the ship to sell it for them, and he afterwards becomes interested in the share of one of the joint owners, he cannot, in an action brought against him by the three joint owners to recover the amount of sales, set off his share of that amount. Upon the issue of non assumpsit, the defendant may give in evidence the record of a former judgment between the same parties on the same cause of action.

It is a matter of discretion with a court whether it will compel a party to join in demurrer to evidence. A demurrer to evidence ought not to be allowed where the party demurring refuses to admit the facts which the other side attempts to prove; nor where he offers contradictory evidence, or attempts to establish inconsistent propositions.

Quære, whether the refusal of a court to compel a party to join in a demurrer to evidence, can in any case be assigned for error?

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

The suit was brought by Young, Deblois and Lawrason, against Black to recover the proceeds of the sales of a cargo shipped by the plaintiffs to the West Indies, on board the brig Active, of which the defendant was master, and to whom the cargo was consigned.

The plaintiffs, Young and Deblois, had each an interest of three-eighths in the cargo, and the plaintiff, Lawrason, the other two-eighths. Upon the general issue a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant.

At the trial the plaintiffs took four bills of exception.

The 1st was to the admission in evidence of a record of a judgment between the same parties together with parol evidence that it was for the same cause of action.

The 2d and 3d bills of exceptions were to the admission of parol proof that the defendant had an interest in Lawrason's two-eighths of the cargo, after the plaintiffs had shown their written instructions to the defendant with his promise to obey them, his bill of lading of the cargo, and his account of sales of it.

The 4th bill of exceptions states the whole evidence offered as well by the plaintiffs as by the defendant, and that the plaintiffs of-566*] fered to demur to the whole *evidence, but the defendant refused to join in demurrer, and the court refused to compel him to join.

E. I. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error.

1. The record mentioned in the first bill of exceptions was not admissible evidence, because it was for a different cause of action. The former action was for a breach of orders, and founded upon a disavowal of the conduct of the defendant; but the present action affirms his conduct and seeks for payment of the balance due upon his account of sales.

2. The court ought not to have permitted the defendant to use parol evidence to contradict the written documents which proved the property of the cargo to be in the plaintiffs.

3. The court ought to have compelled the defendant to join in the demurrer. (3 Bl. Com., 372, 373; 1 Wash., 150, 220; 2 Call., 555, 571; 3 Tucker's Blackstone, 372, note.)

Swann, contra.

The record and parol evidence were properly admitted, and the jury were to decide whether it was for the same cause of action as the present.

As to the demurrer: it does not appear that the whole evidence was stated. The defendant was not bound by any rule of law to join in the demurrer, nor was the court bound to compel him. It was a matter entirely within the discretion of the court.

March 16th. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The present action was brought by the plaintiffs in error as joint owners of the brig Active and cargo to compel the defendant, who was master of the said brig, to account for the proceeds of said cargo, which was sold during a voyage to the West Indies. Young owned three-eighths, Deblois three-eighths, and Lawrason two-eighths of the cargo.

567*] *At the trial upon the general issue several exceptions were taken by the plaintiffs, which have been argued, and we are now to pronounce our decision respecting their validity.

The defendant offered in evidence a record of a former suit between the same parties, in which judgment was rendered for the defendant, supported by parol proof that the former suit was for the same cause of action as the present suit. The plaintiffs denied its admissibility under the general issue; and we are all of opinion that the objection cannot be supported.

It has been long since established that under non assumpsit the defendant may give in evidence anything which shows that no debt was due at the time when the action was commenced, whether it arise from an inherent defect in the original promise or a subsequent discharge and satisfaction. And the precise point now in controversy has been adjudged to be completely within the rule. If the former judgment had been for the plaintiff, there would be no doubt that it would have extinguished the demand; and it is not less conclusive because it was for the defendant. The controversy had passed in rem judicatam, and the identity of the causes of action being once established, the law would not suffer them again to be drawn into question.

The second exception was taken to the decision of the court admitting evidence to show that the defendant had a sub-interest in that portion of the joint cargo which belonged to Lawrason—an interest which was not proved to have been known to or acknowledged by the other owners. And we are all of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in admitting that evidence. The other owners had nothing to do with any private contract between Lawrason and the defendant. Any right of retainer which the latter might have against Lawrason could be enforced only in an action against Lawrason himself; but it offered no legal defense to the express contract proved to have been made with all the joint owners. It might have been contended with as much propriety that the defendant was entitled in such an action to a set-off of a separate debt due from either of the owners. Nor is there any equity in such a claim *against the plaintiffs. [*568 As joint owners they had a lien upon the proceeds for the general balance between them; and had a right to have them applied in the first instance in discharge of the joint debts. Whether, after a final settlement of the accounts of the voyage, anything would have been due to Lawrason does not appear; and yet this evidence, admitted as it was, would have applied the general property to discharge his private contracts, although the joint account might have finally turned out against him. We hold it a sound rule of law, that a joint contract can never be defeated by the mere private contract of an individual of the concern, to whom the other parties have confided no authority for this purpose. Our opinion on this exception disposes also of the third, which is taken to parol evidence offered to show the acknowledgment of Lawrason of the sub-interest of the defendant.

The last exception is of a novel character. The plaintiffs upon the whole evidence offered to demur, and prayed the court to compel the defendant to join in the demurrer. The court refused to do this, and in our opinion their refusal was perfectly correct.

A demurrer to evidence is an unusual proceeding, and is allowed or denied by the court in the exercise of a sound discretion under all the circumstances of the case. The party demurring is bound to admit as true, not only all the facts proved by the evidence introduced by the other party, but also all the facts which that evidence legally may conduce to prove. It follows that it ought never to be admitted where the party demurring refuses to admit the facts which the other side attempts to prove; and it would be as little justifiable where he offers contradictory evidence, or attempts to establish inconsistent propositions. In the present case the plaintiffs admit that they denied the whole defense of the defendant, and offered evidence to contradict the evidence by which that defense was attempted to be supported. There would therefore have been the most manifest impropriety in acceding to the prayer of the plaintiffs.

The court give no opinion whether a refusal to compel a party to join in a demurrer to evidence can in any case be assigned for error.

*On the whole, for the error of the [*569 Circuit Court in admitting the evidence disclosed under the second and third exceptions the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

LIVINGSTON, J.

I concur with this court in reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court, and for the error assigned in the second exception. But I give no opinion on the refusal of that court to compel the defendant to join in the demurrer to evidence which was offered by the plaintiffs, not because I have any doubt of the correctness of the decision which a majority of the judges have formed on that point, but because I entertain a very strong conviction, and think it my duty to express it, that such refusal can never be the subject of revision upon a writ of error —the contrary of which seems to be implied by the opinion just read. Such applications must ever be made to the discretion of the court which tries the cause, and such court will generally be in a situation to decide more correctly, having all the circumstances of the case before it, than an appellate tribunal; and if it should commit a mistake in the exercise of its mere discretion in refusing to compel a party to join in a demurrer to evidence, or in refusing to grant a new trial, or in refusing to continue a cause, or in any other matter resting solely in discretion, I have no hesitation in saying that less mischief and injury will arise from obliging parties now and then to submit to such inconveniences, than to open a door to the endless litigation which will be produced by permitting appeals in all the variety of cases of this nature which must necessarily arise in the progress of every contested action, and which in Great Britain have never yet been assigned for error.

JOHNSON, J., said he did not wish it to be understood that a writ of error would lie to a decision within the discretion of the court below.

STORY, J., said he did not mean to be understood, in delivering the opinion of the court, as stating that the refusal to compel a party to join in demurrer to evidence was a ground for 570] *a writ of error. He concurred in opinion with Judge Livingston.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. On that point the court has not given any opinion. The former opinions of this court on the subject of discretion, &c., are to be considered as law; but they are not to be extended further.

THE SCHOONER ANNE

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—TODD, J.

A libel may be amended after reversal for want of substantial averments.

A libel must aver specially all the facts which constitute the offense.

The non-intercourse act of March 1, 1809, was in force between the 2d of Feb. and 2d of March, 1811, by virtue of the President's proclamation of Nov. 2d, 1810.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, condemning the schooner Anne for violation of the non-intercourse law of March 1, 1809 (§ 6, vol. 9, p. 247).

C. Lee, for the appellant.

1. The libel in this case is too imperfect to warrant a sentence of condemnation. It does not state what kind of goods were taken on board; it merely says certain articles prohibited by law. If they were French goods it was lawful to take them on board. This is a penal prosecution, and this court has decided at this term in the case of the Hoppet (ante p. 389), that the offense must be specially set forth in the libel. The place of lading is not stated, nor the time, so that it may be known whether the act was done while the law was in force. It does not state whether the goods were put on board with the knowledge of the owner, or with the knowledge of the master, but without naming either the master or the owner, it says, in the alternative, that the goods were put on board with the knowledge of the owner or master. The evidence cannot cure the defects of the libel.

2. When these goods were put on board (between the 2d of February and the 2d of March, 1811) the act of *March 1, 1809, was [571 not in force, unless by virtue of the President's proclamation of November 2d, 1810. That proclamation is not set forth in the libel, so that the act done does not appear by the libel to be contrary to law. The libel ought to have stated that France had before the 2d of March, 1811, so revoked her edicts as that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States; and that the President had declared it by his proclamation. This is not like the revival or continuance of a law by a law; but when the revival of a law is to depend upon a matter of fact, the libel ought to state the fact, that the court may judicially know whether the law be revived or not.

STORY, J. This court has decided at this term that the act of March 1, 1809, was in force in February, 1811.

C. Lee. If that point has been decided it was when I was not present, and shall forbear to make any further observations; but if it had not been decided, I should have adduced the new evidence communicated to Congress by the late documents to show that in March, 1811, the Berlin and Milan decrees were not repealed, and that the repeal did not take place till the 28th of April.

JOHNSON, J. That point was considered in the case of the Aurora. (Ante, p. 382.)

Jones, contra.

The cases of the Hoppet and the Aurora have settled all the points in this case, except the omission to state in the libel the President's proclamation. The court can take notice of the law, and therefore can notice the proclamation authorized by that law.

JOHNSON, J. That point was decided in the Aurora.

Jones. Then as to the objections to the form of the libel. This is not a case in which the appellant could plead not guilty, and put the United States upon the proof of everything alleged. But he is to put in his claim upon oath, like an answer to a bill in chancery.

572*] *All that is necessary in the libel is to state, generally, the grounds on which the forfeiture is claimed. By referring to the law it is made certain. It is clear, by the terms of the law alluded to in the libel, that the goods must have been of British growth or manufacture; and such was the proof in the case.

The doctrines relative to indictments at common law do not apply to the case.

March 16th. MARSHALL, Ch. J.

The sentence of the Circuit Court in this case must be reversed for the defects in the libel, for the reasons stated in the case of the Hoppet.

Sentence reversed, and the cause remanded with leave to amend the libel.

THE UNITED STATES
v.
JANUARY AND PATTERSON.

Absent—TODD, J.

When a collector of revenue has given two bonds for his official conduct at different periods and with different sureties, a promise by the supervisor to apply his payments exclusively to the discharge of the first bond, although some of the payments were for money collected and paid after the second bond was given, does not bind the United States, and does not amount to an application of the payments to the first bond.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky.

This case was submitted to the court without argument, and

DUVALL, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In this cause the opinion of the court is required on a single point. The facts are these:

The supervisor of the revenue, for the District of Ohio, in due form of law appointed 573*] John Arthur collector *of the revenue for the first division of the first survey of the said district. Arthur, on the 25th day of August, 1797, together with the defendants, his sureties, executed a bond to the United States, in the penalty of $4,000, with condition that Arthur should truly and faithfully execute and discharge all the duties of said office according to law. The supervisor, for greater security to the government, was in the habit of renewing the commission, and renewing the office bond; and on the 23d day of March, 1799, Arthur executed another bond to the United States with Robert Patterson, surety, in the penalty of $6,000 with this condition, "that if the said John Arthur has truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and shall continue truly and faithfully to execute and discharge, all the duties of said office, and shall also render and settle his accounts according to law, then the obligation to be void," &c.

Arthur proceeded to make the collections, and from the commencement of his duty to the 30th of June, 1802, was charged with the collection of $30,584.99 1-2. On the settlement of his account in the year 1803, he was in arrear $16,181.15 1-2, and suits were instituted on each of the bonds. The pleadings were the same in both actions. There was a plea of performance to which the plaintiffs reply and allege, as a breach of the condition, that the defendants have failed to collect and pay over the revenue arising within his district, &c., and are in arrear to the United States, &c., on which issue was joined. Pending the suits, Arthur died; and they were prosecuted to judgment against the sureties only.

The supervisor kept one general account only against the collector. On the trial the plaintiffs exhibited, on their part, the general account between them and the defendant on which the balance, as before mentioned, is $16,181.15 1-2. They also exhibited the balance appearing to be due by terminating the account with the period when Arthur gave the second bond at the time his first commission was revoked, which was $6,483.59 1-2.

The defendants, to support the issue on their part, offered the deposition of a witness who proved that James Morrison, the late supervisor of the revenue, informed him that Arthur had paid a sufficient sum to discharge *the [*574 bond first given, and that what he had paid should be so applied. After reading the deposition, the plaintiffs introduced the supervisor himself to contradict the defendant's witness. In his testimony he admits that the payments made by Arthur if applied to the first bond would discharge it; and that he might have frequently told January and others that the whole of the bond would be paid off, if the payments made by Arthur were appropriated exclusively to its discharge; and that he himself had entertained the opinion that they ought to be so applied. To repel the testimony of the supervisor and to support that of their witness, the defendants produced a clerk in the supervisor's office, who proved "that the defendant, "January, several times called at the office of "the supervisor on the subject of his bond, "expressed his uneasiness about its remaining "out and his desire to get it up. That that su- "pervisor assured him that Arthur had paid "enough to discharge that bond, and that he "might make himself easy; but refused to give "up the bond because he thought that such "bonds ought to remain as vouchers in his "office."

The plaintiffs, on this state of the case, moved the court to instruct the jury, that the promise of the supervisor as to the application of the payments in discharge of the boud, was not of itself an appropriation of the payments, unless it was followed by some act of appropriation. The court overruled the motion, and, at the instance of the defendants, instructed the jury that if they believed that the supervisor had made the election and promise as proven, it was a declaration of his election how the payments made by Arthur should be applied; and that whether a formal entry, in the books of their appropriation, corresponding with that election, were made or not, was immaterial, and that the jury ought to consider the application as made.

To the opinion of the court thus given, the plaintiffs excepted, and this court must now decide as to the correctness of the opinion of the court below.

The law, with respect to the application of particular payments when the debtor owes dis-

575*] tinct debts, has long *since been settled. The debtor has the option, if he thinks fit to exercise it, and may direct the application of any particular payment at the time of making it. If he neglects to make the application, the creditor may make it; if he also neglects to apply the payment, the law will make the application.

In this case a majority of the court is of opinion that the rule adopted in ordinary cases is not applicable to a case circumstanced as this is; where the receiver is a public officer not interested in the event of the suit, and who receives on account of the United States, where the payments are indiscriminately made, and where different sureties, under distinct obligations, are interested. It will be generally admitted that moneys arising due, and collected subsequently to the execution of the second bond, cannot be applied to the discharge, of the first bond, without manifest injury to the surety in the second bond; and vice versa, justice between the different sureties can only be done by reference to the collector's books, and the evidence which they contain may be supported by parol testimony, if any in the possession of the parties interested.

The court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in the opinion given, and that it be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

THE UNITED STATES v. PATTERSON.

Absent—TODD, J.

A debtor of the United States, who puts evidence of debts due to himself into the hands of a public officer of the United States, to collect and apply the money when received to the credit of such debtor in account with the United States, is not entitled to such credit until the money gets into the hands of a public officer of the United States entitled to receive it. Its being in the hands of an agent of a person who at the time when the claims were put into his hands for collection was a public officer of the United States, entitled to receive debts due to the United States, but whose office became extinct before the money was received by his agent, is not sufficient to entitle such debtor to a credit in account with the United States therefor.

THIS was also a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky.

The case was submitted without argument, and DUVALL, J., delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

576*] *This case has been considered in connection with that against January & Patterson.

A suit was instituted on the bond dated 23d March, 1799, against Arthur & Patterson; and pending the suit Arthur died. The defendant pleaded performance, to which the plaintiffs replied, alleging as a breach of the condition, that the stipulations therein contained had not been performed, and that the defendant was in arrear to the plaintiffs the sum of $16,181.15½, &c., on which issue was joined.

The evidence exhibited in the suit against January & Patterson was produced in this case. On the trial the defendant took several exceptions, but not having appealed, they are not open to examination.

The plaintiffs also took an exception to the allowance of a credit to the defendant. The supervisor had received the evidence of a number of outstanding debts due to Arthur, which he undertook to collect, and promised to apply the proceeds to Arthur's credit. Among them was the bond of Beelor & Moore, which was sued; at the trial of this suit, it appeared that the amount of that bond had actually come into the hands of the agent of the person who had been supervisor, but that office being extinct, it was contended on the part of the United States, that the payment could not be considered as a payment to government. The court was of a different opinion, and instructed the jury accordingly; to which opinion of the court an exception was taken, and a writ of error prosecuted.

This court is of opinion that the Circuit Court erred in the decision thus made. The reception of the outstanding debts by the supervisor, for the purpose of having suits commenced for the recovery of them, was an accommodation to the defendant, who could not be justly entitled to credit until the money was in the hands of some public officer authorized to receive it.

Judgment reversed.

*LIVINGSTON [*577
v.
DORGENOIS.

Absent—LIVINGSTON, J., and TODD, J.

A writ of error does not lie to an order of the court below to stay the proceedings finally upon suggestion of the attorney for the United States, in a case to which the United States are not parties—but the court will award a mandamus nisi, in the nature of a procedendo.

THIS was a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the District of Orleans, in a suit brought in that court, by Edward Livingston against F. I. Le Breton Dorgenois, marshal of the territory of Orleans, according to the forms of the civil law as established in that territory.

The petition of E. Livingston stated, that one John Gravier, on the 30th of April, 1803, was an inhabitant of the province of Louisiana; that he was the owner and possessor of a plantation or parcel of land adjoining, and next above the city of New Orleans, and bounded in front on the river Mississippi, which had been uninterruptedly owned and possessed by himself, and those under whom he claimed, for upwards of eighty years. That the said plantation or parcel of land had then, to wit, on the said 30th day of April, and long before, been greatly increased by the alluvion of the said river, which had always, from the several periods of its increase, been considered, possessed, and lawfully held, as parcel of the said tract of land, by the said Gravier and those under whom he held.

That the mayor, aldermen, and inhabitants of the city of New Orleans having, under some pretense of title to the said alluvion, or to a servitude therein, committed divers trespasses on the said land, the said John Gravier filed his petition in the Superior Court of the territory of Orleans, being a court of competent jurisdiction, and from whose judgment there is no appeal, praying for an injunction against the said trespasses, and that he might be quieted in the possession of the said land. And that such proceedings were had in the said court, on the said petition, that it was finally adjudged and decreed, that the said John Gravier should be quieted in his lawful enjoyment of the said alluvion, and that an injunction, before granted, should be made perpetual, which judgment was carried into execution. After which the petitioner (Livingston) took possession, under 578] *Gravier, of the property in question, which he held as the legal owner in fee, by virtue of sundry conveyances from Gravier and others who legally held under him; and that the possession of Gravier, in which he was quieted by the said decree, was legally and uninterruptedly transmitted to the petitioner, Livingston, and that he held the same until the 25th of January, 1808, when he was forcibly dispossessed by the defendant, the marshal of the District of Orleans, who still retains the possession thereof, contrary to law.

The petitioner then prays that, in the first instance, without prejudice to his further claims, he may be restored to the possession of which he has been illegally deprived, and may have such further and other relief as the nature of his case may require.

To this petition the defendant answered, and pleaded in bar, that before and on the 25th of January, 1808, he was marshal of the district of Orleans, and in his official capacity received from the President of the United States an instruction or mandate to remove from the lands in question all such persons as should be found thereon and who should have taken possession thereof, or settled thereon since the 3d of March, 1807, which instruction or mandate was communicated to the defendant officially, by the direction of the President of the United States, in a letter written by James Madison, then Secretary of State, which letter is in the words and figures following, viz:

"Department of State, Nov. 30, 1807.

"SIR,

"In pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress, 'to prevent settlements on lands ced-'ed to the United States, until authorized by 'law,' I am directed by the President to instruct you to remove immediately from the land known and called by the name of the Batture, in front of the suburb St. Mary, of the city of New Orleans, which was ceded to the United States by the treaty with France, and the settlement of which has not been authorized by any law of the United States, all persons who shall be found on the same, and who shall have taken possession or settled thereon since the 579] *3d day of March, in the year 1807. Should any aid be necessary you will call for the assistance of the good citizens of the district, as the posse comitatus, or civil power of the territory.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, sir,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES MADISON.

"FRANCIS JOSEPH LEBRETON DORGENOIS, Esq.
Marshal of the Orleans Territory."

And that the defendant did accordingly, on the said 25th day of January, as marshal as aforesaid, and in obedience to the said instruction or mandate of the President, remove the plaintiff and his servants from the lands aforesaid, the same having been taken possession of by the plaintiff since the 3d of March, 1807, which said removal is the same which the plaintiff has set forth in his petition, and this he is ready to verify, &c.

To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder; but upon the day assigned for the argument, "Tully Robinson, Esq., attorney for "the United States, moved the court that the "proceedings be stayed, upon a suggestion that "the suit is fictitious and collusive; that the "defendant is entirely uninterested in the "cause, not having (though impliedly admit-"ting by the pleadings that he has) any right of "property or possession in the tract or parcel of "land called the Batture, but that the said suit "is carried on for the sole purpose of affecting "the interest of a third party, to wit, of the "United States, and of obtaining the posses-"sion from them." Whereupon sundry documents were filed in support of the suggestion, and against it; and the plaintiff offered to consent that the United States should intervene in the cause, but the counsel with the attorney for the United States replied that the offer could not be accepted, because the United States could not be made defendants in any case. The motion of the attorney for the United States was thereupon *argued, and the court hav- [580 ing taken time to consider, and having also granted a re-hearing, ultimately decreed that the proceedings should be "finally stayed;" whereupon the plaintiff sued out his writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

P. B. Key, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1. That the suggestion of the District Attorney ought not to have been received to stay the proceedings.

2. That the rights of the United States (if they had any) could not have been injured by a decision in this case.

3. That to protect the interest of the United States, they had a clear adequate remedy by intervention, as known and used in the civil law.

1. A proceeding so novel and extraordinary, and so pregnant with mischievous consequences, ought to be supported by clear law, or decided usage and practice.

If proceedings are to be stayed at the mere suggestion of interest in the United States, it will be in the power of the District-Attorney, at any time, to stay proceedings in any cause by such a suggestion.

There is neither statute law nor practice to justify such a proceeding, nor can it be sustained by analogy to those cases in which courts of law have sometimes stayed the proceedings at the suggestion of a third party. There is no case in which they have been stayed upon the mere allegation of the interest of such party, or upon the mere suggestion of collusion.

It is only in cases where the testimony leads to indecency, and is contra bonos mores; or where the peace of families, and the happiness and reputation of individuals are put to hazard by actions founded upon wagers made by indifferent persons, and where the injured party would be without remedy, that the court will interfere to stay proceedings, as in the case of Da Costa v. Jones (Cowp. 729), and Cox v. Phillips, Ca. Temp. (Hardw. 237.)

581*] *Here it is a mere suggestion of property in the United States, who, if they have any right, have a remedy. That right, if any, cannot be affected by this suit.

2. The question before the court upon the demurrer is, was the defendant justified in removing the plaintiff from his possession? If he was not, the plaintiff is entitled to restoration to his possession with damages, but the right of the United States is not affected. If the defendant was justified, then there is an end of the plaintiff's case. The judgment in this case cannot be given in evidence against the United States. It is res inter alios acta.

If this "suggestion" prevails, the plaintiff is ruined, because the United States are not suable, and he has no redress, however illegal the conduct of the officer who removed him.

Whenever the United States have a right, they must prosecute for the recovery of it. There is no obstacle in the way. It is every day's practice. In a case of trover for a ship between individuals, the United States would not be permitted to stay proceedings upon a suggestion that the suit was collusive—that neither of the parties had possession or property in the ship, but that she was forfeited to the United States.

3. But the United States had a clear adequate remedy to protect their rights by intervention, as known and used in the civil law. In 2 Domat, 676, the proceeding by intervention is defined. The petition of intervention ought to set out the interest of the party, with his proofs; the parties litigant are called upon to answer; and the party intervening is considered as plaintiff. This is what the plaintiff offered to permit the United States to do, but they refused, "because the United States could not "be made defendant;" whereas the process of intervention would have made them plaintiff. But the reason is obvious; intervention would have obliged them to show and establish their title; which they could not do, and therefore they resorted to this extraordinary mode of suggestion for the purpose of avoiding a judicial investigation of their right.

582*] *The consequences of such a proceeding, if supported, are too serious and glaring not to be perceived by the court.

Pinkney, Attorney-General,

Stated that he did not appear for the United States, nor for Dorgenois. The writ of error is not against Dorgenois, but against the United States. Yet no citation had been served on the United States or their attorney. He appeared as amicus curiæ, and objected to the court's hearing ex parte affidavits to prove the value of the matter in dispute to be more than 2,000 dollars; but the court overruled his objection, and heard the affidavits.

On a subsequent day, he stated that he should confine his argument to two questions.

1. Has this court any jurisdiction of the cause? Is it before them? And

2. How shall it be disposed of?

1. The cause is not before this court. The writ of error has issued improvidently. There is no authority nor precedent for a writ of error in such a proceeding. It is not a judgment; and a writ of error at common law, as well as by statute, lies only to a final judgment. This was not a final judgment; for the complaint is, that the court below refused to pronounce a final judgment. This proceeding is not between the parties to the suit. It was equally adverse to Dorgenois as to Livingston. It is not defended by Dorgenois. He opposed the motion, and had as good a right to do so as Livingston. He had a right to go on and get judgment for his costs, if the law was on his side. If the motion of the district attorney had failed, Dorgenois could not have had a writ of error. Nor could the United States. No person who is not a party or privy can have a writ of error. If it be a right, it ought to be reciprocal. There are no authorities directly in point, because the case must be rare; but in analogous cases no writ of error lies. The prayer for the benefit of clergy, which intervenes and prevents the attainder, produces a final *stay of the proceedings; yet no [583 writ of error lies, because it was no judgment. The only remedy is a certiorari to bring the case into the crown office. (Cro. El., 489· Long's case; 9 Viner, 476, pl., 2; Id., 480, pl., 13.) So in the case of recusancy, where the conviction is by proclamation, error will not lie, because there was no judgment. So in the case of prohibition, error will not lie for refusing a prohibition, consequently it will not lie on the granting it. There is a strong analogy between that case and the present, which is in the nature of a prohibition. (1 Salk., 236.) So the refusal to grant a new trial, or to continue a cause, &c., are not the ground of a writ of error. (1 Henning, 222; 4 Cranch, 324; 2 Binney, 80, 93; 6 East, 633.)

2. But if this court is in possession of the cause, and if the merits of the case are against the plaintiff, the court can have no motive to interfere, or to reverse the proceedings.

The plaintiff never could be entitled to recover. He brought his action 18 months after the cause of action accrued; and the general rule of the civil law is, that it must be prosecuted within one year if the sole ground of action be the unlawful force. There is only one exception, which is where the defendant continues in the possession thus unlawfully and forcibly acquired. If the force be removed within the year, the action must be brought within the year. The action in the civil law is called Interdictum unde vi. (L., 1, ff. d. Tit., de vi et vi armata; 2 Pothier, 103; of possession and prescription, c. 6, § 2 & 5; 7 Pothier's posthumous works, 258, 259, c. 13, art. 3.)

The plaintiff's own case shows that the force was more than a year before his suit, and was discontinued within the year. The defendant was not in possession when the suit was brought. But it is said that the limitation ought to have been pleaded, by analogy to the common law. At common law it was first decided, that if it appeared by the plaintiff's declaration, that his claim was within the statute of limitations, it need not be pleaded.

Afterwards it was held necessary to plead it, 584] that the *plaintiff might have notice, and reply to the exceptions. But in the civil law there are no exceptions. It is not necessary to plead the limitation. If Dorgenois did not take advantage of the limitation in his favor, it is evidence of collusion.

But without insisting on this defense, the justification set up by the defendant is sufficient. This court will look into it to support the proceedings, but not to reverse them.

The plea sets up the act of Congress, and the order of the President. Every government causes its rights to be protected in the same way. In every republic we find the same. It was so in Rome, Sparta, Athens, &c. The act of Congress was indispensable. Its sole object was to guard against intrusions—to preserve the status quo. The President is to exercise a judicial power in deciding whether it be a case in which he was to execute the law. Wherever he was of opinion that the lands had been ceded to the United States, and that the settlement thereof had not been authorized by any law of the United States, and that a person had settled thereon since the 3d of March, 1807, it was his duty to execute the law. The instructions to the marshal stated that the lands had been ceded to the United States, and that the settlement thereof had not been authorized by any law of the United States, but did not state the fact that there had been an intrusion into those lands since the 3d of March, 1807. The President might have had an inquest to ascertain that fact, but he was not bound to do so. He left that fact to be decided by the marshal, who found that there had been such an intrusion. If the President had jurisdiction to issue the warrant, the marshal was justified in obeying it, whether the President decided right or wrong. If on the face of the warrant the jurisdiction be asserted, although falsely asserted, he is bound to obey. He cannot say that the President has overstepped his authority. The contrary doctrine would make the inferior the appellate tribunal. He is only to look to his precept. He could not inquire whether the United States had title or not. The President could not execute the law personally. He must 585] act by inferior agents. An *officer who has an execution, on the face of which all appears right, is justified.

But another ground of objection to the justification is, that the warrant does not state that the intrusion was since the act. The President had a right to inquire, or to substitute an agent to make the inquiry. But the justification states the fact, that the lands were ceded to the United States, and that the plaintiff had intruded since the act. If the marshal were not competent to ascertain that fact, yet it appears from the other proceedings. If Gravier's possession be Livingston's possession, then the fact is stated, that Gravier's possession was since the act.

It is immaterial whether the United States had title or not. If the President had authority to decide, his decision is conclusive as to the officer. It differs from a common case where a man cannot delegate an authority further than he has title. Independent of the question of title, the act of Congress has given the President a judicial authority to ascertain facts, and to issue his warrant thereon.

Another objection to the plaintiff's claim is, that the United States are not suable. The judgment would have been nominally against the marshal, but would have affected the title of the United States. The execution, upon the judgment in an action of interdictum unde vi, is conclusive as to the possession. If the agents of government may be sued, all its rights may be subjected to judicial cognizance. The non-suability of government prevents the judicial decision directly on the property or rights of the government so as to affect permanently the interests of the United States. A contrary doctrine would be inconsistent with sovereignty. There are cases of forfeiture, &c., where the United States are plaintiffs, and there may be cases in which they may authorize suits to be brought against themselves.

It is immaterial whether the United States show their title or not. It is sufficient if it be set up; or if that question be necessarily in contest. That the right of the United States was in contest appears from the *President's [586 message to Congress, communicating his proceedings relative to the batture, which the plaintiff has produced in evidence.

The case has been thus far considered, on the supposition that the plea of justification by the marshal is a good defense in law. But if it be an imperfect defense, will this court send the cause back to be risked by such a defense, or to be abandoned or betrayed? It is clear that the United States claim title, and this court will take care of the interest of the United States.

It is said that the plaintiff was willing that the United States should intervene. But who has authority to intervene, and submit the rights of the United States to judicial investigation? The President had no such right. But if they were to intervene, it must be as auxiliary either to the plaintiff or the defendant. The judge was therefore driven to stay the proceedings. He could not compel the defendant to amend his defense. The government could not intervene as an individual may. It cannot submit its rights as defendant. Probably the imperial code provided for the protection of the imperial rights. By analogy the United States ought to have the same privilege. If the defense be not good, there is no remedy for the United States but to stay the proceedings.

Every court has such a discretion to stay proceedings when the feelings, &c., of third persons are injured; a fortiori where the interests of the United States are concerned, even in cases where there is no collusion. But where there is collusion, the right is unquestionable.

If this court should reverse the decision of the judge, it can only send the case back with directions to proceed in the cause.

Harper, in reply, observed,

That he should be alarmed for himself and for his fellow citizens of the United States, if it could be supposed necessary to reply to many of the positions advanced by the Attorney-General. They find their refutation, *not [587 only in the universal understanding of the country, but in the heart of every person who hears them.

This case has no analogy to that of Cox, where the suit was only a pretext to intermeddle with the domestic concerns of third persons, and to harrow up their feelings.

The government of the United States has no greater right to stay the proceedings in a suit between third persons, than any other individual; and no individual can stay the proceedings in such cases upon the mere suggestion of interest or collusion, without becoming a party to the suit. It is true that the United States cannot be brought into court as defendant in all cases; but shall it therefore come when it pleases, and interfere in private concerns? It is sufficient that it can seize what it pleases, and hold what it seizes, without being compellable to account. But it is the only civilized government that refuses to submit its rights to judicial decision.

The question of collusion, being a question of fact only, he rested upon the argument of the appellant as contained in his printed statement of the case.

The action interdictum unde vi, is a possessory action only; and the only question is the forcible entry, and its legality. The title does not come in question. The only question is concerning the force and the damages. It was the only action he could have brought. If there had been a question of title, he might have had the actio utilis with his possessory action. If the United States had an interest, it ought to have been shown. In the case of the direct taxes, President Washington did not think that the dignity of the United States forbade a judicial investigation. He directed a case to be made and argued at the expense of the United States.

But the defense of the appellee is wholly untenable. It is no justification. The warrant of the President is not authorized by the act of Congress (March 3d, 1807, vol. 8, p. 317). The party to be ousted under the authority of that law must be one who had taken possession since the 3d of March, 1807. It does not apply to 588] *one who had received peaceable possession from one who was in peaceable possession before and on that day. Its object was to prevent intrusion by strangers into the vacant lands ceded by the treaty. It means an original taking, not receiving a derivative possession. It must appear also that these lands were ceded. But they were not ceded. The cession was only of vacant lands. But the estate to which this alluvion had accrued, was in possession of Gravier at the time of the treaty, and had been in his possession, and in that of those under whom he claimed, for more than 80 years. The alluvion had been judicially decided to be the private property of Gravier by a competent tribunal, whose decision was conclusive.

But there is another fatal objection to the defense, which is, that the act of 1807 did not apply to any claims under French or Spanish grants, until the board of commissioners appointed by virtue of the act of Congress of 1805 (vol. 7, p. 291, 295, § 4) should have rejected them, or until they should be rejected by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by Congress, to whom there was a right of appeal. The report of this board of commissioners was not made until January, 1812, and was not transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the the Treasury until November, 1812, long subsequent to the forcible removal of the appellant.

The defense ought to have averred that this claim had been submitted to the board of commissioners and rejected, &c.

It is said that the action interdictum unde vi is an annual action. But it is also stated in the books, that if the spoliator remain in possession, it may be brought at any time. The plaintiff states the defendant to be in possession, and the fact is admitted by the defendant. But it is said the truth of the fact is not so. Yet it appears that the defendant took possession by force, and kept the plaintiff out, and has not delivered the possession to any body else. The United States disclaimed possession. The possession, therefore, is to be presumed to remain with the defendant.

It is objected that a writ of error does not lie in such *a case. It may be admitted [589 that at common law this is not such a judgment as will support a writ of error. But in the civil law, in equity, in admiralty and ecclesiastical cases, every decree or sentence of dismissal may be appealed from. But it is said not to be a final sentence, because the court below may rescind it at any time. A decree that a judgment shall be finally staid is a final decree, as much as a decree dismissing the bill.

It is also objected, that if the cause be sent back, the United States cannot have a hearing. But the United States may intervene, which is a process analogous to a bill of interpleader. It is not true that they cannot intervene but as auxiliary to the plaintiff or defendant. This is shown by Pothier, cited by the Attorney-General. He speaks throughout of the right of the third person who intervenes. But if the United States cannot intervene without joining one or the other party, why not join the defendant who claims under the United States? If his defense is imperfect, why not help him? If collusive, why not make a better?

Even under the Roman civil law, the Emperor himself cannot by rescript affect the property of a person who has not been heard. (Code, Tit. 4; Corp. Jur. civ., vol. 2, p. 258.)

March 16th. The counsel for the appellant dismissed his writ of error, and prayed a mandamus nisi to the judge of the District Court of Orleans in the nature of a procedendo, which was granted.

Mandamus nisi awarded.

OTIS v. BACON.

Absent—TODD, J.

By the 11th section of the act of 25th April, 1808, vol. 9, p. 150, the collector had no right to detain a vessel and cargo after her arrival at her port of destination, under a suspicion that she intended to violate the embargo; and such detention could not be justified by instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, nor by the confirmation of the President.

ERROR to the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of Massachusetts, in a case involving 590*] the construction *of an act of Congress, and the justification of an officer of the United States, claiming justification under such act: the decision of the court below being against the justification thus set up.

The case was this: Bacon, the defendant in error, having obtained permission to import a cargo of flour from Baltimore into the port of Barnstable, arrived with his cargo at a place called the Mud-hole, in the district and port of Barnstable, on the 2d of October, 1808, and on the 3d obtained from Joseph Otis, the collector of the port, a permit to land the cargo. On the next day the vessel and cargo were seized by Simeon Crowell, the inspector of the port. Bacon called at the collector's office to inquire into the cause of the seizure, and was informed by Joseph Otis, the collector, that he had not authorized it. But William Otis, the deputy-collector, in answer to an offer by Bacon to give bond and security to any amount if he would release the vessel and cargo, said "I have got your vessel and I will keep her." Bacon then abandoned the property to William Otis, the plaintiff in error, and made a protest and abandonment before a notary public. On the 3d day after the seizure, Crowell removed the vessel to Bass river, six miles south-east of the Mud-hole, and on the 13th of October 233 barrels and 49 half barrels of the flour were landed and stowed in Crowell's house. The vessel and the residue of the cargo was afterwards carried away by persons unknown, and the cargo sold in the West Indies.

Bacon brought his action of trover against Joseph Otis, the collector, William Otis, the deputy-collector, and Simeon Crowell, the inspector. Joseph Otis died before the trial, and Crowell was never taken.

At the trial William Otis, the plaintiff in error, relied on the 11th section of the act of Congress of the 25th of April, 1808 (vol. 9, p. 150), by which it is enacted, "That the collector of "the customs be, and they are hereby respect- "ively authorized to detain any vessel ostensi- "bly bound with a cargo to some other port "of the United States, whenever, in their opin- "ions, the intention is to violate or evade any "of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo, 591*] "until the decision of *the President of "the United States be had thereupon," and offered in evidence certain letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing instructions to the collector, and stating that the President had confirmed the detention of the vessel: also written orders from Joseph Otis, the collector, to Crowell, the inspector, to seize the vessel and land the cargo. And also offered evidence that an unusually large quantity of flour had been imported into Barnstable about the same time, and also evidence of the declarations of the mate of the vessel the day before she was carried off; all of which evidence was rejected by the court.

The judge instructed the jury that if they believed the testimony relative to the declarations of William Otis, and the other circumstances, it maintained the issue on the part of Bacon.

And also, that the collector had no right, under the circumstances, to detain the vessel, she having arrived at her port of destination and obtained a permit to unlade.

And further, that if the collector had power to detain the vessel, his authority did not extend to the seizure of the cargo, which seizure was, of itself, unlawful, and a conversion of the cargo.

And that if Bacon had been aiding in forcibly rescuing the vessel and cargo, and had obtained any benefit from it, the verdict must be for the defendant.

The defendant took a bill of exceptions, and, the verdict and judgment being against him, brought his writ of error under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error.

The declarations of the defendant were not sufficient evidence of the trover and conversion, and there was no evidence that he did any act. The judge ought to have left the jury to draw their own inference from those declarations.

*The vessel had not in fact arrived at [*592 her port of destination. Her clearance was for Yarmouth, which, although within the district of Barnstable, is six miles distant; she might even have gone to Provincetown on the other side of Cape Cod.

Part of the defense was that the vessel was carried off by collusion with the plaintiff, and yet the judge rejected the principal evidence which connected him with the transaction, the declarations of Martin, the mate, who ran away with the vessel and sold the cargo at Nevis.

The judge also rejected the evidence tending to show the motives for a fraudulent voyage, and the grounds of suspicion which the collector had.

He rejected also the letters of instruction from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the letter giving notice that the President had confirmed the detention of the vessel, which, even if they were not authorized by law, were yet good evidence in mitigation of damages.

Amory and P. B. Key, contra.

If the collector had no right to detain the vessel under any instructions which could be given, the letters offered in evidence must have been immaterial, and therefore inadmissible.

She was not ostensibly bound to any other port—she had arrived and obtained a permit to land her cargo. Yarmouth was not another port, it was part of the same port of Barnstable.

If a judge tells the jury that a fact is proved, when it is not, it is not an error in law. The jury are not bound to regard the opinion of the judge as to the existence of a fact. The sufficiency of any fact or facts to maintain the issue is a matter of law, and the instruction of the judge upon that point is proper.

As to the instructions, if they were merely conformable to the law they were immaterial; and if contrary to law, inadmissible.

*In trover, what is not a justification [*593 cannot be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. The damages are the value of the article converted. Vindictive damages are not to be given. It is a mere indemnification that is sought.

As to the declarations of Martin: he is not proved to be the agent of the plaintiff. Why was he not examined as a witness?

Jones, in reply.

The judge ought to have told the jury that if they found Martin to be the plaintiff's agent, then his declarations were evidence, otherwise not.

The President's confirmation of the seizure was a justification under the provisions of the law.

The jury may give vindictive damages in trover, if they will. Evidence may therefore be given in mitigation.

March 17th. WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an appeal from the Supreme Judicial Court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, under the 25th section of the judiciary law. The judgment complained of was rendered in an action of trover and conversion, brought by the appellee against Joseph Otis, Crowell and the appellant for taking and converting a quantity of flour, the property of the appellee. The trial took place between the appellee and appellant, Joseph Otis having died after the commencement of the suit; and the process not having been served on Crowell. The verdict having been in favor of the plaintiff, the appellee, judgment was rendered thereupon in his favor.

By a bill of exceptions taken to the charge of the court the following facts appear to have been given in evidence. That Bacon having obtained from the Governor of Massachusetts such a certificate as authorized him under a provision in one of the embargo laws to transport a cargo of flour from some of the southern [*594] *states to the district of Barnstable, did accordingly procure such a cargo at Baltimore and arrived with it in the schooner Ann, at a place called the Mud-hole, in the port and district of Barnstable, on the 2d of October, 1808. On the 3d of the same month a permit to land the cargo was granted by Joseph Otis, the collector of the port. The day following the vessel and cargo were seized by Crowell, the inspector of the port. Bacon immediately called at the collector's office to inquire into the cause of the seizure, and was informed by Joseph Otis that he had not authorized it. But William Otis, the deputy collector, in answer to an offer made by Bacon to give bond and security to any amount if he would release the vessel, said, "I have got your vessel and I will keep her." The offer to give bond not to go any where with the vessel and cargo was repeated, but William Otis refused to give her up. Bacon then proposed to unlade the vessel and again offered bonds, which Otis, the appellant, refused, and said, "you may see the flour landed, but you shall not have it after it is landed." The appellee then abandoned the property to the appellant, and the next day made a protest and abandoned before a notary public. The seizure and detention of the vessel and cargo by Crowell is fully proved. On the third day after the seizure Crowell removed the vessel to Bass river, six miles southeast of Mud-hole; and on the 13th of October 233 barrels and 49 half barrels of the flour were landed and delivered to the appellee. The vessel, with the residue of the cargo, for the conversion of which residue this suit was brought, was afterwards carried away by persons unknown, and the cargo sold in the West Indies.

Upon this evidence the court charged the jury that if they believed the evidence of the declaration of William Otis, and of the other circumstances in this case respecting the seizure and detention of the said vessel and her cargo, it was sufficient in point of law to maintain the issue on the part of Bacon, and to prove the conversion of the 298 barrels and 21 half barrels of flour which were carried off in the vessel. That the collector had no right to detain this vessel and cargo, she having arrived at her port of discharge and obtained a permit to unlade, and that even if he had a right *to detain the vessel, this authority did [*595] not extend to a seizure of the cargo, and that such seizure was of itself a conversion, and that as the defendant, Otis, had failed to make out a justification, he must be considered as a wrong doer and chargeable to Bacon for the value of said flour. But that if the jury should believe from the evidence that Bacon aided or consented to the rescue and carrying off the vessel and cargo, or had by forcible or collusive means obtained any benefit from the sale of said cargo in consequence of said rescue, then the defendant, Otis, was entitled to a verdict.

It is apparent on the face of this record that this cause in the court below turned upon the construction of the 11th section of the act of Congress of the 25th of April, 1808, ch. 66, and the question for this court to decide is, whether that court erred in the opinion given to the jury upon that statute. The words of the 11th section are, "that the collectors of the customs be and they are hereby respectively authorized to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States whenever, in their opinion, the intention is to violate or evade any of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo, until the decision of the President of the United States be had thereupon."

If this section authorized the collector to seize and detain this vessel and cargo under the circumstances in the case as detailed in this record, then the opinion of the court below was erroneous. If it gave no such authority, then it was clearly right.

The power of the collector to detain is confined to a vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States. Can a vessel which has actually arrived at her port of discharge, and has received from the collector of the port a permit to land her cargo, be considered as a vessel ostensibly bound to some other port of the United States? We think not. The reason for authorizing the detention of a vessel before she has arrived at her port of discharge does not apply to one which has actually performed her voyage according to the stipulations of the bond given by the owner at the port of her departure. All rational ground of suspicion of an intended violation of the embargo laws is *then done away; for if [*596] such an intention at any time existed, it would be difficult to assign to the master or owner a motive for postponing the execution of it until after the arrival of the vessel at her port of discharge. It is, therefore, scarcely to be conceived that such a case was in the contemplation of the legislature.

It is true that this vessel had not arrived at Yarmouth, where her cargo was to be landed, at the time of the seizure. But it is sufficient, in the opinion of the court, that she had arrived at the port to which she was destined, and had received a permit to land. The voyage was as much at an end in relation to the question as if she had arrived within 100 yards of the wharf at Yarmouth. It is, therefore, the unanimous opinion of this court that there is no error in the opinion of the court below on the construction given by that court of the above statute.

Other exceptions were taken, in the course of the trial of this cause, to the opinion of the court below on rejecting certain evidence offered by the appellant. But this court has no authority, under the law which authorizes this appeal, to notice any error, except such as appears on the face of the record and immediately respects the questions of validity of the constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.

The opinions of the court below, in relation to the evidence offered by the appellant, even if erroneous, which we neither affirm nor deny, have nothing to do with the construction of any statute of the United States; and therefore they cannot be regarded by this court.

Judgment affirmed.

THORNTON v. CARSON.

An award is not void because it is in the alternative, and contingent, nor because one of the alternatives requires the party to do an act in conjunction with others, not parties to the award, and over whom he has no control.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington.

597*] *Two actions of debt, commenced at law by Carson against Thornton, upon two bonds for the payment of money, were referred, by consent under a rule of court, to arbitrators, who awarded that the first action should "be "marked and considered settled; and that the "other also should be marked and considered "settled, provided, that the defendant, Thorn-"ton, in conjunction with the trustees of the "gold mine company of North Carolina, should "convey and secure by a deed and assurance "legally executed, with proper and usual cov-"enants, unto John K. Carson, his heirs and "assigns, for the benefit of the said John and "the heirs of Thomas Carson, deceased, on or "before the first day of January, 1811, one "eleventh part of all the minerals and mines "that might thereafter be found upon a tract of "land, in the county of Montgomery, and state "of North Carolina, which by deeds bearing "date the 5th of December, 1805, was conveyed "by the said John K. Carson to the said Will-"iam Thornton and by the said William "Thornton, to the said trustees of the gold mine "company; and that if such conveyance and "assurance should not be made on or before "the said 1st of January, 1811," then in the first suit judgment should be entered up by the court for the plaintiff (Carson), for the penalty of the bond, to be released on the payment of a certain sum expressed on the award, and also in the second suit, judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for the penalty of the bond to be released on the payment of another sum also expressed in the award; and that upon receiving such conveyance and assurance, Carson should convey to Thornton five shares in the gold mine company, of North Carolina, which Carson had subscribed for on the 1st of April, 1806.

Exceptions were taken to this award. 1st. Because it is not final. 2d. Because it is uncertain. 3d. Because it is unreasonable. 4th. Because it is contingent and conditional. 5th. Because it is against law, and 6th. Because it is no award.

But the court below overruled the exceptions and rendered judgment for the amount of the money mentioned in the award.

*The defendant, Thornton, brought [*598 his writ of error, and his counsel insisted upon the following errors:

1. That the award was not final or certain, because its final determination depends on a contingency, and would be an award in favor of the plaintiff in one event, and in favor of the defendant in another. It was also uncertain, because there was no way of ascertaining whether the act to be done by the plaintiff in error, and the other persons, was or was not done; nor whether the conveyances were made as directed; nor whether they were "proper and sufficient;" nor how, nor by whom the entry was to be made in the suit; and the arbitrators could neither reserve this to be determined by themselves, nor leave it to be done by others.

It was also uncertain, because it is not stated when the entry ("settled") was to be made in the suit in the one event, nor the judgment for the plaintiff in the other.

2. The award was bad because it required the plaintiff in error to do what was manifestly out of his power, viz., to get other persons to join him in executing a deed, which, if not impossible, was at least unreasonable.

It was also unreasonable, because it required a deed to be made by the plaintiff in error, who is stated to have no title nor interest in the thing to be conveyed; and because it only required that the deed should be made; not that it should be delivered; so that the same would not have been binding upon the defendant in error; and therefore the award being uncertain, unreasonable and inconclusive as to one party, was to be so considered as to both. And

3. That the award was repugnant and void, being at first in favor of the plaintiff in error, and determining that the suit should be entered "settled," and afterwards awarding that a judgment should be entered for the defendant in error, upon a certain contingency.

The case was submitted without argument, Morsell, *for the defendant in error, [*599 having cited Kyd on awards, 137, and 12 Mod. 586, Lee v. Atkins.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Under a rule which was served upon the plaintiff in error to show cause, during the term at which the rule was made, why judgment should not be entered on the award, he appeared and assigned for cause, that the said award was uncertain, not final, unreasonable, conditional and void.

These objections are strictly technical, and referable solely to defects supposed to appear on the face of the award, and do not aim to impeach it for any one of the causes which the law of Maryland, passed in October, 1778 (ch. 21), declares to be sufficient for setting aside an award.

This court, not meaning to decide whether any and what other objections than those stated in the statute of Maryland may be alleged against entering judgment upon awards made under orders of reference, will proceed to consider those which were stated in this case.

It is contended that this award is not final or certain, because it depends on a contingency, and will be an award in favor of the plaintiff in one event, and in favor of the defendant in another. This court does not so understand the effect of this award. It is clearly in favor of the defendant in error, in either event contemplated by the referees. The plaintiff is required, in conjunction with certain other persons, to convey to the defendant, for the benefit of himself and the heirs of Thomas Carson, on or before a fixed day, certain property specified in the award, or to pay the amount of the two bonds in suit. If he made the conveyance, then the referees have awarded certain property to the defendant; and if he failed to do this, judgment was to be entered against him for the amount of those bonds. The defendant had his 600] election to do either; and upon *satisfying the court, at the time he was required to show cause why judgment should not be entered on the award, that he had made such a conveyance as the award prescribed, the court ought to have ordered the suits to have been entered "settled."

If the plaintiff had made the conveyance, and the defendant, who, upon that act being done, was required by the award to transfer five shares in the gold mine company of North Carolina, to the plaintiff, had failed to do so, the court ought to have ordered the suits to be entered "settled." But the plaintiff, having failed to perform the act, upon which alone this transfer was to be made and the suits were to be entered "settled," became liable to pay the sums awarded by the referees as the equivalent for the property to be conveyed, and consequently the court was right in entering the judgment for the sums awarded.

There is no uncertainty in all this; or at least none which might not be rendered certain by the act of the plaintiff in conformity with the award, and which must not necessarily be certain at the time the court was to render judgment on the award.

The plain meaning of the award is that the plaintiff was to pay the amount of the bonds in suit, unless, by a certain day, he made a conveyance to the defendant of the property described in the award, in which latter event he was to receive from the defendant a transfer of five shares in the gold mine company, and to be discharged from the payment of the money, by an entry to that effect to be made in the suits referred. But if he refused to make the conveyance, then judgment to be entered against him for the amount of the bonds in suit. If he entitled himself to this entry in his favor, by performing the other branch of the alternative, and the defendant failed to perform his part of the award, then the defendant could receive no benefit from the award, and the suits were to be entered "settled." Whether the conveyance from the plaintiff, and the transfer by the defendant, were made in due form, were questions proper for the consideration of the court.

The award is said to be uncertain, because the names *of the trustees who are to [601 join in the conveyance, and of the heirs of Thomas Carson, are not stated, nor does the award declare who is to prepare and tender the deed. These, too, were questions proper for the consideration of the court below, but form no objections to the award. It does not appear from the record that the defendant had refused or failed to do every thing which the law required him to perform to entitle him to the judgment of the court, and we must therefore presume that no delinquency on his part was shown by the plaintiff; that if it was necessary for him to prepare and tender the deed such as the law required, he did so to the satisfaction of the court. If he failed to do that which would warrant the court in entering judgment on the award, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have shown this as cause against entering the judgment, and to have spread all the facts upon the record, which might enable this court to decide whether the court below acted correctly or not.

The award is said to be unreasonable because it requires the plaintiff to get other persons to join in the conveyance to the defendant, which he may not be able to do. But surely if the plaintiff was bound to pay the bonds in suit, or to convey a good title to certain property, which title would not be valid in the opinion of the referees unless other persons joined in the conveyance, he cannot surely complain that he is ordered to pay the money, unless he executes such a deed as will pass a good title. It is his misfortune if he cannot make the title, but it is no reason why in that event he should not pay the money.

There are other causes assigned why the award is unreasonable; but as the facts to prove it unreasonable do not appear in the record, they cannot be noticed by the court, even if such objections would, in law, be sufficient to set aside the award.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

*WALLEN v. WILLIAMS. [*602

Absent—LIVINGSTON, TODD, and STORY, J. J.

The Circuit Court of Tennessee, as a court of equity, cannot award a writ of hab. facias possessionem to enforce its decree.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee, in a suit in equity, in which Joseph Williams on the 15th of November, 1799, brought his bill of complaint against Elisha Wallen and John Williams, whereby he stated that the defendants and others in the year 1779 entered into a copartnership in the entering of lands in the land office for the sale of lands in that part of the state of North Carolina which now lies within the District of East Tennessee; and that each party was, on demand, to pay his proportion of the money due to the state upon the entries, to the party who should advance it: and that if any party so failed to pay his proportion, he should forfeit his share of the lands entered, and should cease to be a partner. That Joseph Williams, the complainant, paid the whole of the money due to the state for the lands entered, and that John Williams, one of the defendants, not having paid any thing, sold his share of the lands to the other defendant, Wallen, who had notice that nothing had been paid by John Williams. Wallen obtained patents, upon this assignment of John Williams, for two tracts of 640 acres each, and one for 440. The latter tract of 440 acres he sold to a purchaser without notice; but he still held the other two tracts. That the complainant had demanded from Wallen payment of John Williams's proportion of the money due to the state, which Wallen refused to pay. The defendant in his answer relied in part on the statute of limitations.

The facts being proved to the satisfaction of the judge, he decreed that "the said Elisha "Wallen be devested of all the right, title, in- "terest, property and claim which he had, or "has, to the said two tracts of 640 acres, and "each of them, and that all the right, title, in- "terest, property and claim of, in and to said "two tracts of land and each of them, and "every part and parcel thereof, be vested in "the said complainant, Joseph Williams, his 603] "heirs and assigns forever, to *have, "hold, occupy, possess and enjoy the same and "each and every part thereof, with their here- "ditaments and appurtenances, against the said "Elisha Wallen, his heirs and assigns forever." And it was further decreed that the defendant, Wallen, should pay to the complainant the sum of $593.33 1-3, the value of the tract of 440 acres as found by the jury which had been impanelled to ascertain its value; and that for the purpose of compelling payment thereof the complainant should have execution, which was accordingly issued and satisfied.

The complainant afterwards obtained a writ of hab. facias, grounded upon the affidavit of the marshal that the defendant refused to deliver possession to the complainant according to the decree.

By virtue of this writ the complainant was put into possession of the two tracts of 640 acres each; and the defendant, Wallen, brought his writ of error.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error,

Moved the court to direct the court below to quash the writ of hab. facias and to award a writ of restitution; upon the ground, as it is understood, that the court below, as a court of equity, could not award such a writ.

He cited 5 Com. Dig, Tit. Pleader; 3 B., 20, and 9 Vin. ab., 478; (8 vo. Ed.) Tit. Error, F. pl., 3.

There was no appearance for the defendant in error.

The court made the order agreeably to the motion.

FAIRFAX'S DEVISEE
v.
HUNTER'S LESSEE.

Absent—MARSHALL, Ch. J., and WASHINGTON, J.

Lord Fairfax, at the time of his death, had the absolute property, seizin and possession of the waste and unappropriated lands in the Northern Neck of Virginia.

An alien enemy may take lands in Virginia by devise, and hold the same until office found. The commonwealth of Virginia could not grant the unappropriated lands in the Northern Neck until its title should have been perfected by possession; and the British treaty of 1794 confirmed the title to those lands in the devisee of Lord Fairfax.

THIS was a writ of error to the Court of Appeals of Virginia in an action of ejectment involving the *construction of the treat- [604 ies between Great Britain and the United States, the judgment of the Court of Appeals being against the right claimed under those treaties.

The state of the facts, as settled by the case agreed, was as follows:

1. The title of the late Lord Fairfax to all that entire territory and tract of land, called the Northern Neck of Virginia, the nature of his estate in the same as he inherited it, and the purport of the several charters and grants from the Kings Charles II. and James II., under which his ancestor held, are agreed to be truly recited in an act of the assembly of Virginia, passed in the year 1736 (vide Rev. Code, v. 1, ch. 3, p. 5), "for the confirming and better securing the titles to lands in the Northern Neck, held under the right honorable Thomas Lord Fairfax," &c.

From the recitals of the act, it appears that the first letters patent (1 Car. 2.) granting the land in question to Ralph Lord Hopton and others, being surrendered in order to have the grant renewed with alterations, the Earl of St. Albans and others (partly survivors of, and partly purchasers under the first patentees) obtained new letters patent (2d Car., 2.) for the same land and appurtenances, and by the same description, but with additional privileges and reservations, &c.

The estate granted is described to be, "All that entire tract, territory or parcel of land, situate, &c., and bounded by, and within the heads of the rivers Tappahannock, &c., together with the rivers themselves, and all the islands, &c., and all woods, underwoods, timber, &c., mines of gold and silver, lead, tin, &c., and quarries of stone and coal, &c., to have, hold, and enjoy the said tract of land, &c., to the said patentees, their heirs and assigns forever, to their only use and behoof, and to no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever."

There is reserved to the crown, the annual rent of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* "in lieu of all services and demands whatsoever;" also one-fifth part of all gold, and one-tenth part of all silver mines.

*To the absolute title and seizin in [605 fee, of the land and its appurtenances, and the beneficial use and enjoyment of the same, assured to the patentees, as tenants in capite, by the most direct and abundant terms of conveyancing, there are superadded, certain collateral powers of baronial dominion; reserving, however, to the governor, council and assembly of Virginia, the exclusive authority in all the military concerns of the granted territory, and the power to impose taxes on the persons and property of its inhabitants for the public and common defense of the colony, as well as a general jurisdiction over the patentees, their heirs and assigns, and all other inhabitants of the said territory.

In the enumeration of privileges specifically granted to the patentees, their heirs and assigns, is, "freely and without molestation of the king, to give, grant, or by any ways or means, sell or alien all and singular the granted premises, and every part and parcel thereof, to any person or persons being willing to contract for or buy the same."

There is also a condition to avoid the grant, as to so much of the granted premises as should not be possessed, inhabited or planted by the means or procurement of the patentees, their heirs or assigns, in the space of 21 years.

The third and last of the letters patent referred to (4 Jac. 2), after reciting a sale and conveyance of the granted premises by the former patentees to Thomas Lord Culpeper, "who was thereby become sole owner and proprietor thereof in fee-simple," proceeds to confirm the same to Lord Culpeper, in fee-simple, and to release him from the said condition of having the lands inhabited or planted as aforesaid.

The said act of assembly then recites, that Thomas Lord Fairfax, heir at law of Lord Culpeper, had become "sole proprietor of the said territory, with the appurtenances, and the above recited letters patent."

By another act of assembly, passed in the year 1748 (Rev. Code, v. 1, ch. 4. p. 10), certain grants from the crown, made while the exact 606*] boundaries of the Northern *Neck were doubtful, for lands which proved to be within those boundaries, as then recently settled and determined, were, with the express consent of Lord Fairfax, confirmed to the grantees; to be held, nevertheless of him, and all the rents, services, profits and emoluments (reserved by such grants) to be paid and performed to him.

In another act of assembly, passed May, 1779, for establishing a land-office, and ascertaining the terms and manner of granting waste and unappropriated lands, there is the following clause, viz: (vide Chy. Rev. of 1783, ch. 13, s. 6, p. 98), "And that the proprietors of land within this commonwealth may no longer be subject to any servile, feudal or precarious tenure; and to prevent the danger to a free state from perpetual revenue; Be it enacted, That the royal mines, quit rents, and all other reservations and conditions in the patents or grants of land from the crown of England, under the former government, shall be, and are hereby declared null and void; and that all lands thereby respectively granted, shall be held in absolute and unconditional property, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, in the same manner with the lands hereafter to be granted by the commonwealth, by virtue of this act."

2d. As respects the actual exercise of his proprietary rights by Lord Fairfax.

It is agreed that he did, in the year 1748, open and conduct, at his own expense, an office within the Northern Neck, for granting and conveying what he described and called the waste and ungranted lands therein, upon certain terms, and according to certain rules by him established and published; that he did, from time to time, grant parcels of such lands in fee (the deeds being registered at his said office, in books kept for that purpose, by his own clerks and agents); that according to the uniform tenor of such grants, he did, styling himself proprietor of the Northern Neck, &c., in consideration of a certain composition to him paid, and of certain annual rents therein reserved, grant, &c.; with a clause of re-entry for non-payment of the rent, &c.; that he also demised, for lives and terms of years, *parcels of the same [607 description of lands, also reserving annual rents; that he kept his said office open for the purposes aforesaid, from the year 1748 till his death in December, 1781; during the whole of which period, and before, he exercised the right of granting, in fee, and demising for lives and terms of years as aforesaid; and received and enjoyed the rents annually, as they accrued, as well under the grants in fee as under the leases for lives and years. It is also agreed that Lord Fairfax died seized of lands in the Northern Neck, equal to about 300,000 acres, which had been granted by him in fee to one T. B. Martin, upon the same terms and conditions, and in the same form, as the other grants in fee before described; which lands were, soon after being so granted, reconveyed to Lord Fairfax in fee.

3d. Lord Fairfax being a citizen and inhabitant of Virginia, died in the month of December, 1781; and by his last will and testament, duly made and published, devised the whole of his lands, &c., called or known by the name of the Northern Neck of Virginia, in fee to Denny Fairfax (the original defendant in ejectment) by the name and description of the Reverend Denny Martin, &c., upon condition of his taking the name and arms of Fairfax, &c., and it is admitted that he fully complied with the conditions of the devise.

4th. It is agreed that Denny Fairfax, the devisee, was a native born British subject, and never became a citizen of the United States, nor any one of them; but always resided in England; as well during the revolutionary war as from his birth about the year 1750, to his death, which happened some time between the years 1796 and 1803, as appears from the record of the proceedings in the Court of Appeals.

It is also admitted that Lord Fairfax left, at his death, a nephew named Thomas Bryan Martin, who was always a citizens of Virginia, being the younger brother of the said devisee, and the second son of a sister of the said Lord Fairfax; which sister was still living, and had always been a British subject.

5th. The land demanded by this ejectment, being *agreed to be part and parcel of [608 the said territory and tract of land called the Northern Neck, and to be a part of that description of lands, within the Northern Neck, called and described by Lork Fairfax as "waste and ungranted;" and being also agreed never to have been escheated and seized into the hands of the commonwealth of Virginia, pursuant to certain acts of assembly concerning escheators, and never to have been the subject of any inquest of office, was contained and included in a certain patent, bearing date the 30th April, 1789, under the hand of the then governor, and the seal of the commonwealth of Virginia, purporting that the land in question is granted by the said commonwealth unto David Hunter (the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment) and his heirs forever, by virtue and in consideration of a land-office treasury warrant, issued the 23d January, 1788. The said lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment is, and always has been, a citizen of Virginia; and in pursuance of his said patent entered into the land in question, and was thereof possessed, prior to the institution of the said action of ejectment.

6th. The definitive treaty of peace concluded in the year 1783, between the United States of America and Great Britain, and also the several acts of the assembly of Virginia, concerning the premises, are referred to as making a part of the case agreed.

Treaties and acts of Assembly referred to.

Provisional articles of peace between Great Britain and the United States, concluded 30th November, 1782, (Art. 5 and 6.)

Definitive treaty of peace between the same powers, concluded 3d September, 1783 (art. 5 and 6).

Treaty of amity, &c., between the same powers, concluded 19th November, 1794 (art. 9.),

"An act respecting future confiscations." (Oct. 1783.)

"Whereas, it is stipulated, by the sixth article of the treaty of peace between the United States and the King of Great Britain, that there 609] shall be no future confiscations *made; Be it enacted, That no future confiscations shall be made, any law to the contrary notwithstanding; provided, that this act shall not extend to any suit, depending in any court, which was commenced prior to the ratification of the treaty of peace."

"An act declaring who shall be deemed citizens of this commonwealth." (May, 1779, ch. 55. Repealed.)

"An act for sequestering British property," &c. (Oct., 1777, ch. 9, vid. Chy. Rev., p. 64.) All the property and estate whatsoever of British subjects is, by this act, sequestered into the hands of commissioners of sequestration, by them to be preserved, according to certain regulations, for the purpose of being restored or otherwise dealt with, according as the King of Great Britain should act towards the property of citizens of the commonwealth, in the like circumstances. The preamble declaring that inasmuch as the British sovereign was not yet known to have set the example of confiscation, "the public faith and the law and usages of nations," required the like forbearance on our part.

"An act concerning escheats and forfeitures from British subjects." (May, 1779, ch. 14, vid. Chy. Rev., p. 98). After reciting the former act, and that it had been found that the property, so sequestered, was liable to be wasted, &c., and that from the advanced price at which it would then sell, it would be most for the benefit of the former owners, in the event of its being thereafter restored, or of the public, if not so restored, that the sale should take place immediately, &c., repeals so much of the former act as was supposed to have suspended the operation of the laws of escheat and forfeiture, and then declares that all the property, real and personal within the commonwealth, belonging, at the time of passing the act, to any British subject, "shall be deemed to be vested in the commonwealth; the lands, slaves and other real estate by way of escheat, and the personal estate by forfeiture." The proceedings on inquests of office, for the purposes of escheat under this act, are prescribed. The duties of escheator are directed to be performed, in the Northern Neck, by the sheriffs of counties. Section 3 declares who shall be deemed British subjects within the meaning of the act. *"First. All persons, subjects of His [610 Britannic Majesty, who, on the 19th April, 1775, when hostilities commenced at Lexington, between the United States of America and the other parts of the British empire, were resident or following their vocations in any part of the world, other than the said United States, and have not since either entered into public employment of the said states, or joined the same, and by overt act adhered to them." &c., &c.

An act to amend the foregoing (Oct., 1779, ch. 18, id. p. 110), directs the modes of proceeding in inquests of office, traverse of office and monstrans de droit, as well by British subjects as others.

"An act concerning escheators" (May, 1779, ch. 45, id. p. 106; Oct., 1785, ch. 63, p. 52, vid Rev. Code, v. 1, p. 126), directs the appointment of an escheator for every county, except the counties in the Northern Neck; his qualification, duties, &c., proceedings on inquest of office, traverse and monstrans de droit, &c., &c., prohibits the granting of any lands, seized into the hands of the commonwealth upon office found, till the lapse of twelve months after the return of the inquisition and verdict into the office of the general court; if no claim be made within that period, or being made shall be found and discussed for the commonwealth, the clerk of the general court is, within two months thereafter, to certify the fact to the proper escheator, who is, thereupon, to proceed to sell.

"An act to extend the operation of the foregoing act, to the counties of the Northern Neck." (1785, ch. 53, p. 37).

"An act to amend and reduce into one, the several acts for ascertaining certain taxes, establishing a permanent revenue," &c. (Oct., 1782, ch. 8, sec. 24—vide Chy. Rev. p. 176), sequesters, in the hands of persons holding lands in the Northern Neck, all quit rents then due, until the right of descent shall be more fully ascertained, and the general assembly shall make final provision thereon; and all quit rents thereafter to become due shall be paid into the public treasury, under the operation of the laws of that session; for which quit rents *the inhabitants of the Northern Neck [611 shall be exonerated from the future claim of the proprietor.

"An act concerning surveyors," (Oct., 1782, ch. 33, sec. 3—vide id. p. 180), recites that the death of Lord Fairfax may occasion great inconvenience to those inclined to make entries for vacant lands in the Northern Neck; provides that all entries made with the surveyors of the counties in the Northern Neck, and returned to the office formerly kept by Lord Fairfax, shall be deemed as good and valid in law as those made under his direction, until some mode shall be taken up and adopted by the general assembly, concerning the territory of the Northern Neck.

"An act for safe keeping the land-papers of the Northern Neck," (October, 1785, ch. 63, p. 36,) reciting that it was customary to keep the records, &c., of lands within the Northern Neck in the office of the late proprietor, and that it was necessary that the records on which the titles to lands depended should be all kept in one office; provides for the removal of the same into the register's office, &c.

Also, provides for issuing grants for surveys, under entries made in the life of the proprietor, and under entries made with surveyors, pursuant to the act last above recited; declaring them to be cases till then unprovided for.

Sec. 5. Subjects the unappropriated lands, within the district of the Northern Neck, to the same regulations, and to be granted in the same manner, as is by law directed in cases of other unappropriated lands belonging to the commonwealth.

Sec. 6. Forever thereafter exonerates land holders within the said district from composition and quit rents.

"An act declaring who shall be deemed citizens of this commonwealth." (May, 1779, ch. 55. Repealed.)

"An act declaring tenants of lands or slaves in taille, to hold the same in fee-simple." (May, 1776, ch. 26, vide Chy. Rev., p. 45.)

612*] *An act to amend the foregoing. (October, 1783, ch. 27, vide id., p. 204.) Lands or slaves, which by virtue of the former act have or shall become escheatable to the commonwealth, for defect of blood, shall descend, and be deemed to have descended, agreeable to the limitations of the deed or will creating such estates: Provided, this act shall not extend to any lands or slaves escheated and sold for the use of the commonwealth.

C. Lee and Jones, on the part of the plaintiff in error, contended,

1st. That Lord Fairfax was, at his death, seized of an absolute and unconditional estate of inheritance in the whole of that description of land, within the boundaries of his letters patent, designated by him as "waste and ungranted;" that is to say, in all the lands within those boundaries, except such as had been parcelled out into tenements, and granted in fee, by himself or his ancestors, or predecessors, or by his or their consent or authority; and that he was in the actual seizin and possession of the soil, with the like title to the immediate pernancy and fruition of the profits, and under the like sanctions, as ordinary proprietors in fee, under grants derived from the crown prior to the revolution.

2d. That the estate, by virtue of the will of Lord Fairfax, vested in Denny Fairfax, the devisee, and has never been divested out of him by office found and seizure, nor by any equivalent mode of confiscation whatsoever; and that the treaty of peace found him seized of the estate unaltered from the condition in which it was originally taken under the devise.

3d. That the treaty of peace prohibited the confiscation of the estate, whether by inquest of office, or by any other mode whatsoever; and so operated a release and confirmation to the British proprietor, whose title was again explicitly acknowledged and confirmed by the treaty of 1794; which completely removed every incapacity and disability that might possibly be supposed to remain in him, as a landed proprietor.

4th. That the patent, under which the defendant in error claims the land in question, was not authorized by any *pre-existing [613 law of Virginia, but was in direct contravention of the treaty of peace, and of the statute of Virginia, enacted expressly in execution of the treaty, and strictly enjoining the observance of its stipulations with good faith: and, therefore, the said patent conveys no title to the defendant in error.

1. Upon the first point they relied upon the express words of the grant, from the crown to the original patentees, and the following cases: (2 Wash., 113, Picket v. Dowdall; Id. 120, Johnson v. Buffington; Id. 125, Curry v. Burns; 1 Wash., 34, Birch v. Alexander; and 2 Dall., 99, M'Curdy v. Potts.)

The estate, by the devise, vested in Denny Fairfax, who continued to hold the same till the treaty of peace. Although an alien enemy, he could take and hold until office found. The law is perfectly settled that an alien can take by purchase, although he cannot take by descent. In this respect there is no difference between an alien enemy and an alien friend. He took a fee-simple subject to the right of the sovereign to seize it. (Co. Lit., 2 [b.]; 5 Co., 52, Page's case; 9 Co., 141, [a.]; 2 Bl. Com., 293; Powell on dev., 316; 2 Vent., 270.)

It is essential to the plaintiff's title that the estate should have vested in Denny Fairfax, for if it did not, it could not escheat to the commonwealth under whom the plaintiff claims.

It is one of the principles of the common law, upon which the security of private property from the grasp of power depends, that the crown can take only by matter of record. (3 Bl. Com., 259.) Those authorities which say an alien may take, but cannot hold, clearly mean that he cannot hold against the claim of the crown asserted in a legal manner. (Co. Lit., 2, a & b.) An alien may suffer a common recovery. (Goldsb., 102; 4 Leon, 82; Bro. tit. Denizen and Alien, 17.) And it is expressly laid down that only the tenant of the freehold can suffer a common recovery. (3 Bl. Com., 356–7.) But he could not be tenant of the freehold unless the estate vested and remained in him. (1 Bac. ab., 133.) The case of an alien purchasing and being afterwards made a *denizen is very [614 strong, for in that case, although the lands be forfeitable they descend. This could not be if the estate did not remain in the alien from the time of his purchase till his becoming a denizen. It is also laid down that if an alien and a subject purchase jointly, the estate will survive upon the death of the alien, unless office be found, consequently the estate remained in the alien until his death. It is expressly decided in Page's case (5 Co., 52), that until office found, nothing vests in the king. (Nichol's case, 2 Plowden, 481, 486; 2 Vez., 539, Duplessis's case; 4 Co., 58, Sadler's case.)

In this case no office was found, nor any equivalent act done to vest the estate in the commonwealth before the treaty of peace of 1783. The only act on the subject passed in 1782. (Ch. 33, sec. 3; Chancery revisal, 180.) This manifests no intention to confiscate. On the contrary by making the entries for lands in the Northern Neck returnable to the former office of Lord Fairfax, the legislature show a disposition not to molest his title.

The treaty of peace then found the freehold of the land in Denny Fairfax.

3. That treaty released the forfeiture and no subsequent act of the legislature could affect the title.

The 5th article engages that Congress shall earnestly recommend the restoration of confiscated estates; and the 6th article stipulates that "no further confiscation shall be made."

The term "confiscation" embraces every case of the money or estate of an individual, brought into the treasury in virtue of any forfeiture; and in this sense it is generally used in treaties. (Cowell Tit. confiscation, 1 W. Bl., 183; 3 Dall., 234; 1 Bl. Com., 299.)

Lands acquired by an alien, are, on that account, liable to forfeiture. (1 Bl. Com., 372; 2 Bl. Com., 274.) Escheat is one mode of confiscation. Confiscation law of Virginia, 1779. (2 Bl. Com., 243, 244, 252, 272, 293.)

The 5th article of the treaty illustrates the 6th. Why should Congress recommend the 615] restoration of confiscated *estates belonging to real British subjects, if they were to be immediately taken back upon the plea of alienage? If an estate had been thus restored to a British subject under the 5th article, the 6th would have protected him in the enjoyment of it, or the 5th would have been wholly nugatory. There was no provision, in the treaty, to protect restored estates, but the prohibition of future confiscations contained in the 6th article. If in one case the term confiscation in that article meant confiscation by reason of that alienage which was the consequence of the part taken in the war, why not give it the same meaning in all cases of alienage arising from the same cause? Denny Fairfax became an alien by reason of the part he took in the war. He chose to take part with Great Britain, and thereby became an alien, whereby his land became liable to confiscation according to the laws of Virginia. Whether the confiscation was to be mediately or immediately the consequence of the part taken in the war, was immaterial. It would have been a "future confiscation by reason of the part taken by him in the war." Any subsequent act of confiscation therefore by the state of Virginia, would have been void as being contrary to the express stipulation of the treaty. (Thomas Parker's Rep., 267, 161, Co. Lit., 2 [b], Hargrave's note, 4.)

The treaty of 1794 is merely declaratory of the effect of the treaty of peace. It makes no new provision.

Harper, contra.

1. As to the nature of Lord Fairfax's title to the waste and unappropriated lands.

This title was not that of a common subject. It was a grant by the crown, of the same right to dispose of the lands which the sovereign had. It was a right to grant the lands to individuals, and to receive the services and quitrents due therefor. It was not contemplated that he himself should occupy the lands. It was a mere delegation of a part of the sovereign power, and so far as it was not executed by him, it passed with the other rights of sovereignty to the commonwealth of Virginia, at the time of the revolution.

*This was the construction put upon [616 it by Lord Fairfax himself—for when he intended to appropriate any part of the lands to his own use, he granted it to a third person, and then took back the title from his own grantee. His deeds were not in the common form, but were made to resemble those of the crown.

The defendants in error still contend that there is a difference between an alien friend and an alien enemy, as to the right to hold lands. In the latter case an office is not necessary. The right and possession are both thrown upon the commonwealth.

3. But the principal question is, what effect had the treaty of peace upon this devise?

It is said that the provision, that no future confiscations should be made, removes the disability of alienage.

The title of the commonwealth of Virginia was complete before the treaty of peace. Nothing more was necessary than to pursue the legal proceedings to put the state into possession. The office is no part of the title. This was complete at the death of Lord Fairfax. It vested eo instanti in the commonwealth. If it passed to Denny Fairfax, it was to the use of the commonwealth. But if any title vested in Denny Fairfax, what kind of title was it? It could not descend from him. Upon his death the right and possession were cast upon the commonwealth. He had no beneficial interest. He was only a trustee of an estate at will. (Co. Lit., 2 [b], Plowd., 229.) An office is only a suit brought by the king to establish his title by proof of the facts upon which his title depends. It is not to give title, but to prove the fact of alienage. The office is the remedy, not the right. It is only the means of gaining possession. Attornment to an alien is an attornment to the use of the king. (Co. Lit., 310), [b.]

An alien cannot sell. (Co. Lit., 42,) [b.] He has nothing but a naked possession. It is said he is a good tenant to the precipe, and may suffer a common recovery; but it is for the use of the king.

The treaty of peace does not protect the title.

*Confiscation does not mean the re- [617 covery of a debt, or of any thing to which the state had a right before; but it is the assumption of a new right. The creation of a right by an act of sovereign power. It is a transfer, not of property, but of the right of property, from individual to public use. But here the right existed before.

If this be not the general meaning of the word "confiscation," it is the meaning of it as used in the treaty. The contracting parties were speaking of the acts of the state governments which were intended as punishments for the part which certain persons had taken in the war. The estates to be restored were not such as had escheated by reason of alienage, but such as had been confiscated on account of the part taken in the war.

If the title was not protected by the treaty, then upon the death of Denny Fairfax it vested completely in the commonwealth. The Fairfax title was extinct. The commonwealth was estopped by its deed from claiming it, so that the title of Hunter was unquestionable.

As to the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, Denny Fairfax could continue to hold only what he then held, and as he then held. If he held any thing, it was, at most, an estate for life, remainder to the commonwealth in fee defeasible, during his life, by office found. Consequently, at his death, the commonwealth had an estate in fee. The treaty of 1794 was intended to protect those only who became aliens by the separation of the two countries, while they held the estates, and not those who were aliens when their estates accrued. If it had intended to protect the latter class, it would have protected estates acquired by descent as well as those acquired by devise: for they are both within the same reason, yet it cannot be said that an alien, who, but for his alienage, would have inherited an estate upon a descent cast before 1794, is benefited by that treaty. It cannot be said that he then held the estate of his ancestor which his alienage had prevented from descending upon him.

March 15th, 1813. The court having taken time since last term to consider this case,

618*] *STORY, J., delivered their opinion as follows, (MARSHALL, Ch. J. and TODD, J., being absent.)

The first question is, whether Lord Fairfax was proprietor of and seized of the soil of the waste and unappropriated lands in the Northern Neck, by virtue of the royal grants (2 Charles, 2 and 4 James 2), or whether he had mere seignioral rights therein as lord paramount, disconnected from all interest in the land, except of sale or alienation.

The royal charter expressly conveys all that entire tract, territory, and parcel of land, situate, &c., together with the rivers, islands, woods, timber, &c., mines, quarries of stone and coal, &c., to the grantees and their heirs and assigns, to their only use and behoof, and to no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever.

It is difficult to conceive terms more explicit than these to vest a title and interest in the soil itself. The land is given, and the exclusive use thereof, and if the union of the title and the exclusive use do not constitute the dominium directum et utile, the complete and absolute dominion in property, it will not be easy to fix on any thing which shall constitute such dominion.

The ground of the objection would seem to have been, that the royal charter had declared that the grantees should hold of the king as tenants in capite, and that it proceeded to declare that the grantees and their heirs and assigns should have power "freely and without "molestation of the king, to give, grant, or by "any ways or means sell or alien all and singu- "lar the granted premises, and every part and "parcel thereof, to any person or persons "being willing to contract for and buy the "same," which words were to be considered as restrictive or explanatory of the preceding words of the charter, and as confining the rights granted to the mere authority to sell or alien.

But it is very clear that this clause imposes no restriction or explanation of the general terms of the grant. As the grantees held as tenants in capite of the king, they could not sell or alien without the royal license, and if they did, it was in ancient strictness an *ab- [619 solute forfeiture of the land (2 Ins., 66); and after the statute 1 Edw. 3 (ch. 12), though the forfeiture did not attach, yet a reasonable fine was to be paid to the king upon the alienation. (2 Ins., 67; Staundf. Prer., 27; 2 Bl. Com., 72.) It was not until ten years after the first charter (12 Ch. 2 ch. 24), that all fines for alienations and tenures of the king in capite were abolished. (2 Bl. Com., 77.) So that the object of this clause was manifestly to give the royal assent to alienations without the claim of any fine therefor.

We are therefore satisfied, that by virtue of the charter and the intermediate grants, Lord Fairfax at the time of his death had the absolute property of the soil of the land in controversy, and the acts of ownership exercised by him over the whole waste and unappropriated lands, as stated in the case, vested in him a complete seizin and possession thereof. Even if there had been no acts of ownership proved, we should have been of opinion, that as there was no adverse possession, and the land was waste and unappropriated, the legal seizin must be, upon principle, considered as passing with the title.

On this point we have the satisfaction to find that our view of the title of Lord Fairfax seems incidentally confirmed by the opinion of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, in Picket v. Dowdell (2 Wash., 106), Johnson v. Buffington (2 Wash., 116), and Curry v. Burns (2 Wash., 121).

The next question is as to the nature and character of the title which Denny Fairfax took by the will of Lord Fairfax, he being, at the time of the death of Lord Fairfax, an alien enemy.

It is clear by the common law, that an alien can take lands by purchase, though not by descent; or in other words he cannot take by the act of law, but he may by the act of the party. This principle has been settled in the year books, and has been uniformly recognized as sound law from that time. (11 Hen., 4, 26; 14 Hen., 4, 20; Co. Litt., 2, b.) Nor is there any distinction, whether the purchase be by grant or by devise. In either case the estate vests in the alien (Pow. Dev., 316, &c.; Park. Rep., *144; Co. Litt., 2 b), not for his own [620 benefit, but for the benefit of the state; or in the language of the ancient law, the alien has the capacity to take but not to hold lands, and they may be seized into the hands of the sovereign. (11 H., 4, 26; 14 H., 4, 20.) But until the lands are so seized, the alien has complete dominion over the same. He is a good tenant of the freehold in a precipe on a common recovery. (4 Leon, 84; Goldsb., 102; 10 Mod., 128.) And may convey the same to a purchaser. (Sheafe v. O'Neile, 1 Mass. Rep., 256.) Though Co. Litt., 52, b, seems to the contrary, yet it must probably mean that he can convey a defeasible estate only, which an office found will devest. It seems indeed to have been held, that an alien cannot maintain a real action for the recovery of lands. (Co. Lit., 129, b; Thel. Dig., ch. 6; Dyer, 2, b.) But it does not then follow that he may not defend, in a real action, his title to the lands against all persons but the sovereign.

We do not find that in respect to these general rights and disabilities, there is any admitted difference between alien friends and alien enemies. During the war, the property of alien enemies is subject to confiscation jure belli, and their civil capacity to sue is suspended. (Dyer, 2, b; Brandon v. Nesbitt, 6 T. R., 23; 3 Bos. & Pull., 113; 5 Rob., 102.) But as to capacity to purchase, no case has been cited in which it has been denied, and in The Attorney-General v. Wheeden & Shales (Park. Rep., 267), it was adjudged that a bequest to an alien enemy was good, and after a peace might be enforced. Indeed the common law in these particulars seems to coincide with the Jus Gentium. (Bynk. Quest. Pub. Jur., ch. 7; Vattel, b. 2, ch. 8, § 112, 114; Grot. lib. 2, ch. 6, § 16.)

It has not been attempted to place the title of Denny Fairfax upon the ground of his being an antenatus, born under a common allegiance before the American revolution, and this has been abandoned upon good reason; for whatever doubts may have been formerly entertained, it is now settled that a British subject born before, cannot, since the revolution, take lands by descent in the United States. (4 Cranch, 321, Dawson's Lessee v. Godfrey.)

But it has been argued, that although D. 621] Fairfax *had capacity to take the land as devisee, yet he took to the use of the commonwealth only, and had therefore but a momentary seizin; that in fact he was but a mere trustee of the estate at the will of the commonwealth, and that by operation of law, immediately upon the death of the testator, Lord Fairfax, the title vested in the commonwealth, and left but a mere naked possession in the devisee.

If we are right in the position, that the capacity of an alien enemy does not differ in this respect from an alien friend, it will not be easy to maintain this argument. It is incontrovertibly settled upon the fullest authority, that the title acquired by an alien by purchase is not divested until office found. The principle is founded upon the ground, that as the freehold is in the alien, and he is tenant to the lord of whom the lands are holden, it cannot be divested out of him but by some notorious act, by which it may appear that the freehold is in another. (1 Bac. Abr. Alien C., p. 133.) Now an office of entitling is necessary to give this notoriety, and fix the title in the sovereign. So it was adjudged in Page's case (5 Co., 22), and has been uniformly recognized. (Park. Rep., 267; Park., 144; Hob., 234; Bro. Denizen, pl. 17; Co. Litt., 2, b.) And the reason of the difference, why, when an alien dies, the sovereign is seized without office found, is because otherwise the freehold would be in abeyance, as an alien can not have any inheritable blood. Nay, even after office found, the king is not adjudged in possession, unless the possession were then vacant; for if the possession were then in another, the king must enter or seize by his officer, before the possession in deed shall be adjudged in him. (14 H., 7, 21; 15 H., 7, 6, 20; Staundf. Prerog. Reg., ch. 18, p. 54; 4 Co., 58, a.) And if we were to yield to the authority of Staundford (Prer. Reg., ch. 18, p. 56), that in the case of alien enemy, the king "ratione guerrae," might seize without office found, yet the same learned authority assures us, "that the king must seize in those cases, ere he can have an interest in the lands, because they be penal towards the party." (4 Co., 58, b.) And until the king be in possession by office found, he cannot grant lands which are forfeited by alienage. (Staundf. Pre. Reg., ch. 18, f, 54; Stat. 18 Hen., 6, ch. 6.)

*To apply these principles to the [622 present case, Denny Fairfax had a complete, though defeasible, title by virtue of the devise, and as the possession was either vacant or not adverse, of course the law united a seizin to his title in the lands in controversy; and this title could only be divested by an inquest of office, perfected by an entry and seizure where the possession was not vacant. And no grant by the commonwealth, according to the common law, could be valid, until the title was, by such means, fixed in the commonwealth. It is admitted that no entry or seizure was made by the commonwealth "ratione guerrae" during the war. It is also admitted, that no inquest of office was ever made pursuant to the acts on this subject at any time. And it would seem therefore to follow, upon common law reasoning, that the grant to the lessor of the original plaintiff, by the public patent of the 30th of April, 1789, issued improvidently and erroneously, and passed nothing. And if this be true, and there be no act of Virginia altering the common law, it is quite immaterial what is the validity of the title of the original defendant as against the commonwealth; for the plaintiff must recover by the strength of his own title, and not by the weakness of that of his adversary.

But it is contended, 1st, That the common law as to inquests of office and seizure, so far as the same respects the lands in controversy, is completely dispensed with by statutes of the commonwealth, so as to make the grant to the original plaintiff in 1789 complete and perfect. And secondly, and further, if it be not so, yet as the devisee died pending the suit, the freehold was thereby cast upon the commonwealth without an inquest, and thus arises a retroactive confirmation of the title of the original plaintiff, of which he may now avail himself. As to the first point we will not say that it was not competent for the legislature (supposing no treaty in the way), by a special act to have vested the land in the commonwealth without an inquest of office for the cause of alienage. But such an effect ought not, upon principles of public policy, to be presumed upon light grounds; that an inquest of office should be made in cases of alienage, is a useful and important restraint upon public proceedings. No part of the United States seems to have been more aware of its importance, or *more cautious to guard against its [623 abolition than the commonwealth of Virginia. It prevents individuals from being harassed by numerous suits introduced by litigious grantees. It enables the owner to contest the question of alienage directly by a traverse of the office. It affords an opportunity for the public to know the nature, the value, and the extent of its acquisitions pro defectu hæredis; and above all it operates as a salutary suppression of that corrupt influence which the avarice of speculation might otherwise urge upon the legislature.

The common law, therefore, ought not to be deemed to be repealed, unless the language of a statute be clear and explicit for this purpose.

Let us now consider the several acts which have been referred to in the argument, from which we think it will abundantly appear that, during the war, the lands in controversy were never, by any public law, vested in the commonwealth. We dismiss, at once, the act of 1777 (ch. 9), and of 1779 (ch. 14), as they are restrained to estates held by British subjects at the times of their respective enactments, and do not extend to estates subsequently acquired.

The next act is that of 1782 (ch. 8, 24th sec.), after reciting that "since the death of the late proprietor of the Northern Neck, there is reason to suppose that the said proprietorship hath descended upon alien enemies," enacts, that persons holding lands in said Neck shall retain sequestered in their hands all quitrents which were then due, until the right of descent should be more fully ascertained; and that all quitrents thereafter to become due shall be paid into the public treasury, and the parties exonerated from the future claim of the proprietor. Admitting that this section, as to the quit rents, was equivalent to an inquest of office, it cannot be extended, by construction, to include the waste lands of the proprietor. Neither the words nor the intention of the legislature would authorize such a construction. But it may well be doubted if, even as to the quitrents, the provision is not to be considered as a sequestration jure belli, rather than a seizure for alienage; for it proceeds on the ground that the property had descended, not upon aliens, but alien enemies. So far as the treaty of peace might be deemed material in the case, this distinction would deserve consideration.

624*] *The next is the act of 1782 (ch. 33), which, after reciting that "the death of Lord Fairfax may occasion great inconvenience to those who may incline to make entries for vacant lands in the Northern Neck, proceeds (sec. 3) to enact, that all entries made with the surveyors, &c., and returned to the office formerly kept by Lord Fairfax, shall be held as good and valid as those heretofore made under his direction, "until some mode shall be taken up and "adopted by the General Assembly concern-"ing the territory of the Northern Neck." This act, so far from containing in itself any provision for vesting all the vacant lands of Lord Fairfax in the commonwealth, expressly reserves, to a future time, all decisions as to the disposal of the territory. It suffers rights and titles to be acquired exactly in the same manner, and with the same conditions, which Lord Fairfax had by permanent regulations prescribed in his office. No other acts were passed on the subject during the war.

We are now led to consider the act of 1785 (ch. 47), which has presented some difficulty, if it stand unaffected by the treaty of peace. The 4th sec., after a recital "that since the death of "the late proprietor no mode hath been adopt-"ed to enable those who had before his death "made entries within the said district accord-"ing to an act, &c. (act 1782, ch. 33), to ob-"tain titles to the same," enacts that in all cases of such entries, grants shall be issued by the commonwealth to the parties in the same manner as by law is directed in cases of other unappropriated lands. The 5th sec. then declares that the unappropriated lands within the Northern Neck should be subject to the same regulations, and be granted in the same manner, and caveats should be proceeded upon, tried and determined, as is by law directed in cases of other unappropriated lands belonging to the commonwealth. The 6th sec. extinguishes for the future all quitrents.

The patent of the original plaintiff issued pursuant to the 5th sec. of this act.

It has been argued, that the act of 1785 amounts to legislative appropriation of all the lands in controversy. That it must be considered as completely devesting the title of Denny Fairfax for the cause of alienage, and *vesting it in the commonwealth. After the most mature reflection, we cannot subscribe to the argument. In acts of sovereignty so highly penal, it is against the ordinary rule to enlarge, by implication and inference, the extent of the language employed. It would be to declare purposes which the legislature have not chosen to avow, and to create vested estates, when the common law would pronounce a contrary sentence, and the guardians of the public interests have not expressed an intention to abrogate that law. If the legislature have proceeded upon the supposition that the lands were already vested in the commonwealth, we do not perceive how it helps the case. If the legislature, upon a mistake of facts, proceed to grant defective titles, we know of no rule of law which requires a court to declare, in penal cases, that to be actually done which ought previously to have been done. Perhaps as to grants under the 4th sec. upon entries under the act of 1782 (ch. 33), it might not be too much to hold, that such grants conveyed no more than the title of the commonwealth, exactly in the same state as the commonwealth itself held it, viz., an inchoate right, to be reduced into possession and consummated by a suit in the nature, or with the effect, of an inquest of office. But we give no opinion on this point; because the patent of the original plaintiff manifestly issued under the succeeding section, and upon a construction which we give to this section, it issued improvidently and passed no title whatever. That construction is, that the unappropriated lands in the Northern Neck should be granted in the same manner as the other lands of the commonwealth, when the title of the commonwealth was perfected by possession. It seems to us difficult to contend, that the legislature meant to grant mere titles and rights of entry, of the commonwealth, to lands in the same manner as it did lands of which the commonweath was in actual possession and seizin. It would be selling suits and controversies through the whole country, and enacting a general statute in favor of maintenance, an offense which the common law has denounced with extraordinary severity. Consistent therefore with the manifest intention of the legislature, grants were to issue for lands in the Northern Neck, precisely in the same manner as for lands in other parts of the state, and under the same *limitation, viz., [*626 that the commonwealth should have, at the time of the grant, a complete title and seizin.

We are the more confirmed in this construction by the act concerning escheators (act 1779, ch. 45), which regulates the manner of proceeding in cases of escheat, and was by a subsequent act (act 1785, ch. 53) expressly extended to the counties in the Northern Neck. This act of 1779 expressly prohibits the granting of any lands, seized into the hands of the commonwealth upon office found, till the lapse of twelve months after the return of the inquisition and verdict into the office of the General Court, and afterwards authorizes the proper escheator to proceed to sell in case no claim should be filed, within that time, and substantiated against the commonwealth. It is apparent, from this act, that it was not the intention of the legislature to dispose of lands, accruing by escheat, in the same manner as lands to which the commonwealth already possessed a perfect title. It has not been denied that the regulations of this act were designed to apply as well to titles accruing upon purchases by aliens (which are not in strictness, escheats), as upon forfeitures for other causes; and, but for the act of 1785 (ch. 47), we do not perceive but that the vacant lands held by the devisee of Lord Fairfax, in the Northern Neck, would have been completely within the act regulating proceedings upon escheats.

The real fact appears to have been, that the legislature supposed that the commonwealth were in actual seizin and possession of the vacant lands of Lord Fairfax, either upon the principle that an alien enemy could not take by devise, or the belief that the acts of 1782 (ch. 8, and ch. 33), had already vested the property in the commonwealth. In either case it was a mistake which surely ought not to be pressed to the injury of third persons.

But if the construction which we have suggested be incorrect, we think that, at all events, the title of Hunter, under the grant of 1789, cannot be considered as more extensive than the title of the commonwealth, viz., a title inchoate and imperfect; to be consummated by an actual entry under an inquest of office, or its equivalent, a suit and judgment at law by the grantee.

627*] *This view of the acts of Virginia renders it wholly unnecessary to consider a point which has been very elaborately argued at the bar, whether the treaty of peace, which declares "that no future confiscations shall be made," protects from forfeiture, under the municipal laws respecting alienage, estates held by British subjects at the time of the ratification of that treaty. For we are well satisfied that the treaty of 1794 completely protects and confirms the title of Denny Fairfax, even admitting that the treaty of peace left him wholly unprovided for.

The 9th article is in these words: "It is agreed that British subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States, and American citizens who now hold lands in the dominions of his majesty, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein; and may grant, sell or devise the same to whom they please, in like manner as if they were natives, and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns shall, so far as respects the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, be considered as aliens."

Now, we cannot yield to the argument that Denny Fairfax had no title, but a mere naked possession or trust estate. In our judgment, by virtue of the devise to him he held a fee simple in his own right. At the time of the commencement of this suit (in 1791) he was in complete possession and seizin of the land. That possession and seizin continued up to and after the treaty of 1794, which being the supreme law of the land, confirmed the title to him, his heirs and assigns, and protected him from any forfeiture by reason of alienage.

It was once in the power of the commonwealth of Virginia, by an inquest of office or its equivalent, to have vested the estate completely in itself or its grantee. But it has not so done, and its own inchoate title (and of course the derivative title, if any, of its grantee) has by the operation of the treaty become ineffectual and void.

It becomes unnecessary to consider the argument as to the effect of the death of Denny Fairfax pending the *suit, because ad- [628 mitting it to be correctly applied in general, the treaty of 1794 completely avoids it. The heirs of Denny Fairfax were made capable in law to take from him by descent, and the freehold was not, therefore, on his death, cast upon the commonwealth.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia ought to be reversed, and that the judgment of the District Court of Winchester be affirmed with costs, &c.

JOHNSON, J. After the maturest investigation of this case that circumstances would permit me to make, I am obliged to dissent from the opinion of the majority of my brethren.

The material questions are,

1st. Whether an alien can take lands as a devisee, and if he can,

2d. Whether an inquest of office was indispensably necessary to divest him of his interest for the benefit of the state?

3d. Whether the disability of the devisee was not cured by the treaty of peace, or the treaty of 1794.

With regard to the treaty of peace it is very clear to me that that does not affect the case. The words of the 4th article are, "There shall "be no future confiscations made, nor any "prosecution commenced against any person "or persons for or by reason of the part which "he or they may have taken in the present "war."

Now should we admit, as has been strongly insisted, that to escheat is to confiscate, it would still remain to show that this was "a confisca- "tion on account of the part taken by the dev- "isee in the war of the revolution." But the disability of an alien to hold real estate is the result of a general principle of the common law, and was in no wise attached to the individual on account of his conduct in the revolutionary struggle. The alien who had taken part with this country and *fought the bat- [629 tles of the states, may have been affected by it no less than he who fought against us, and the member of any other community in the world may as well have been the object of its application as the subject of Great Britain. The object evidently was to secure the individual from legal punishment—not to cure a legal disability existing in him.

With regard to the bearing of the treaty of 1794 on the interests of the parties, the only difficulty arises from the vague signification of the words "now holding," made use of in the article which relates to this subject. But in conformity with the liberal spirit in which national contracts ought to be construed, I am satisfied to consider that treaty as extending to all cases "of a rightful possession or legal title "defeasible only on the ground of alien dis- "ability and existing at the date of that "treaty."

What then were the rights of the devisee in this case? and were they in existence at the date of this treaty?

Whoever looks into the learning on the capacity of an alien to take lands as devisee, will find it involved in some difficulties. There is no decided case, that I know of, upon the subject. And the opinions of learned men upon it, when compared, will be found to have been expressed with doubt, or scarcely reconcilable to each other. The general rule is, that an alien may take by purchase, but cannot hold. Yet so fragile or flimsy is the right he acquires, that, if tortiously dispossessed, no one contends that he can maintain an action against the evictor. To assert that he has a right, and yet admit that he has no remedy, appears to me rather paradoxical. Yet all admit that the bailiff of the king cannot enter on an alien purchaser until office found. But where a freehold is cast upon the alien by act of law, as by descent, dower, curtesy, &c., it is admitted that no inquest of office is necessary to vest the estate in the king, and he may enter immediately. Whether an alien devisee is to be considered as a purchaser according to the meaning of that term as applied to an alien, or whether his estate is to be considered as one of those which are cast on him by operation of law, is an alternative, either branch of which may be laid 630] hold *of with some confidence. Chief Baron Gilbert asserts, without reservation, that a devise to an alien is void. (Gilbert on devises, p. 15.) But Mr. Powell maintains that he takes under it as a purchaser. (Powell on Dev., 317.) In support of Gilbert's opinion it might be urged that a devise takes effect under statute, and in that view the interest may be said to be cast on the alien by operation of law. Yet I have no hesitation in deciding in favor of the doctrine as laid down by Powell. Not on the words of Lord Hardwick, as quoted from Knight and du Plessis; for the judge there expressly declines giving an opinion; but from a reference to the principle upon which the doctrine is certainly founded.

The only unexceptionable reason that can be assigned why an alien can take by deed, though he cannot hold, is, that otherwise the proprietor would be restricted in his choice of an alienee; or in other words, in his right of alienation. And to declare such a conveyance null and void would be attended with this absurdity, that the estate would still remain in the alienor in opposition to his own will and contract. It would therefore seem that the law on this subject would be more satisfactorily expressed by asserting that an alien is a competent party to a contract, so that a conveyance, executed to him, shall divest the feoffer or donor, in order that it may escheat. The tendency of this doctrine to favor the royal prerogative of escheat, would no doubt secure to it a welcome reception, yet it is not too much to pronounce it reasonable in the abstract. This reason is as applicable to the case of a devise as of a contract, and in the technical application of the term purchaser a devisee is included. But it is contended that the grant to Lord Fairfax was a grant or cession of sovereign power, and as such was assumed by the state when it declared itself independent. Upon considering, as well the acts of the state, with regard to this property, as the acts of Lord Fairfax himself, there is reason to think that both acted under this impression. But to decide on this question, we must look into the deed of session, and upon its construction the decision of this court must depend. And here, in every part of it, we find it divested of the chief attributes of sovereignty —not a power legislative, judicial or executive given, and the words such as are adapted to convey an interest, *but no jurisdic- [631 tion. Some few royal prerogatives, it is true, are expressly conveyed, and these unquestionably must have accrued to the state upon the assertion of independence. But the interest in the soil remained to the grantee. So far, therefore, I feel no difficulty about sustaining the claim of the devisee. But did this interest remain in him at the time of the treaty of 1794?

I am of opinion it did not. The interest acquired under the devise was a mere scintilla juris, and that scintilla was extinguished by the grant of the state vesting this tract in the plaintiff in error. I will not say what would have been the effect of a more general grant. But this grant emanated under a law expressly relating to the lands of Lord Fairfax authorizing them to be entered, surveyed and granted.

The only objection that can be set up to the validity of this grant is, that it was not preceded by an inquest of office. And the question then will be, whether it was not competent for the state to assert its rights over the alien's property, by any other means than an inquest of office. I am of opinion that it was. That the mere executive of the state could not have done it, I will readily admit; but what was there to restrict the supreme legislative power from dispensing with the inquest of office? In the case of Smith and The State of Maryland, this court sustained a specific confiscation of lands under a law of the state, where there was neither conviction nor inquest of office. And in Great Britain, in the case of treason, an inquest of office is expressly dispensed with by the statute 33 H. VIII, c. 30. So that there is nothing mystical, nor any thing of indispensable obligation, in this inquest of office. It is, in Great Britain, a salutary restraint upon the exercise of arbitrary power by the crown, and affords the subject a simple and decent mode of contesting the claim of his sovereign; but the legislative power of that country certainly may assert, and has asserted, the right of dispensing with it, and I see no reason why it was not competent for the legislature of the state of Virginia to do the same.

Several collateral questions have arisen in this case on which, as I do not differ materially from my brethren, *I will only express [632 my opinion in the briefest manner.

I am of opinion that whenever the case made out in the pleadings does not, in law, sanction the judgment which has been given upon it; the error sufficiently appears upon the record to bring the case within the XXV. section of the judiciary act.

I am also of opinion that whenever a case is brought up to this court under that section, the title of the parties litigant must necessarily be inquired into, and that such an inquiry must, in the nature of things, precede the consideration how far the law, treaty, and so forth, is applicable to it; otherwise an appeal to this court would be worse than nugatory.

And that in ejectment at least, if not in every possible case, the decision of this court must conform to the state of rights of the parties at the time of its own judgment: so that a treaty, although ratified subsequent to the decision of the court appealed from, becomes a part of the law of the case and must control our decision.

Tay, 131 Mass. 193, where a mortgage was given by a husband and wife on her land to A. as security for goods to be sold to the husband; Fisher v. Otis, 3 Pinn. 91, where a mortgage for a gross sum was in reality security for advances to be made; Didier v. Patterson, 93 Va. 537, 25 S. E. 662, holding that an absolute assignment as security was a mere badge of fraud repellable by showing good faith; Brinkerhoff v. Marvin, 5 Johns. Ch. 327, holding that a judgment may be taken to secure future advances; Clapp v. Ely, 27 N. J. L. 611, where a judgment was confessed in payment of a debt and in part to secure future advances; Union Nat. Bank v. Moline, etc., Co., 7 N. Dak. 209, 73 N. Embargo.— Embargo act of 1808 prohibited the transportation of any article whatever from the United States to any foreign port or place, p. 60.

Cited in The Brig Short Staple, 1 Gall. 110, F. C. 12,813, a prosecution for violation of the act.

Statutes.— In construing laws it is the duty of the court to effect the intention of the legislature, but this intention is to be searched for in the words which the legislature has employed to convey it, p. 60.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this principle: Eason v. State, 11 Ark. 495, where the question was as to whether a later act operated as a repeal pro tanto; Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 181, holding that when the language of the Constitution is unambiguous, no construction opposed to its express words should be given; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 337, 17 Am. Rep. 745, where the court said that one of the cardinal rules of construction was that the whole instrument was to be examined in construing any portion; Louisiana Lottery Cases, 20 Fed. 627, where the expression "sending" of letters and circulars concerning lotteries was construed; In re Swearinger, 5 Sawy. 53, F. C. 13,683, where the construction placed on an act by the court of the State from which the act was adopted was not followed; Lehman v. Robinson, 59 Ala. 238, holding that where the legislature employs different language in a subsequent statute, the court will presume a change of law was intended; Irwin v. Irwin, 2 Okl. 218, 37 Pac. 560, where the question was as to the power of the territorial legislature to repeal an act granting Probate Courts jurisdiction in divorce suits; In re Meteor, 17 Fed. Cas. 201, holding it dangerous to vary explicit meaning by considerations as to the intent; Penn. R. R. Co. v. Pittsburgh, 104 Pa. St. 552, the court saying that in construing an act upon the theory of supposed intention, the evidence of the intention must be found in the language of the act and not outside of it; In re Nounnan, 7 Bank. Reg. 18, where it was said that a court could not substitute in place of an expressed intention a presumed intention; State v. Sinks, 42 Ohio St. 367, citing authorities on the construction of statutes and holding a tax law unconstitutional; Bartlett v. Morris, 9 Port. 268, holding that where the language is plain there is no room left for construction and a resort to extrinsic facts is not permitted; Leonard v. Wiseman, 31 Md. 205, holding that courts have no power to set aside a statute or evade its operation; Simington v. State, 5 Ind. 484, where a statute was held to deprive certain courts of jurisdiction over felonies; Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. 481, where the evidence of a member of the legislature was excluded.

Embargo.— Seizure of a vessel under the act of April 25, 1808, is not justified because the vessel takes on a cargo, but not under the inspection of a revenue officer, p. 61.

An information against a vessel for taking on board goods without a permit was abandoned after the decision in the principal case, in The Schooner Friendship, 1 Gall. 111, F. C. 5,125.

Ownership.— It is for the legislature to declare how far the citizen shall be restrained in the exercise of the power over property which ownership gives, and for the court to apply the rule, p. 61.

Cited upon this point in United States v. Marks, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 540, F. C. 15,721, where defendants were tried and imprisoned for receiving excessive fees as pension agents; United States v. Thirty-seven Barrels of Apple Brandy, 28 Fed. Cas. 66, where the court said that although revenue statutes were not as strictly construed as penal, yet it would not adjudge a punishment unless the law expressly required it; Our House No. 2 v. State, 4 G. Greene, 175, on the point that the proposition that proceedings in rem against property used for unlawful purposes may be sanctioned by law without violating the Constitution, is conclusively settled.

Embargo.— Transshipment of cargo from one vessel to another whose business is confined to waters within the jurisdiction of United States is not a violation of act of January 9, 1808, p. 66.

7 Cr. 69–99, 3 L. 271, RUSSELL v. CLARKE.

Guaranty.— Construction of letters of guaranty must be the same in both courts of law and equity, p. 89.

Cited in Colgen v. Henley, 6 Leigh (Va.) 94, the court saying that if the words of promise are at all doubtful, the court will take into consideration the circumstances and situation of the parties at the time.

Fraud.— Remedy at law held complete in a question of fraud; moreover equity will not afford relief for an injury sustained by the fraud of a person who is no party to a contract induced by that fraud, p. 91.

Cited and principle applied in Russell v. Little, 28 Ala. 163, where the court refused to entertain a bill, the sole object of which was to recover money alleged to have been paid through ignorance or mistake and fraud; Foster v. Swasey, 2 Wood. & M. 221, F. C. 4,984, holding that fraud and discovery are grounds of equitable relief and that equity will go on and continue the proceedings; Vanbibber v. Beirne, 6 W. Va. 175, 176, where the court doubted the jurisdiction of equity in cases of fraud where a party had a plain and complete remedy at law; Woodman v. Freeman, 25 Me. 541, 555, holding that equity would relieve when a proper case was presented, but that cases which declare that equity had jurisdiction in every kind of fraud were to be viewed with caution; Bradley v. Bosley, 1 Barb. Ch. 150, holding that a bill in equity would not lie by a vendee against a vendor for false representations, for damages only; Warner v. Daniels, 1 Wood. & M. 112, F. C. 17,181, the court saying it could not be held otherwise in the United States courts under the judiciary act if the remedy at law is complete; Phalen v. Clark, 19 Conn. 434, 50 Am. Dec. 257, holding that equity has jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud and in many cases concurrently with a court of law; Howse v. Moody, 14 Fla. 64, holding that where a plaintiff seeks to set aside fraudulent judicial proceedings he should make all persons parties who were actors and claim a present interest.

Distinguished in Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 271, F. C. 1,174, holding that a bill in equity lies to set aside a fraudulent conveyance; Harding v. Wheaton, 2 Mason, 382, F. C. 6,051, holding that equity had jurisdiction of a suit by heirs-at-law to set aside a deed by their ancestor because of undue influence.

Discovery.— On a bill for discovery, if the answer of the defendant discloses nothing and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession, he should be dismissed from a court of equity, p. 91.

This principle is affirmed and applied in the following citing cases: Viele v. Hoag, 24 Vt. 52, holding that if a bill is brought for discovery merely in aid of proceedings at law and the discovery fails, the bill will be dismissed; Home Ins. Co. v. Stanchfield, 1 Dill. 430, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 5, F. C. 6,660, the court saying that the necessity for discovery fails when a complainant has failed to obtain the discovery he sought; Henken v. Gramann, 2 Rich. L. 367, the court saying the adduction by the plaintiff of other evidence would remove the only ground for the jurisdiction of equity; Hale v. Clarkson, 23 Gratt. 48, and Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 409, 420, F. C. 764, both holding that discovery did not lie for matter of which the plaintiff had knowledge and means of proof; Bell v. Pomeroy, 4 McLean, 58, 59, F. C. 1,263, holding that in discovery to aid a prosecution at law the bill should aver the materiality of facts, and that they can only be proved by the defendant; Brown v. Swann, 10 Pet. 503, 9 L. 511, holding that a bill should show that the facts are known by the defendant and should be disclosed, and that the claimant is unable to prove them; Cecil Nat. Bank v. Thurber, 59 Fed. 914, 8 U. S. App. 496, holding that where a bill seeks relief as well as discovery, the complainant must allege his inability to establish at law the matters of which discovery is sought; Coquillard v. Suydam, 8 Blackf. 31, where a bill did not allege that a discovery was indispensable and the matter was denied by the answer; Stacy v. Pearson, 3 Rich. Eq. 152, where the court held that a party may have discovery not only when he is destitute of other evidence, but also to aid such evidence or to render it unnecessary; Berry v. Ginaca, 6 Sawy. 395, 5 Fed. 481, holding that where a plaintiff alleges in connection with his legal cause of action some equitable matter not sustained by proof, he cannot have a decrec for the legal matter; Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 354, 30 L. 454, 7 S. Ct. 253, where a bill showed ground for legal and not equitable relief and prayed for a discovery as incidental only; Leggett v. Postley, 2 Paige, 602, holding discovery would not lie merely to guard against anticipated perjury in a suit at law; Crane v. Bunnell, 10 Paige Ch. 335, where a bill was filed for relief against a fraudulent contract and for a discovery of the fraud; Va., etc., M. & M. Co. v. Hale, 93 Ala. 545, 9 So. 258, where discovery was sought from a corporation; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 417, F. C. 764, holding that a bill, if sustained, does not give power to make a final decree if relief is not incidental to the discovery. See also note on pleading in bill for discovery, 2 Am. Dec. 70.

Distinguished in Tyler v. Savage, 143 U. S. 94, 96, 36 L. 88, 89, 12 S. Ct. 345, where discovery was only one of the grounds of jurisdiction and the answers disclosed the facts; Tappan v. Evans, 11 N. H. 324, holding that it is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction that a discovery is had of facts which are material to the case.

Equity.— If a claim is to be satisfied out of a fund which is accessible only by the aid of a court of chancery, application may be made in the first instance to that court, p. 89.

This proposition is affirmed and applied by the citing cases as follows: O'Brien v. Coulter, 2 Blackf. 423, holding that a party need not first obtain a judgment where the debtor is deceased or where the claim is to be satisfied out of a fund accessible only in equity; Postelwait v. Howes, 3 Iowa, 385, holding that the rule requiring a return of nulla bona did not apply when a creditor's bill was filed against an estate; Snodgrass v. Andrews, 30 Miss. 490, 64 Am. Dec. 173, and Hamilton v. Miss. College, 52 Miss. 68, both holding chancery to be a proper tribunal where a relief was sought against fraudulent conveyances by a decedent; Luthy v. Woods, 6 Mo. App. 69, on the point that a creditor must obtain judgment at law before proceeding in equity where there is no original ground of equity jurisdiction; Miller v. Davidson, 3 Gilm. 523, 44 Am. Dec. 718, holding that a creditor seeking to satisfy a claim out of an equitable right not liable to execution, must exhaust his remedy at law; Shufeldt v. Boehm, 96 Ill. 563, where equity refused to enjoin the sale under an execution on the ground that the judgment was fraudulently confessed; Kankakee Woolen Mill

Co. v. Kampe, 38 Mo. App. 236, holding that a creditor at large may proceed in equity to set aside an invalid preference; Early Times Dis. Co. v. Zeiger, 49 Pac. 724, upholding right of creditor to sue in equity to establish a trust in debtor's property fraudulently conveyed without first obtaining judgment at law; Kahn v. Salmon, 10 Sawy. 190, 20 Fed. 805, holding the lien of an attachment is sufficient to enable a creditor to maintain a suit in equity to set aside a fraudulent assignment; Getzler v. Saroni, 18 Ill. 518, holding that judgments on attachments are a proper foundation for equitable interposition to set aside a conveyance in fraud of creditors; Gamage v. Harris, 79 Me. 536, 11 Atl. 423, where complainant brought a bill to remove a cloud, alleging that defendant held under a fraudulent judgment, and failed to prove the fraud; Ferson v. Sanger, 2 Ware (Dav.), 261, F. C. 4,751, holding equity will not entertain suit for damages arising out of fraud when damages are the sole object of the bill; Kent v. Curtis, 4 Mo. App. 127, 128, 131, holding a petition to subject property purchased with funds converted by defendant and conveyed to his wife to be demurrable; Batchelder v. Altheimer, 10 Mo. App. 185, holding a creditor of an insolvent limited partnership may without judgment invoke equity to protect and distribute the assets; Pullman v. Stebbins, 51 Fed. 12, holding that on dissolution of a corporation creditors may sustain a bill unsupported by judgments to reach the assets; Pierpont v. Fowle, 2 Wood. & M. 29, 30, F. C. 11,152, holding that a bill for an account of sales under copyright and for an injunction gives chancery prima facie jurisdiction; Pendleton v. Perkins, 49 Mo. 568, holding that where a debtor has absconded and there was no proceeding by which his property can be reached, a creditor's bill will lie in the first instance; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Paine, 13 R. I. 593, holding that where one had absconded in debt, leaving no legal assets which could be attached, his creditors can proceed at once in equity; Hipps v. Babin, 19 How. 278, 15 L. 635, holding that equity would not entertain a bill seeking to enforce a merely legal title to land; County of Cook v. Davis, 143 Ill. 153, 32 N. E. 177, holding that if a county treasurer fails to pay over all the fees, the remedy is complete on his bond; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 408, F. C. 764, on the point that a subpœna in equity cannot be abused as a pretext for bringing causes proper for a court of law into equity; Jones v. Newhall, 115 Mass. 249, 15 Am. Rep. 102, holding equity will decree specific performance of a contract for the sale of land when all that is to be done by the vendee is to pay money. Cited also, dissenting opinion, Ladd v. Judson, 174 Ill. 355, 66 Am. St. Rep. 271, 51 N. E. 842, majority holding a judgment at law an indispensable prerequisite to creditor's bill; and arguendo, in Stanton v. Catron, 8 N. Mex. 361, 45 Pac. 885, as one of three classes of cases where creditor may resort primarily to equity. Cited in notes, 52 Am. Rep. 673; and 66 Am. St. Rep. 288, in a valuable note on creditors' bills.

Distinguished in Pratt v. Northam, 5 Mason, 106, F. C. 11,376, holding that a bill for a recovery of assets lies, notwithstanding a remedy at law.

Guaranty.— One having no interest will be subjected to pay the debt of another only when his undertaking manifests a clear intention to bind himself for that debt. Words of doubtful import ought not to receive that construction, p. 90.

Cited and applied in Tucker v. Bitting, 32 Pa. St. 430, holding that parol evidence to charge one with the debt of another must be clear, explicit and certain; Rankin v. Childs, 9 Mo. 678 (669), 680 (672), where the words "I hereby guarantee the payment of the above bill" were construed; Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. 118, 122, 8 L. 629, 630, where a letter of credit was construed and evidence of reliance upon it allowed; Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. 185, 11 L. 96, holding that commercial letters are not construed on the same principles as bonds, but ought to receive a reasonable interpretation according to the true import of the terms; Eaton v. Mayo, 118 Mass. 143, when the following letter was held not to be a guaranty: "Let M. have what goods he may want on four months, and he will pay as usual."

Distinguished, Home Sav. Bk. v. Hosie, 77 N. W. 628, holding guaranty should be fairly construed.

Guaranty.— One who contracts on the credit of another should not trust to ambiguous phrases and strained constructions, but require an explicit and plain declaration of the obligation he is about to assume, p. 92.

Affirmed and applied in Unangst v. Hibber, 26 Pa. St. 153, holding that the proof of promise must be clear and must contain a positive declaration of the obligation assumed; Smith v. Montgomery, 3 Tex. 209, holding that the liability of a guarantor or surety cannot be extended beyond the actual terms of his engagements; First Nat. Bank v. Sowles, 46 Fed. 732, where directors, during a run on a bank, posted a notice to the effect that the bank was solvent.

Distinguished in Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 294, 295, where it was held that a letter of introduction with the "assurance that any contract of his will and shall be promptly paid," was a guaranty.

Guaranty.— One to whom a guaranty has been given should give immediate notice to the guarantor of the extent of his engagement, p. 94.

This principle is affirmed and applied by the following citing cases: Grice v. Ricks, 3 Dev. 65, holding that where the liability of one is upon a collateral obligation, he who takes the benefit must give the other notice; Montgomery v. Kellogg, 43 Miss. 492, 5 Am. Rep. 510, holding that it was necessary to give notice, first, of acceptance; second, of the amount of the credit; third, of the failure to pay; Rankin v. Childs, 9 Mo. 680 (672), holding that notice should be given of acceptance and of the failure to pay; Lee v. Dick, 10 Pet. 494, 9 L. 508, where a party was held not bound because notice of acceptance had not been given; Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet. 213, 9 L. 1060, holding that if notice of acceptance was not given, no subsequent diligence can make the guarantor liable; Gardner v. Lloyd, 110 Pa. St. 288, 2 Atl. 565, holding that if a party promises that if creditors will grant time he will guarantee punctual payment, notice of acceptance must be given; Taylor v. McClung, 2 Houst. 38, and Mayfield v. Wheeler, 37 Tex. 260, both holding that a guarantor for a future credit must be given notice of acceptance; Rapelye v. Bailey, 3 Conn. 443, 8 Am. Dec. 201, where one person wrote to another that he would pay for goods furnished a third person if the last did not; Cahuzac v. Sumini, 29 Ala. 292, holding notice of acceptance to be necessary unless the parties resided in the same city and the agreement to accept was contemporaneous with the offer; Wildes v. Savage, 1 Story, 32, F. C. 17,653, holding that notice of acceptance is not necessary where the agreement to accept is contemporaneous with the guaranty; Davis v. Wells, 104 U. S. 163, 26 L. 688, holding that the rule requiring notice of acceptance applies only when such acceptance is necessary to that mutual assent without which there can be no contract; Norton v. Eastman, 4 Me. 526; Wilcox v. Draper, 12 Neb. 142, 143, 10 N. W. 580, 581, and Powers v. Bumcratz, 12 Ohio St. 277, 283, all holding that where a guaranty is absolute, no notice of acceptance is necessary; Beckman v. Hale, 17 Johns. 140, holding that a letter in which one said he would stand responsible, did not constitute an absolute guaranty and that notice was necessary; Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. 126, 8 L. 631, holding that notice was not necessary in cases of continuing guaranties; Soller v. Meugy, 1 Bailey L. 623, where a letter of credit was given, and the court held that immediate notice of acceptance was necessary; Kincheloe v. Holmes, 7 B. Mon. 9, 45 Am. Dec. 45, and Craft v. Isham, 13 Conn. 35, both holding that the guarantor was entitled to notice within a reasonable time; Farmers' Bank v. Tatnall, 7 Houst. 300, 31 Atl. 880, holding that a delay of over a year discharged the guarantor; Central Sav. Bank v. Shine, 48 Mo. 465, 8 Am. Rep. 117, holding that in an offer by letter to guaranty the payment of future advances, there should be a distinct notice of acceptance; Menard v. Scudder, 7 La. Ann. 388, 389, 56 Am. Dec. 613, 614, holding that express notice from the creditor is not indispensable if the fact is brought to the guarantor in any other way; Lachman v. Block, 47 La. Ann. 512, 17 So. 156, where the words, "I agree to become surety for ten thousand dollars," with no designation of the debt, were construed; Meyers v. Campbell, 59 N. J. L. 379, 35 Atl. 789, holding that securities belonging to a principal debtor and pledged to indemnify his surety, will inure to the benefit of his creditors. See note in 39 Am. Rep. 222, 223, where the subject of notice of acceptance of guaranties is discussed.

The language in the principal case was said to be a dictum, in Seaver v. Bradley, 6 Me. 66, holding the guarantor had seasonable notice of facts sufficient to charge him; and in Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 50, holding that where one covenanted that another "shall perform the agreement" an action would lie without notice of the nonperformance.

Guaranty.— One making representation as to credit of another where the communication is honestly made and the party making it has no interest in the transaction, is not responsible for its actual verity, p. 95.

This proposition is variously affirmed and applied by the citing cases, as follows: State Bank v. Hamilton, 2 Ind. 464, holding that if representations were fraudulently made, one was liable, otherwise if made in good faith; Wynne v. Allen, 7 Baxt. 316, 32 Am. Rep. 565, holding that if the party honestly believed he stated the truth he is not liable; Marsh v. Falker, 40 N. Y. 569, holding that false representations as to the credit of another to be actionable must be known to be false or must convey the impression of actual knowledge; Einstein v. Marshall, 58 Ala. 159, 25 Am. Rep. 733, holding that if a person recommends to a wholesale merchant one who desires to purchase on credit, good faith requires his representation must be true; Hubbard v. Briggs, 31 N. Y. 529, holding it is not necessary that the defendant should be benefited by the deceit or in collusion with the party benefited; Young v. Hall, 4 Ga. 100, holding an action lies against one who gives a recommendation of character and credit to another; Addington v. Kinlock, 9 Rich. L. 310, and Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 356, 50 Pac. 663. And see valuable notes, in 5 Am. Dec. 212, and 25 Am. Dec. 448, 450.

Fraud.— If an act immoral and designedly injurious to another, were not cognizable and punishable by our laws, our system of jurisprudence would be defective, p. 94.

Cited in Bean v. Herrick, 12 Me. 265, 28 Am. Dec. 177, holding that if a party makes a false affirmation, although he has no interest he is liable; Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Cited and affirmed in Dilly v. Barnard, 8 Gill & J. 188, holding an answer to be evidence even where the equity of the complainant's bill is grounded upon the allegation of fraud; Jewett v. Guaranty.— One indorsing bills on faith of guaranty cannot resort to a trust fund for the indemnity of the guarantor, both the principal and guarantor being insolvent, p. 97.

Cited and relied upon as authority, in Keene Five Cents Sav. Bk. v. Herrick, 62 N. H. 176, holding that a payee of a note is entitled to have a mortgage given by the maker to his surety assigned to him; In re Baldwin, 19 N. B. R. 52, 2 Fed. Lee, 11 Conn. 119, 27 Am. Dec. 716, holding that the security for a debt in whose hands soever it may be is held for the payment of such debt.

Cited in Breedlove v. Stump, 3 Yerg. 270, holding that to constitute an abandonment of a trust fund there must be a clear and decisive act; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 313, F. C. 17,944, holding that capital stock is a trust fund for the payment of the bank notes, and may be followed in the hands of stockholders.

Trusts.— One for whose benefit a trust is created, who is to be the ultimate receiver of the money, may maintain a suit in equity to have it paid directly to himself, p. 97.

Cited and principle affirmed and applied in Rodney v. Shankland, 1 Del. Ch. 47, 12 Am. Dec. 75, holding that a person for whose benefit a trust is created may enforce it, although he is not a party to it; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 36, 41, F. Distinguished in McConnell v. Dickson, 43 Ill. 108, holding that where a security pays a debt he has no right in equity in the first instance.

Parties.— The incapacity imposed on the Circuit Courts to proceed against any person residing within the United States, but not within the district, justifies the courts in dispensing with parties merely formal, p. 98.

Cited and principle applied in Abbot v. The American Hard Rubber Co., 4 Blatchf. 492, F. C. 9, holding that where a person is beyond the reach of process, the court will dismiss only when his presence is indispensable; Heriot v. Davis, 2 Wood. & M. 233, F. C. 6,404, holding that a case will proceed against the persons appearing and notified without prejudice to the others where their interests can be severed; Ribon v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 16 Wall. 451, 21 L. 369, holding that where a decree can be made as to those present without affecting those absent the court will proceed; Carneal v. Banks, 10 Wheat. 188, note, 6 L. 299, note, on the point that parties having been improperly made defendants cannot affect the jurisdiction as between parties properly before the court; Wood v. Davis, 18 How. 469, 15 L. 461, where the real parties in interest were those who resided out of the State; Harrison v. Urann, 1 Story, 66, F. C. 6,146, holding that the question of jurisdiction of United States courts as to parties can only apply as between the very parties who by a false allegation are brought within their jurisdiction. Cited in collection of authorities on the point that Circuit Court subpoena served outside the court's territorial jurisdiction, is a nullity, United States v. Amer. Lumber Co., 80 Fed. 311.

Parties.— Where essential parties are not before the court, the court will not make a decree, p. 98.

The following citations affirm and apply this rule: Hamilton v. Savannah, etc., Ry. Co., 49 Fed. 418, holding that, notwithstanding the act of congress of 1838 and rule 47 of the equity practice, no decree can be made involving the rights of an omitted party; California v. Southern Pac. Co., 157 U. S. 249, 39 L. 691, 15 S. Ct. 599, holding that in an original cause in the Supreme Court, the court would not proceed in the absence of parties whose rights would be in effect determined, though not technically bound; Porter v. Clements, 3 Ark. 382, holding it must appear that the ends of justice would be defeated and that the rights of the absent persons would not be affected before the court will proceed; Florida v. E. 393, holding that in an action by an equitable assignee of a policy to restrain its payment, one to whom the insured had assigned it absolutely should be made a party; Eyster v. Gaff, 2 Colo. 241, dissenting opinion, holding the assignee in bankruptcy must be a party in a suit by a mortgagee; Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 139, 140, 15 L. 160, holding a compromise executed by six persons could not be rescinded in an action against two only; Gray v. Larrimore, 4 Sawy. 650, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 556, F. C. 5,721, holding that all partners or their representatives are indispensable parties to a bill to dissolve a partnership and for an accounting; Griffin v. Bradford, 13 Ala. 844, holding that if the absent parties are not mere passive parties to the decree, equity will not proceed without them.

Parties.— Instead of dismissing a bill brought to a hearing without proper parties, the court may give leave to make new parties, p. 99.

Cited and followed in Hightower v. Mustian, 8 Ga. 511, holding that generally a bill will not be dismissed for want of proper parties but may be dismissed; Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mason, 571, F. C. 11,135, on the point that dismissal is the common course where persons who are necessary parties refuse to appear and the court cannot reach them by its process; Beasley v. Shively, 20 Or. 510, 26 Pac. 847, where it appeared from the record that the real merits could not be determined without essentially affecting persons not parties and the court dismissed the complaint; Lucas v. Bank of Darien, 2 Stew. 326, holding that if the case were with the appellant a dismissal generally would not be proper; Sloan v. Sloan, 21 Fla. 598, where a defect of necessary parties which existed prior to the decree appealed from was discovered on appeal; Fisher v. Rutherford, 1 Bald. 194, F. C. 4,823, on the point that parties may be added after the reversal of a final decree and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court; Poole v. Nixon, 9 Pet. Appx. 775, 19 F. C. 996, 9 L. 307, where there was a bill of review and the court said that such bills would lie only in favor of a party or a privy to the original suit; Alston v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 416, F. C. 764, holding that objection to the jurisdiction for want of proper parties may be made at the hearing or on appeal.

Equity, being rightfully in possession of a cause, will proceed to determine the whole matter in controversy, p. 89.

Cited and applied in Stow v. Barzeman, 29 Ala. 403, where this principle was applied on a bill filed by a vendee for an abatement of the price on account of misrepresentations; Howards v. Steapp, 1 Ga. 378, and Pryor v. Adams, 1 Call, 392, both holding that where it was necessary to establish an account, equity would grant a discovery and then grant the appropriate relief consequent upon it; Lancy v. Randlett, 80 Me. 175, 6 Am. St. Rep. 171, 13 Atl. 687, holding that equity could grant relief, even though the discovery showed the proper relief to be an award of damages; Magic Ruffle Co. v. Elm City Co., 14 Blatchf. 112, F. C. 8,950, where the court having granted discovery, proceeded to give the proper relief in damages; Woodman v. Freeman, 25 Me. 545, holding that relief can be given as a consequent upon discovery only upon a bill averring the facts of which discovery is desired, that they rest in the knowledge of defendant alone and are material; Dowell v. Mitchell, 105 U. S. 432, 26 L. 1143, on the point that where jurisdiction is taken in equity of a legal cause of action because of some equitable relief which cannot be granted, equity should dismiss the bill; Real Estate Sav. Inst. v. Collonious, 63 Mo. 295, where a suit was brought to set aside a partition sale for fraud; Boland v. Ross, 120 Mo. 216, 25 S. App. 124, the court saying that where the principal matter of controversy is a cause of action at law it should be settled at law wherever possible; Magic Ruffle Co. v. Elm City Co., 13 Blatchf. 153, F. C. 8,949, holding that a bill upon a license under a patent, although no royalties were payable and the patent had expired, is not open to the objection that there is a remedy at law where an account and discovery are necessary.

Embargo.— Departure from a port without a clearance is necessary to justify a seizure under the embargo act of 1808, and a vessel leaving a wharf without a clearance under suspicious circumstances is not liable to forfeiture where she was seized in port, p. 106.

Cited in United States v. The George Darby, 25 Fed. Cas. 1285, holding that a vessel has not departed on her voyage until she is outside the limits of the harbor; United States v. Embargo.— Cargo not belonging to the owner, master or mariners is exempt from forfeiture where the vessel departs without a clearance, the goods being liable to no duty, p. 107.

Embargo.— Licensed vessel employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed is subject to forfeiture, pp. 106, 107.

Cited and rule applied in United States v. The Paryntha Davis, 3 Ware, 162, F. 7 Cr. 108–112, 3 L. 284, UNITED STATES v. GOODWIN.

Appeals.—Where a cause was removed from the District Court to the Circuit Court by writ of error, the Supreme Court cannot review the judgment of the Circuit Court upon a writ of error or otherwise, p. 109.

The following citations affirm and apply this principle: The Pueblo Case, 4 Sawy. 580, F. C. 12,316, holding that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court existed only in those cases in which it was expressly granted; Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 403, 406, F. C. 764, saying that Federal courts are of limited jurisdiction, which must be exercised in the mode pointed out; in the note to United States v. Wonson, 1 Gall. 6, 7, F. C. 16,750, holding that no appeal lies from the District to the Circuit Court except in civil cases in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction and that a writ of error is the proper process in common-law actions; Ex parte

Crane, 5 Pet. 204, 8 L. 98, dissenting opinion, holding the Supreme Court can compel the circuit judge to sign a bill of exceptions.

Appeals.— An appeal is a civil-law process and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the law and fact to a review and retrial; a writ of error is a common-law process and removes for re-examination nothing but the law, p. 111.

This holding affirmed and relied upon in Dower v. Richards, 151 U. S. 663, 38 L. 307, 14 S. Ct. 454, where the court held that the Supreme Court cannot, upon a writ of error to the highest court of a State, review its judgment upon a question of fact; Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 205, 8 L. 98, dissenting opinion, where the same principle was laid down; Christianson v. Buchanan, 2 Ga. 339, holding a writ of error will not lie for errors committed upon the trial of a cause before the petit jury, where an appeal is pending; Crane v. Reeder, 28 Mich. 535, 15 Am. Rep. 230, on the meaning of the words "trial" and "hearing."

Admiralty.— Seizure, for breach of Federal law, of vessel on waters navigable from the sea for vessels of ten or more tons burden, is an admiralty cause, triable without a jury, p. 112.

Cas. 863, holding that jurisdiction in admiralty includes cases of seizure and forfeiture on tide waters without as well as within the United States.

Distinguished in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. 486, 12 L. 247, dissenting opinion, the case holding that in cases of torts or collisions on the high seas or within the ebb and flow of the tide, admiralty has jurisdiction, although it was infra corpus comitatus.

Jurisdiction.—National ships of war entering the port of a friendly power open for their reception are to be considered as exempted by the consent of that power from its jurisdiction, p. 145.

7 Cr. 147–152, 3 L. 297, FREELAND v. HERON.

Account.— When one merchant sends an account current to another in a different country, who keeps it two years without objections, it is a stated account and his silence and acquiescence cast the onus probandi on him, p. 151.

Affirmed upon this point and applied in Langdon v. Roane, 6 Ala. 527, 41 Am. Dec. 62, holding that the party receiving an account must examine it, and if he remains silent it becomes an account stated; Bainbridge v. Wilcocks, 1 Bald. 540, F. C. 755, and Baker v. Biddle, 1 Bald. 418, F. C. 764, both holding that if an account is retained an unreasonable time without objection it becomes a stated account; Swayze v. Swayze, 37 N. J. Eq. 188, where the matters were equally within the knowledge of both and the settlement was allowed to stand for five years; Baxter v. Waite, 2 Wash.

Slevin, 26 Ind. 135, on the point that there is an acquiescence in an account if no objection is made after several opportunities; Chapman v. Lee, 47 Ala. 156, where the court considered the relevancy of evidence to prove an account stated; Anding v. Levy, 57 Miss. 63, 34 Am. Rep. 437, where the court said the rule as to stated accounts applied only in controversies between merchants; Shepard v. Bank of State of Missouri, 15 Mo. 151, holding that there is no reason why the same doctrine should not apply to other persons; Lockwood v. Thorne, 11 N. Y. 174, 62 Am. Birchett, 12 Leigh (Va.), 193, on the point that retaining an account did not conclude one from surcharging and falsifying it; St. Louis v. Alexander, 23 Mo. 526, holding that, in a bill to open a settled account, it is not sufficient to allege generally that it is erroneous; Porter v. Price, 80 Fed. 660, 49 U. S. App. 304, refusing to re-open an account stated for alleged error in compounding interest thereon; Allen-West Com. Co. v. Patillo, 90 Fed. 631, holding an account stated, unobjected to for two years, cast upon the defendant the burden of showing certain commissions charged to be error. See also valuable note in 62 Am. Interest.— It is error for a commissioner, in stating an account, to adopt a mode of calculating interest contrary to the agreement of the parties, p. 151.

7 Cr. 152–156, 3 L. 299, WELCH v. MANDEVILLE.

Dismissal.— Motion to reinstate a case dismissed is an application to the discretion of the court, and its refusal is not ground for error, p. 155.

Cited and principle applied in Trice v. Smith, 6 Yerg. 320, and Marsh v. Graham, 6 Iowa, 78, both holding that a writ of error will not lie on refusal to reinstate after a voluntary nonsuit; Ringgold's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 9, on the point that there can be no writ of error for refusal to reinstate after a nonsuit or dismissal; Andrews v. Central Nat. Bk., 77 Md. 27, 25 Atl. 917, where there was a dismissal by the legal plaintiff and a motion by the equitable plaintiff to reinstate; Hazleton, etc., Co. v. Citizens' St. Ry. Co., 72 Fed. 328, holding that, after a direction for a decree, a stranger will not be given leave to file a supplemental bill; Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 68, holding the doctrine that discretionary matters will not be reviewed must be limited to matters purely of discretion, or such as cannot do injury; Stephenson v. 7 Cr. 156–159, 3 L. 300, MARSTELLER v. McLEAN.

Pleading.— Replication should of itself contain a full and complete answer to the bar, and a joint plea which is bad affects with its consequences all the parties joining in it, p. 158.

Cited in Kerr v. Force, 3 Cr. C. C. 33, F. C. 7,730, upon the qualities of a replication; Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. 263, 12 L. 145, holding that any special excuse for not suing within the statutory time should be set up in the original bill or by amendment to it; Ferrall v. Bradford, 2 Fla. 519, 50 Am. Dec. 300; Marsh v. Smith, 18 N. H. 369, and Poulk v. Slocum, 3 Blackf. 429, on the point that where several defendants join in a plea, if it is bad as to one it is bad as to all.

Parties.— All the parties in a suit must be competent to sue, otherwise the action cannot be supported, p. 159.

Cited in Pringle v. Gaw, 5 Serg. & R. 536, holding that, if a widow join with the heirs in ejectment, the heirs cannot recover alone.

Distinguished in Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 652, 659, holding that the disability of one of several coplaintiffs operated neither to the advantage nor disadvantage of the others.

Statute of limitations.— When once the statute of limitations runs against one of two parties entitled to a joint action, it operates as a bar to such action, notwithstanding the disability of the first party, p. 159.

The citing cases show that this principle has been variously affirmed and applied: Dickey v. Armstrong, 1 A. K. Marsh. 41, holding that in a joint estate, if the right of entry is tolled as to some, all are barred; Hardeman v. Sims, 3 Ala. 751, holding it was a settled rule that where a joint right of action accrued it must exist in all at the time the action is brought; Keeton v. Keeton, 20 Mo. 544, holding that one party who is saved can obtain no relief upon a bill jointly with others who are barred; Allen v.

Farrington, 2 Sneed, 534, holding that an action, barred as to one partner, is barred as to a nonresident partner; Chase v. Henry, 166 Mass. 582, 44 N. E. 989, 55 Am. McKenzie, 30 Miss. 35, where the principle was applied, in an action by distributees, to set aside an unauthorized sale; Shannon v. Dunn, 8 Blackf. 183, holding that it is no answer to the plea of the statute to a writ of error that within five years after one of the plaintiffs arrived at age it was prosecuted; State v. Wilson, 3 Harr. 356, holding a husband of a legatee may appeal and the right is barred in three years after marriage, although the wife was an infant; Layton v. State, 4 Harr. 20, where a legatee married and was under coverture when she attained full age and a suit was brought by husband and wife within three years afterwards; Peters v. Jones, 35 Iowa, 519, and Henry v. Stewart, 2 Hill's L. 333, both holding that the minority of one party will not save those who are of full age; Griffith v. Huston, 7 J. J. Marsh. 390, holding that the disability of one parcener did not waive the right of entry of others; Barrow v. Navee, 2 Yerg. 227, 228, holding that upon a joint demise by tenants in common, if one is barred it is not a bar to all, contra in personal actions where all are compelled to join; Ridon v. Frion, 3 Murph. (N. C.) 578, the court saying that the parties who are competent ought to take care of the interests of all; Doe v. Kennon, 1 Ga. 380, on the point that where the statute has begun to run its operation is not arrested even where there is a legal impossibility to assert the right; Gross v. Miller, 2 Wheat. 324, 4 L. 251, where the court drew a distinction between the saving clause in the statute of limitations and that under a statute requiring entries of land to be surveyed by a certain time; University of Vermont v. Reynolds, 3 Vt. 557, 23 Am. Dec. 241, where an ejectment was brought under a charter from the State making a grant of land; Moore v. Armstrong, 10 Ohio, 14, 36 Am. Dec. 64, the court saying that in the principal case the interest was joint, while in the case under consideration the interest was several and distinct; Weare v. Burge, 10 Ired. 171, holding that where only one of several tenants in common of a negro sued in tort, the statute could not operate upon him, though it might as against all of his cotenants; said to be neutralized by Doe ex dem. v. Barksdale, in Jordan v. Thornton, 7 Ga. 524, 526, holding that where one of two or more cotenants was barred, those within the exception may recover; denied in Hill v. Wilson, 4 Rich. L. 528, 55 Am. Dec. 700, holding that the successive minorities of cotenants will protect the interests of adults; Wilkins v. Philips, 3 Ohio, 50, 17 Am. Dec. 579, holding that where one party to a writ of error is within the saving clause the case was saved as to all; Sturges v. Longworth, 1 Ohio St. 562, holding that where the interests of two defendants are joint, the disability of one inures to the benefit of the other; Shute v. Wade, 5 Yerg. 10, and Masters v. Dunn, 30 Miss. 269, 270, 272, both holding that, if all be under a disability to sue, the statute will not commence running until the disability of all be removed.

Bills and notes.— Possession of a note by one who had assigned it to another is not evidence that it was the propery of the possessor, p. 163.

Cited and principle applied in Hunt v. Stewart, 7 Ala. 527, holding an action by an indorser cannot be supported; Greenhough v. Keyworth, 30 Fed. Cas. 1087, holding that where a note was indorsed for collection the indorser may sue; McCormick v. Eckland, 11 Ind. 294, on the point that, if the note is in the hands of an indorser, the presumption is that the assignment never was completed; Mitchell v. Fuller, 15 Pa. St. 270, 53 Am. Dec. 595, holding a note specially indorsed cannot be recovered on by anyone but the special indorsee; Davis v. Christy, 8 Mo. 571, holding that the erasure of the assignment on a bond did not reinvest title in the assignor; Robson v. Early, 1 Mart. (N. S.) 374, holding that possession is not evidence of property in a note which, on inspection, appears to be another's.

Distinguished in Wood v. Berthoud, 4 J. J. Marsh. 320, dissenting opinion, an action by an intermediate assignor; Bell v. Morehead, 3 A. K. Marsh. 161, holding that an assignor of a note negotiated in bank, acquiring possession, is prima facie the owner; said to be overruled in principle by Dugan v. United States, 3 Wheat. 172, 4 L. 362, in Norris v. Badger, 6 Cow. 455, holding that an intermediate indorser may sue a previous indorser; Kells v. Northwestern Live Stock Ins. Co., 64 Minn. 393, 58 Am. St. Rep. 544, 67 N. W. 216, where the court said that the weight of authority is that possession by the payee of a note specially indorsed is prima facie evidence of ownership; in the note to 1 Am. Dec. 275, where other cases on this subject are cited; Hanna v. Pegg, 1 Blackf. 185, approving the doctrine of Dugan v. United States, 3 Wheat. 172, 4 L. 362, and holding an assignee regaining possession is prima facie owner.

Bills and notes.— Under indorsement of a note without recourse, it cannot be inferred that the nominal value of the note was actually paid, p. 163.

Cited in Watson v. Chesire, 18 Iowa, 205, 209, 87 Am. Dec. 384, 387, holding that it will not protect the assignor from liability for fraud in the assignment; Cowles v. Dec. 390, where cases on the subject of indorsement without recourse are collated.

Bills and notes.— In an action against an indorser of a note, a count is defective which does not state that the indorsement was on a valuable considcration, and that the plaintiff had actually received the money, p. 164.

Taxation.— Contract by State, exempting property from taxation, is valid and binding and cannot be abrogated by a subsequent act repealing the statute granting the exemption, p. 167.

This case, as is evident from the large number of citations, is leading authority upon the question of tax exemption. The following citations affirm and apply its doctrine: Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Cited in Shepherd v. Thompson, 122 U. S. 235, 30 L. 1157, 7 S. Ct. 1231, holding that a mere acknowledgment of the debt, though in writing, did not revive a debt; Center v. The P. & M. Bank, 22 Ala. 759, holding a recital in a mortgage to be sufficient to put one on inquiry.

Bankruptcy.— Certificate of discharge from imprisonment, under the act of congress for the relief of insolvent debtors in the District of Columbia is no bar to an action, p. 171.

7 Cr. 171–176, 3 L. 305, DAVY v. FAW.

Arbitration.— Omission of arbitrators to act upon a matter submitted is not ground for setting aside an award where a party is not injured by the omission, p. 174.

Cited, affirmed and applied in Daniels v. Willis, 7 Minn. 378, holding courts of law are less liberal than courts of equity in setting aside awards; Whittemore v. Whittemore, 2 N. H. 27, holding an award of demands, actually laid before the arbitrators, was binding, although the agreement was to submit all demands; Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Y. 232, where the acts of the arbitrators, though not authorized, were merely clerical.

Arbitration.— Award will not be set aside, because of conduct which is indiscreet, but not seriously indicative that an unjust award has been made, p. 175.

Cited to this point in Silver v. Connecticut River Lumber Co., 40 Fed. 194, holding that jealousy of one arbitrator of another, resulting in a slight warping of his judgment, will not vitiate an award; Ormsby v. Bakewell, 7 Ohio, 114, holding that arbitrators after the hearing may meet for consultation without notice; Brush v. Fisher, 70 Mich. 473, 14 Am. St. Rep. 513, 38 N. pear; Carey v. Wilcox, 6 N. H. 179, where the court stated the grounds upon which an award could be impeached; Furber v. Chamberlain, 29 N. H. 417, on the point that an award fairly made in pursuance of submission is conclusive, even upon questions touching real estate.

Cited in Tracy v. Herrick, 25 N. H. 400, where an objection was made, because one award only was signed while the submission provided that it should be tripartite.

7 Cr. 176–194, 3 L. 307, HUGHES v. MOORE.

Discontinuance.— Plaintiff may discontinue a count in his declaration after taking issue on some of the pleas and demurring to others, p. 190.

Cited and applied in Leavitt v. Cowles, 2 McLean, 493, F. C. 8,171, where the plaintiff in an action on a note asked leave to discontinue the first and second counts; Kimball v. Bellows, 13 N. H. 68, where it was said that such discontinuance was no admission of the truth of a plea; Keeler v. Bartine, 12 Wend. 113, considering the effect of a nolle prosequi as to one count.

Pleading.— Oyer of a written contract alleged in the first count of a declaration does not spread the contract on the record so as to make it a part of the pleas to the other counts, p. 190.

Principle applied in Messer v. Smythe, 58 N. H. 313, where the operation and effect of profert and oyer were considered; Estill v. Jenkins, 4 Dana (Ky.), 77, holding that where a declaration contained several counts, a plea not restricted to any particular count must be taken as an answer to the whole declaration; Larry v. Herrick, 58 N. H. 41, on the point that inconsistent counts are not evidence.

Patents.— Tortious act in obtaining patent does not deprive the owner of a plat and survey of his equitable title, p. 191.

Cited in Alston v. Rawles, 13 Fla. 142, on the point that where one takes title in the name of another to defraud creditors, a trust results; Rooker v. Ch. 409, on the point that advances of money after a purchase cannot raise a resulting trust without overturning the statute of frauds.

Statute of frauds.— There is no distinction between a sale of land to which one has only an equitable title and a sale of land to which he has a legal title; they are equally within the statute of frauds, p. 101.

Principle affirmed and applied in Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumn. 461, F. C. 13,019, holding a parol agreement to become partners in the purchase and sale of lands was within the statute; Chenowith v. Lewis, 9 Or. 152, holding a verbal agreement for the sale of an interest in land was void; Dougherty v. Catlett, 129 Ill. 438, 21 N. E. 934, holding the same as the principal case; West v. Dysinger, 1 Rawle, 418, dissenting opinion, holding it to be an established rule of chancery never to decree against the statute upon parol proof which was contradictory. See note to 17 Am. Dec. 58.

Distinguished in Grumley v. Webb, 48 Mo. 570, dissenting opinion, p. 594, where a party was in possession and the purchase money was paid under a parol contract of purchase.

Statute of frauds.— Contract to compensate plaintiff for the loss of land the title to which he has been deprived of by the defendant taking the title in his own name, is within the statute of frauds, p. 192.

7 Cr. 194–202, 3 L. 313, BARTON v. PETIT.

Judgments.— If two or more persons are sued in a joint action, the plaintiff cannot proceed to obtain judgment against one alone, but must wait until the others have been served with process or have been proceeded against so far as the law authorizes for the purpose of forcing an appearance, p. 201.

Cited and principle applied in Gibbons v. Surber, 4 Blackf. 155, where an action of debt was brought by the assignee of a joint and several bond; Helm v. Van Vleet, 1 Blackf. 344, 12 Am. Dec. 249, where a declaration was filed against two and judgment by default was taken against one; Brooks v. McIntyre, 4 Mich. 319, where there was a joint action and one defendant was served and non est inventus was returned as to the other; Doggett v. Jordan, 3 Fla. 217, 218, holding that the return by an officer "not in the county" does not warrant an abatement or discontinuance as to one or more several joint defendants; Pegram v. United States, 1 Brock. 263, F. C. 10,906, where there was an action on a joint and several bond against several defendants, some of whom were non-residents and there was a return of "no inhabitants" as to them; Hanley v. Dewes, 1 Mo. 21, dissenting opinion, where a suit was against five, only one was served, and judgment by default was taken against all; Goodhue v. Marsh. 282, discussing when non est inventus can be returned.

Denied in Loney v. Bailey, 43 Md. 19, holding that if two or more are sued in a joint action the plaintiff may proceed against one or more, though the others may not be served; Early v. Clarkson, 7 Leigh (Va.), 85, the court saying that probably the Supreme Court was not apprised of the decision of the Supreme Court of Virgina, and the long-continued practice there; Beagley v. Sims, 81 Va. 646, holding rule changed by Virginia code.

Discontinuance.— Plaintiff ought not to be permitted to abate or discontinue his action as against one defendant after stating a joint cause of action, unless authorized to do so by the return of the process against that defendant, p. 202.

7 Cr. 202–206, 3 L. 315, WILSON v. KOONTZ.

Statute of limitations.— Removal of a defendant from one county to another does not stop the running of the statute of limitations, unless the plaintiff has been actually defeated or obstructed in the bringing of his action by the removal of the defendant, p. 205.

Cited in Nelson v. Beveridge, 21 Mo. 25, construing the section suspending the right of action, where one prevented its commencement; Brown v. Butler, 87 Va. 625, 13 S. Rayford, 1 S. & M. 440, 441, 40 Am. Dec. 104, 105, on the point that a nonresident may proceed against a nonresident debtor provided there is also a resident debtor.

Distinguished in Ten Eyck v. Wing, 1 Mich. 55, where the question was as to the sufficiency of an acknowledgment to take a case out of the statute.

Statute of limitations.— Objection that plea of the statute of limitations to a bill in equity in the nature of an attachment is not good, unless the defendant answer and also deny the debt, should be taken at the time of offering the plea and before issue, p. 205.

Attachment.— Bill in equity in the nature of an attachment in chancery against a surviving partner as principal and others as garnishees is really a case at law, p. 206.

Cited in Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh, 315, dissenting opinion, on the point that though a proceeding under an attachment is in equity, the question between debtor and creditor is generally a legal demand; Gilbert v. Lynch, 17 Blatchf. 406, 1 Fed. 115, on the point that a bill to appropriate a dividend of an insolvent estate to a debt is in effect an action at law; Templeman v. Fauntleroy, 3 Rand. 440, where a foreign attachment was sued out against an absent debtor and a resident garnishee; explained in Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 292, holding there to be no doubt that purely equitable rights might be secured and enforced, through the medium of a foreign attachment.

7 Cr. 206–208, 3 L. 317, RIDDLE v. MOSS.

This holding is affirmed and applied by citing cases as follows: Hunter v. Gatewood, 5 T. B. Mon. 269, holding the same as the principal case; Caldwell v. McVicar, 12 Ark. 751, where the court said this was so, even though he was not a party; United States v. Variance.— In all actions on special agreements or written contracts, the contract given in evidence must correspond with that stated in the declaration, p. 217.

Cited and doctrine applied in Munn v. Haynes, 46 Mich. 144, 9 N. W. 137, holding a declaration setting out a joint obligation will not be sustained, unless a joint debt is proved; Reed v. McLean, 3 Port. 172, holding an averment of a promise by "Duncan McL.," is supported by evidence of a promise by "D. McL.;" Frank v. Morrison, 58 Md. 441, where a variance was held immaterial in an action on a contract to purchase stock on installments; Burton v. State, 6 Blackf. 341, where the doctrine was applied to a scire facias on a recognizance; Pearsall v. Phelps, 3 Ala. 526, where there was a variance between the pleading of a foreign judgment and the exemplification produced; Cabell v. Hardwick, 1 Call (Va.), 354, note, holding that in debt on an administration bond, if the declaration does not show that the plaintiffs sue as justices of the court, it is a fatal variance; Kellogg v. Denslow, 14 Conn. 429, 431, holding the variance to be fatal, where the allegation was of a sale of a condenser and the evidence was of a sale of sundry articles, including a condenser; Border Min. Co. v. Barry, 17 Md. 431, holding there was no substantial variance where the declaration was for freight at a certain rate and the proof was freight at a certain rate or current rates; Franklin Ins. Co. v. Smith, 82 Ill. 132, where the rule was applied in an action on an insurance policy; Long v. Overton, 7 Mo. 568, holding the omission of the words "of October" in an action on a bond to be a fatal variance.

Variance.— Note payable sixty days after date will not support a declaration on a note not stating when it was payable, p. 217.

Bills and notes.— Note having no day of payment is payable immediately, p. 217.

Cited in Eaton v. Truesdail, 40 Mich. 6, where this principle was applied to a mortgage deed; White v. Tarbell, 27 Vt. 574, holding an allegation that the plaintiff was the "bona fide owner and bearer of" the note, without stating the time of payment, was sufficient; in the note to 6 Am. Writ of inquiry.— Production of note in executing a writ of inquiry in assumpsit on the note is necessary, p. 218.

Conditional sales.— Individuals may make contracts for the purchase and sale of lands defeasible by the payment of money at a future day, p. 237.

The following cases rely upon this holding of the principal case: Cornell v. Hall, 22 Mich. 383, holding the only safe criterion between a conditional sale and a mortgage is in the intent; Alstin v. Cundiff, 52 Tex. 462, holding that, in determining, reference must be had to whether the relation of debtor and creditor exists; Price v. Karnes, 59 Ill. 278, and Hicks v. Norris, 5 Gill & J. 86, both holding the inquiry must be whether the contract is security; Hinckley v. Wheelwright, 29 Md. 348; Holton v. Meighen, 15 Minn. 76; Turner v. Kerr, 44 Mo. 433, and Sears v. Dixon, 33 Cal. 333, all holding that an absolute deed is a mortgage, if intended as security; Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 27; Gassert v. Bogk, 7 Mont. 600, 19 Pac. 285, and Mitchell v. Wellman, 80 Ala. 20, all holding that to change a deed into a mortgage the evidence must be clear; in Bridges v. Linder, 60 Iowa, 192; Voss v. Eller, 109 Ind. 264, 10 N. E. 76, and Alleghany R. R. Co. v. Casey, 79 Pa. St. 97, all holding a conveyance in satisfaction of a debt with an agreement to reconvey not to be a mortgage; Barnes v. Holcomb, 12 Smedes & M. 314, on the point that an absolute deed on account of a pre-existing debt with an agreement to reconvey is a mortgage; Devore v. Woodruff, 1 N. Dak. 148, 45 N. W. 702, holding a separate agreement to reconvey did not conclusively show a mortgage; Keithley v. Wood, 151 Ill. 574, 42 Am. St. Rep. 268, 38 N. E. 151, holding that, in the case of a warranty deed with an agreement to reconvey, the character of the deed depends upon the intent; Smith v. Crosby, 47 Wis. 166, 2 N. W. 108, where a warranty deed with an agreement for reconveyance was regarded as an absolute conveyance; Flagg v. Mann, 14 Pick. 480, holding conditional sales to be valid; Johnson v. Clark, 5 Ark. 342, on the point that parties can make conditional sales to become absolute on certain contingencies; Hollingsworth v. Handcock, 7 Fla. 346, holding conditional sales will be supported when clearly the purpose of the parties; Lucketts v. Townsend, 3 Tex. 129, 49 Am. Dec. 725, discussing the distinction between conditional sales, mortgages and pawns; Fowler v. Stoneum, 11 Tex. 508, 62 Am. McGhee, 8 Yerg. 248, on the point that in a conditional sale the condition must be strictly performed. See also valuable note on this point in 17 Am. Dec. 300, 305, and Chapman v. Turner, 1 Call (Va.), 294, note.

Conditional sales.— Leaning of courts is against conditional sales, and in doubtful cases they have generally been decided to be mortgages, p. 237.

This doctrine affirmed and applied in Walker v. Farmers' Bk., 8 Houst. 261, 10 Atl. 97, same opinion in 6 Del. Ch. 91, on the point that the policy of the law is to prohibit the conversion of a mortgage into a sale; Dougherty v. McColgan, 6 Gill & J. 281, holding that, in doubtful cases, the leaning of the courts was in favor of the mortgage; Stephens v. Allen, 11 Or. 190, 3 Pac. 169; Reed v. Reed, 75 Me. 271, and Hughes v. Sheaff, 19 Iowa, 343, all holding that the character of the conveyance is determined by the intention; Hoffman v. Ryan, 21 W. Va. 429; Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 16, and Ruffier v. Womack, 30 Tex. 340, all holding the true issue to be, does the relation of debtor and creditor exist; Baugher v. Merryman, 32 Md. 192, holding a conveyance, whatever its form, taken as security, was a mortgage; Davis v. Stonestreet, 4 Ind. 105, holding equity was disposed to construe every deed taken as security to be a mortgage; Plummer v. Shirley, 16 Ind. 382, holding that, where personalty is given as security, it is a chattel mortgage; Bacon v. Brown, 19 Conn. 34, and Stoever v. Stoever, 9 Serg. & R. 447, both holding a deed, with a condition that it is to be void if a certain sum is paid by a certain day, is a mortgage; Brown v. Dewey, 1 Sandf. Ch. 64, holding an absolute conveyance by a mortgagor to a mortgagee, with an agreement to reconvey, to be a mortgage; Matthews v. Sheehan, 69 N. Y. 591, holding an absolute assignment of a life insurance policy may be shown to be a mortgage by parol. See also note to 50 Am. Dec. 196.

Mortgages.— Want of covenant to repay the money is not complete evidence that a conditional sale was intended, but it is a circumstance of no inconsiderable importance, p. 237.

Cited and relied upon as authority in Gassert v. Bogk, 7 Mont. 598, 19 Pac. 284, and Scott v. Britton, 2 Yerg. 223, 224, both holding that where there is an absolute conveyance and no obligation to pay appears, prima facie the transaction is a sale; Moss v. Green, 10 Leigh, 272, and Brown v. Dewey, 1 Sandf. Ch. 71, holding that want of such agreement is not conclusive against a contract being a mortgage; Matthews v. Sheehan, 69 N. Y. 593, holding that an absolute assignment of a policy with an absolute promise by the assignor to pay the premiums was not essential to constitute it a mortgage; Holmes v. Fresh, 9 Mo. (210) 211, holding that all the parties must have intended the transaction to be a mortgage to change an absolute deed into a mortgage; Robinson v. Farrelly, 16 Ala. 478, and Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 570, both holding that whatever its form, if security, it is a mortgage; Horn v. Keteltas, 46 N. Y. 611, holding that an absolute conveyance can be shown to be a mortgage by parol; Low v. Henry, 9 Cal. 549, discussing the admissibility of parol evidence to show a deed to be a mortgage; Hickman v. Cantrell, 9 Yerg. 182, 30 Am. Dec. 397, where a bill of sale with a covenant to reconvey on payment was held not to be a mortgage.

Distinguished in Floyd v. Harrison, 2 Rob. (Va.) 181, where one had covenanted to repay with interest.

Mortgages.— It is a necessary ingredient in a mortgage that the mortgagee should have a remedy against the person of the debtor, p. 237.

Cited in Hicks v. Hicks, 5 Gill & J. 83, holding that to constitute a mortgage the remedies must in all respects be material; Calhoun v. Lumpkin, 60 Tex. 189, and Desloge v. Ranger, 7 Mo. 330, both holding that whether a transaction is a sale or a mortgage depends upon the intent; Slutz v. Desenberg, 28 Ohio St. 377; Hubby v. Harris, 68 Tex. 95, 3 S. W. 559, and Robinson v. Cropsey, 2 Edw. Ch. 144, all holding that the criterion is whether the relation of debtor and creditor exists; Demond v. Crary, 9 Fed. 752, where a deed absolute in consideration of a debt paid for the grantor was held not to be a mortgage.

Denied in Kerr v. Kilmore, 6 Watts, 410, holding a deed of conveyance with a separate defeasance to be a mortgage.

Mortgages.— Court will examine extrinsic circumstances for the purpose of determining whether a contract is to be construed as a deed or a mortgage, p. 238.

This holding has been extensively affirmed by subsequent citing cases, as follows: Snavely v. Pickle, 29 Gratt. 31, holding that whether a deed absolute is a mortgage depends upon circumstances with the leaning in favor of the mortgage; Spence v. Steadman, 49 Ga. 138, holding that the test was whether the relation of debtor and creditor existed; in Cleveland v. La Crosse, etc., Co., 5 Fed. Cas. 1035; Scott v. Cunningham, 13 Ark. 127; Campbell v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 145, 12 Am. Rep. 682; Schriber v. Le Claire, 66 Wis. 599, 29 N. W. 892; Page v. Foster, 7 N. H. 394, and Hicks v. Norris, 5 Gill & J. 86, all holding that the transaction depends upon whether the contract is security for the repayment of money; Rockwell v. Humphrey, 57 Wis. 416, 15 N. W. 396, on the point that, if there is nothing to show an intent to transfer as security, the transaction is usually held to be a conditional sale; Nease v. Capehart, 8 W. Va. 125, holding that, where the object of a conveyance is to secure the payment of money, the right to redeem exists; McNamara v. Culver, 22 Kan. 669, 670, and Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 534, F. C. 4,847, both holding the test to be the existence of a debt; Byrne v. Marshall, 44 Ala. 357, on the point that two instruments relating to the same transaction will be considered in construing a contract; Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 21, where the court reviewed circumstances which would indicate the transaction to be a mortgage; Flagg v. Mann, 14 Pick. 478, on the point that whether there was any agreement to reconvey is material in determining; Hays v. Carr, 83 Ind. 283, where a grantee agreed to pay a debt of the grantor, and upon repayment to reconvey; Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 281, holding that a conveyance for the payment of a debt with a condition for reconveyance on repayment was a mortgage;

Murphy v. Barsfield, 27 Ala. 639, where there was a sale of slaves with words of conveyance and a stipulation for redemption; Livingston v. Story, 11 Pet. 405, 9 L. 768, dissenting opinion, where a contract of loan with an absolute conveyance was construed; Hinckley v. Hinckley, 79 Me. 323, 9 Atl. 898, where a son conveyed property to his mother and received an agreement to reconvey when an indebtedness was paid; Kroesen v. Seevers, 5 Leigh, 441, and Haynie v. Robertson, 58 Ala. 40, both holding that an absolute sale with a condition for resale was not a mortgage; Amory v. Lawrence, 3 Cliff. 530, F. C. 336, where there was a conveyance to one who was to pay a debt of the grantor and account for the balance; Rogers v. Beach, 115 Ind. 416, 17 N. E. 611, on the point that an agreement to give grantor the increased price, if the vendee should sell, does not make a contract a mortgage; Hollingsworth v. Handcock, 7 Fla. 350, where a party failed to assert his claim for a great length of time without any explanation; Jewett v. Cunard, 3 Wood. & M. 295, F. C. 7,310, on the point that an absolute deed may be changed to a mortgage by subsequent special agreement; in Hubby v. Harris, 68 Tex. 94, 3 S. W. 558; Alexander v. Rodriguez, 1 Fed. Cas. 377, and Klein v. McNamara, 54 Miss. 101, on the point that parol evidence is admissible to show the real nature of the transaction; in Hudson v. Isbell, 5 Stew. & P. 80; Huoncker v. Merkey, 102 Pa. St. 467; Lewis v. Wells, 85 Fed. 899, and Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. 299, 15 L. 648, all holding that an absolute conveyance can be shown to be a mortgage by parol; Wyman v. Babcock, 2 Curt. 398, F. C. 18,113, holding a deed may be shown to be a mortgage by the oral testimony of two witnesses against the denial of the answer; Roberts v. McMahan, 4 G. Greene, 35, holding that ordinarily oral evidence was not admissible to contradict a writing; Hatfield v. Montgomery, 2 Port. 69, where the question as to the admissibility of the testimony of a fraudulent grantor in favor of his grantee was discussed; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 147, 13 L. 930, holding extraneous evidence was admissible to inform the court of every material fact.

Distinguished on the point as to what transaction was a mortgage in Coles v. Perry, 7 Tex. 130, 150, where an instrument was held to be an executory contract of sale and not a mortgage.

Mortgages.— If the instrument was really a security for money advanced and to be repaid, it is a mortgage, and the intention of the parties would make no difference, p. 238.

Cited in Hinckley v. Wheelwright, 29 Md. 360, on the point that absolute conveyances taken as security are mortgages; Johnson v. Clark, 5 Ark. 338, on the point that a contract is a mortgage, no matter what its form of intended security for a debt; Cake v. Shull, 45 N. J. Eq. 212, 16 Atl. 435, on the point that, if no security is intended, a transaction is a sale, although there is a provision for reconveyance; in the note to 4 Am. St. Rep. 699, discussing the subject of equitable mortgages; Musgat v. Pumpelly, 46 Wis. 666, 1 N. W. 416, on the point that a court is justified in presuming the relation of debtor and creditor, where the contract is to secure an indebtedness; Alexander v. Rodriguez, 1 Fed. Cas. 381, holding a conveyance in satisfaction of a precedent debt, so that there is no personal remedy left to the creditor, is not a mortgage.

Mortgages.— Existence of a debt is a circumstance of much importance in determining whether a transaction is an absolute sale or a mortgage, p. 239.

Cited and this holding affirmed and applied in De Bruhl v. Maas, 54 Tex. 472, holding that in doubtful cases the contract will be construed to be a mortgage; Bentley v. Phelps, 2 Wood. & M. 443–446, F. C. 1,331, on the point that the relationship of debtor and creditor and the amount of the consideration are material; Douglass v. Moody, 80 Ala. 69, on the point that the absence of independent evidence of debt is a circumstance to show a conditional sale; McKinstry v. Conly, 12 Ala. 681, holding very clear evidence is necessary to create a mortgage where evidences of debt are given up; West v. Hendrix, 28 Ala. 234, holding a conveyance in consideration of a pre-existing debt was not a mortgage; Cully v. Bloomingdale, 68 Ga. 759, where a deed signed by a husband and wife, provided that if a certain sum were paid by a certain day, it should be void; Baxter v. Willey, 9 Vt. 280, 31 Am. Dec. 625; Hoopes v. Bailey, 28 Miss. 339, and Reed v. Bond, 96 Mich. 140, 55 N. W. 621, all holding that a conveyance in payment of a debt with a privilege of repurchase was not a mortgage; Winters v. Swift, 2 Idaho, 66, 69, 3 Pac. 19, 21; Glover v. Payne, 19 Wend. 521, and Galt v. Jackson, 9 Ga. 156, all holding a conveyance with an agreement for reconveyance did not show a mortgage; Sewall v. Henry, 9 Ala. 33, where a sale of a negro with a stipulation to resell if applied for in a certain time, was held not to be a mortgage; Mobile Bldg. & Loan Assn. v. Robertson, 65 Ala. 388, holding that if a contract is intended as a security it is a mortgage no matter what its form; Porter v. Clements, 3 Ark. 384, holding parol evidence was admissible to show a deed to be a mortgage; Pace v. Bartles, 47 N. J. Eq. 176, 20 Atl. 359, where the court reviewed a transaction and held it to be a conditional sale; Almy v. Wilbur, 2 Wood. & M. 384, F. C. 256, where a promise to buy machinery and let another use it for cloth at such other's factory was held not a mortgage.

Distinguished in Plato v. Roe, 14 Wis. 457, where the vendor had expressly applied for a loan.

Mortgages.— Inadequacy of consideration on a sale of property, by one much pressed for money, is a material circumstance in determining whether a contract is absolute sale or a mortgage, p. 241.

Cited in Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 537, F. C. 4,847, the court saying the true question to be determined was whether a debt still existed; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 148, 151, 13 L. 931, 932, citing authorities and holding a transaction, the consideration being grossly inadequate, to be a mortgage; in Holmes v. Fresh, 9 Mo. 210, 211; Lane v. Dickerson, 10 Yerg. 374, and West v. Hendrix, 28 Ala. 235, all holding that mere inadequacy was not sufficient to convert a sale into a mortgage; Wilson v. Patrick, 34 Iowa, 370, and Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 412, 12 Pac. 412, both holding that transactions in land intended only as a security for the performance of another act are mortgages; De Laigle v. Denham, 65 Ga. 491, where there was an absolute conveyance with an agreement for repurchase.

Miscellaneous.— Cited erroneously in State ex rel. Klein v. Pilsbury, 29 La. Ann. 790, a mandamus case; and in Bank of Mt. Pleasant v. Sprigg, 1 McLean, 182, F. C. 891, a question in estoppel.

Dec. 250, holding mail contractors not to be liable for negligence of carriers employed; Keenan v. Southworth, 110 Mass. 475, 14 Am. Mails.— Entry on post bill is not conclusive evidence of the transmission of a letter, p. 270.

Evidence.—Witness cannot be permitted to testify whether printed general instructions from the postmaster-general to a deputy postmaster superseded instructions before given, p. 270.

Bills of exceptions.— Each bill of exceptions must be considered as presenting a distinct, substantive case, p. 270.

Rule affirmed and applied in Carmichael v. Browder, 4 How. (Miss.) 433, holding that a mere statement by the clerk that certain papers were read, or a reference to papers will not constitute them a part of the record; Southwestern Va. Imp. Co. v. Frari, 58 Fed. 172, 8 U. S. App. 444, and Jones v. Buckell, 104 U. S. 556, 26 L. 841, both holding that the appellate court would not consider instructions unless the bill of exceptions contained the evidence; Doe ex dem. Commys v. Latimer, 2 Fla. 89, where the court said that if the bill was defective in any material point, it could not be supplied by intendment; New York, etc., R. R. Co. v. Madison, 123 U. S. 526, 31 L. 260, 8 S. Ct. 247, holding that rulings on questions of law will not be considered unless it appears from the bill that the facts make them material; United States v. Three Hundred and Thirty-seven Cases of Wine, 1 Woods, 50, F. C. 16,506, holding a cause would not be reversed for error in an abstract cause which the bill does not show was pertinent.

Appeals.— It is on the evidence stated in the bill of exceptions alone that the court is to decide; it cannot go beyond the bill and collect other facts, p. 270.

Rule affirmed and applied in United States v. Wingate, 44 Fed. 131, on the point that the court will not look outside of the bill to determine the correctness of an instruction; Barfield v. Impson, 1 Smedes & M. 330, holding a bill of exceptions to be the only medium of communication between the lower and higher courts; Lewis v. Baca, 5 N. C. 15,469, holding that a bill must show a party objected to the rulings; Hornbuckle v. Stafford, 111 U. S. 393, 28 L. 469, 4 S. Ct. 517, on the point that on an exception to evidence the bill should show what the excluded testimony was.

H. 552, holding the former judgment must be strictly between the same parties and upon the same matter; Greely v. Smith, 1 Wood. & M. 182, F. Appeals.—Writ of error to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia will be dismissed if the sum awarded was less than $100, although a greater sum was claimed, p. 276.

Affirmed and applied in the citing case of Kline v. Wood, 9 Serg. & R. 301, where the judgment was for less than the necessary amount, although the plaintiff claimed more; Batchelder v. Richardson, 75 Va. 837, holding that on a money demand, if the difference between the amount decreed and the amount asserted is not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, the appeal will be dismissed; Kanouse v. 7 Cr. 290-299, 3 L. 348, MIMA QUEEN v. HEPBURN.

Evidence.— Hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which fact is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge, p. 295.

C. 7,416, on the point that on the question of freedom the same rules of evidence as in other contests govern; United States v. Morris, 1 Curt. 45, 48, F. C. 15,815, on the point that evidence that a person was bought and also as a slave was admissible; Marguerite v. App. 157, holding that oral declarations of pedigree were admissible if the declarant was dead.

Evidence.— Rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove a specific fact will not be departed from because the eye-witnesses tc that fact are dead, p. 296.

Cited in Stegall v. Stegall, 2 Brock. 263, F. C. 13,351, where the court considered the effect of general reports in a neighborhood as to illegitimacy; Gregory v. L. 726, 8 S. Ct. 912, where the question was as to whether boundary could be proved by hearsay; McEwen v. Portland, 1 Or. 304, 306, holding it to be error to admit evidence of reputation to support title.

Jurors.— It is too late to object to the competency of a juror after he is sworn, p. 297.

This holding is affirmed and applied as follows: State v. Stephens, 11 S. C. 320, holding that objections to the panel or to jurors must be made before the jury were sworn; Costly v. State, 19 Ga. 628, applying the rule to a challenge for nonresidence; Tide Water Canal Co. v. Archer, 9 Gill & J. 499, holding that an objection that a juror is related comes too late upon the inquisition; Page v. State, 32 Ind. 389, where a juror though a resident was not a householder; Turner v. Hahn, 1 Colo. 28, and Kohl v. Lehlback, 160 U. S. 301, 40 L. 435, note, 16 S. S.) 701, where the court did not decide the question, but left it open.

Jurors.— Juror is incompetent in a suit for freedom who avows his detestation of slavery to be such that in a doubtful case, or if the testimony were equal, he would find for the plaintiff, p. 297.

Principle applied in Choteau v. Pierre, 9 Mo. 7, holding that in a suit for freedom it was a good cause of challenge if a juror should feel bound in conscience to find for the plaintiff; Smith v. Eames, 3 Scam. 77, 36 Am. Dec. 516, holding that a juror with decided opinions was subject to challenge for cause; Connors v. United States, 158 U. S. 413, 39 L. 1035, 15 S. Ct. 953, where the court refused to allow a juror to be asked if his political or party predilections would bias his judgment; Milan v. State, 24 Ark. 354, holding that one who would convict a negro on less evidence than he would a white man was incompetent; Stoots v. State, 108 Ind. 417, 9 N. E. 381, on the point that a person prejudiced against a business so that he would doubt the testimony of one engaged in it is incompetent; People v. Bodine, 1 Den. 309, where the effect of a fixed opinion as to guilt was considered. See also note to 9 Am. St. Rep. 746, discussing the subject of the rejection of jurors for bias.

Contracts.— Where there is a special contract for building a house and some alterations or additions are made, the special contract is considered as subsisting so far as it can be traced, p. 303.

Merger.— Sealed instrument does not extinguish simple contract where it merely recognizes an existing debt, and provides a mode to ascertain its amount and liquidation, p. 303.

Cited in Langdon v. Paul, 20 Vt. 221, holding that a sealed instrument certifying that the maker had executed certain notes and waiving the statute of limitations did not supersede the remedy on the notes; Baker v. Merger.— Mere recital of a prior in a later agreement, after it has been executed, does not extinguish the former, p. 304.

Corporations may by mere vote or other corporate act, not under their corporate seal, appoint an agent whose acts and contracts within the scope of his authority would be binding upon the corporation, p. 305.

The following cases cite, approve and variously apply this principle: Green v. State, 8 Ohio, 314, where the appointment of a superintendent was by parol; Everett v. United States, 6 Port. 182, 30 Am. Dec. 588, and State v. Allis, 18 Ark. 280, both holding that a corporation may appoint an agent whose acts within his powers would be valid without a seal; Fitch v. Lewiston Steam Mill Co., 80 Me. 38, 12 Atl. 734, holding that this was the rule whatever the purpose of the agency; Garvey v. Colcock, 1 Nott & McC. 233, holding that while a corporation cannot act directly except under seal, it may appoint by vote an agent whose acts will be binding; Davis v. Memphis, etc., Ry. Co., 22 Fed. 886, on the point that a president may employ attorneys without any contract under seal; Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 829, 6 L. 226, holding that it was unnecessary for an attorney to produce authority under seal; The Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. 143, 147, 15 Am. Dec. 708, 711, holding a corporate seal was not essential to an agreement to convey real estate; Female Orphan Asylum v. Johnson, 43 Me. 184, holding that a corporation empowered to make contracts in writing is not thereby authorized to confer that power on their officers; Savings Bank v. Davis, 8 Conn. 207, 210, on the point that a corporation cannot convey or mortgage except by its corporate seal; Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Harr. & G. 421, holding that acts of corporations may now be evidenced by writing without seal; Hamilton v. Lycoming Ins. Co., 5 Pa. St. 344, holding that corporations may contract by parol within the sphere of their proper functions; Crawford v. Longstreet, 43 N. J. L. 329, holding a lease for years need not be under seal; Commercial Bank v. Newport M. Co., 1 B. Mon. 14, 35 Am. Dec. 172, and Butts v. Cuthbertson, 6 Ga. 171, both holding that a note given by an agent within his powers bound the corporations;

Maynard, 15 Ill. 478, holding that a warrant issued by tax commissioners without a seal was valid.

Denied in Frankfort Bank v. Anderson, 3 A. K. Marsh. 3, holding that a corporation can only bind itself by a seal, and that a banking corporation is no exception.

Corporations.— All parol contracts made by its authorized agents are express promises of the corporation, and all duties imposed on them by law, and all benefits conferred at their request, raise implied promises binding on the corporation, p. 306.

Indemnity.— Judgment against the person to be indemnified, if fairly obtained, and especially if obtained on notice to the warrantor, is admissible in a suit against him on his contract of indemnity, p. 322.

Judgments.— Any fact which proves it to be clearly against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself but was prevented by fraud or accident unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery, p. 336.

The citations on this point are a striking tribute to the "great chief justice." They show how extensively the courts have approved and relied upon his statement of this doctrine of law; and approve and apply it as follows: Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 10, 27 L. 349, 2 S. Ct. 31; Phillips v. Negley, 117 U. S. 675, 678, 29 L. 1015, 1016, 6 S. Ct. 905, 906, and Hood v. New Haven, etc., R. R. Dec. 469, where a holder agreed to discharge a maker on receiving the note of a third person, and receiving such note proceeded to judgment; Purviance v. Skipwith, 26 Miss. 350, where there was a misunderstanding between counsel, and the court relieved against a judgment because of a mistake of fact; Dunn v. Fish, 8 Blackf. 409, and Lieby v. Dec. 735, holding that no degree of wrong in the determination of a cause would entitle one to relief; Walker v. Shreve, 87 Ill. 477, holding that the mere fact of judgment by default in trespass is for a much greater sum than it ought to have been is not ground for relief; Stilwell v. Carpenter, 59 N. E. 653, where equity refused to relieve against a judgment rendered without service of process in the absence of any showing of equitable grounds; Ridgway v. Eq. 470, where a judgment was enjoined because of a defense unknown to the defendant at the trial; Hughes v. Nelson, 29 N. J. Eq. 551, holding that a judgment at law is no bar in equity on matters which are grounds of equitable relief only; Stevens v. R. Co. v. Field, 86 Ill. 273, where relief was granted so as to enable one to have the benefit of a set-off; Robinson v. Wheeler, 51 N. H. 386, holding equity would not suspend proceedings to enable the defendant to obtain an adjustment of partnership concerns that he may set off a balance due him, unless the bill shows a balance will be due him; Gaines v. Hale, 26 Ark. 197, holding that a judgment based on a certificate of entry which has been properly cancelled will not be enforced; Carter v. C. 13,609, where a judgment to recover property of a debtor recovered in another State was enjoined; Governor v. St. Rep. 242, where the subject of relief in equity against judgment is discussed at length; and note to 19 Am. Dec. 138, citing cases on the power of equity to relieve against judgments.

Judgments.— Equity will not relieve from a judgment on account of a defense which if good anywhere was good at law, and which plaintiff was not prevented by the act of the defendants or by any pure or unmixed accident from making at law, p. 336.

Upon this point also the citing cases are numerous: Kersey v. Rash, 3 Del. Ch. 339, holding that the loss of a case through a party's own laches will defeat his claim; Duncan v. Lyon, 3 Johns. Ch. 357, 8 Am. Dec. 516, where relief was denied to one because of delay; Doyle v. Reilly, 18 Iowa, 113, 85 Am. Dec. 585, on the point that plaintiff must be unmixed with fault or negligence himself; Thomas v. Thomas, 88 Wis. 93, 59 N. W. 506, where a petition was denied because if the petitioner was ignorant, it was through negligence; Schroeppell v. Shaw, 3 N. Y. 452, holding that the passive neglect of a creditor to enforce a bond and mortgage gave no ground for relief to a surety; Kearney v. Smith, 3 Yerg. 132, 24 Am. Dec. 552, where complainant alleged that his plea in abatement was unexpectedly stricken out and a plea to the merits required instanter, which being filed, the cause was put to the jury without his witnesses; Huston v. Ditto, 20 Md. 324, holding that a defense available at law and lost by acquiescence in the decision was not ground for relief; George v. Tutt, 36 Mo. 142, where it was held that a party properly served who failed to appear would not be relieved; Shricker v. Field, 9 Iowa, 372, where the court said that the negligence of one's attorney was no ground for relief; Richmond Enquirer Co. v. Robinson, 24 Gratt. 552, holding that the negligence of an officer of a corporation would exclude the corporation; Prater v. Robinson, 11 Heisk. 395, where the court refused relief against a default which was grossly unjust, the party not being without fault and having an attorney; Green v. Dodge, 6 Ohio, 83, 25 Am. Dec. 738, holding a judgment will not be relieved against because the complainant incorrectly stated his case or made a false admission in another action; Miller v. Palmer, 55 Miss. 335, where a purchaser at an administration sale was held not to be negligent because he in good faith relied upon the validity of the proceedings; Oregon, etc., Co. v. Gates, 10 Or. 518, holding that generally equity would not interfere to relieve a defendant who has neglected to make his defense; Brown v. County of Buena Vista, 95 U. S. 159, 24 L. 423, holding a court will not relieve where the party has been guilty of laches or fault; Life Ins. Co. v. Bangs, 103 U. S. 783, 26 L. 609, holding that a bill will not lie where the complainant sets up matters which he had full opportunity to plead; Warner v. Eq. 30, holding that matters of defense which came to complainant's knowledge since the trial, are proper grounds for an injunction and requiring discovery.

Other citing cases affirm this principle in making the following holdings: Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Wall, 1 Or. 296, 299, holding that ignorance of a material fact was not a ground as the party had a remedy at law; Phillips v. Pullen, 45 N. J. Eq. 6, 16 Atl. 10, holding equity would not enjoin a judgment because it was unjust; Galveston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Dowe, 70 Tex. 4, 6 S. W. 792, holding an injunction would not lie to correct errors of an inferior court, even when no appeal would lie; Rosenberger v. Bowen, 84 Va. 663, 5 S. E. 699, holding that equity will not interfere on the ground that the judgment was erroneous; Miller v. Duval, 26 Md. 52, where the principal grounds for equitable interposition were the refusal of the court to admit testimony and the insolvency of the defendant; Skirving v. Nat. L. Ins. Co., 59 Fed. 744, 19 U. S. App. 442, where a judgment fairly and regularly obtained against a school district on warrants was not enjoined, although there was a good defense at law; Barnett v. Hiller, 52 Miss. 11, where the court said that a complainant seeking a new trial must establish to a high degree of certainty the validity and potency of his defense; Miller v. Doxey, Walk. (Miss.) 333, dissenting opinion, p. 338, where the court refused to grant relief where the case was wholly cognizable at law and the new proofs were merely cumulative; Pierce v. Winter Iron Works, 32 Ala. 74, holding that a set-off available either at law or in equity is not ground for relief; Parker v. Morton, 5 Blackf. 2, on the point that if defense was set up and tried at law, equity will not interfere; Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 17 How. 445, 15 L. 124, on the point that equity will not relieve unless complainant has an equitable defense of which he could not avail himself at law; Pollock v. Gilbert, 16 Ga. 405, 60 Am. Dec. 737, holding that equity would interfere if the execution of the decree would be against conscience and that such fact could not be taken advantage of at law; Bassett v. Henry, 34 Mo. App. 556, where the court interfered to stay enforcement of a judgment which in equity and good conscience had been paid; McCoy v. President, etc., of Bank of U. S., 5 Ohio, 552, holding that indorsers charged at law on the ground of being secured, cannot be relieved where subsequently deprived of the security fund in favor of a previous lien; Semple v. Hagar, 27 Cal. 169, where relief was sought from a judgment on the ground of fraud; Smith v. Nelson, 62 N. Y. 289, holding a judgment would not be annulled for fraud if there was a good defense and the facts were known; Blackburn v. Ch. 526, where a judgment was relieved against because of illegality of the contract, the defense not being set up, through ignorance; Knox County v. Harshman, 133 U. S. 154, 33 L. 588, 10 S. cate of entry which has been properly cancelled, will be annulled; Mattingly v. Williams, 8 How. 161, 12 L. 1030, on the point that the Supreme Court on its equity side is capable of imposing its own terms on the party to whom it grants relief. See also note to 19 Am. Dec. 603, on power of equity to relieve against judgments at law.

Insurance.— Misrepresentation of the age and tonnage of a vessel by which the insurers agreed to a higher valuation is no ground for relief in equity where the plaintiffs were not prevented or disabled from using it in an action on the policy, p. 338.

Cited in Phœnix Ins. Co. v. McLoon, 100 Mass. 476, on the point that valuation of a subject insured in a policy is conclusive in the absence of fraud.

7 Cr. 339–348, 3 L. 364, LOCKE v. UNITED STATES.

Information for unloading goods without a permit under section 50 of the collection law of March 2, 1799, is sufficient, although the time and place of the importation and the vessel in which it was made are not alleged, p. 344.

Cited and applied in Hartford v. United States, 8 Cr. 110, 3 L. 504, construing section 50 of the collection act of 1799, requiring a permit for the landing of goods; United States v. United States, 125 U. S. 231, 31 L. 740, 8 S. Ct. 842, dissenting opinion, 237, 31 L. 742, 8 S. Cas. 373, on the point that in libels on information to enforce forfeitures, pleading according to the terms of the statute is sufficient; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. 330, 4 L. 402, upon the point as to the degree of certainty required in an information; American Ins. Co. v. Johnson, Blatchf. & H. 15, F. C. 303, the court saying that the true spirit of all pleadings is to give notice to the opposite party of the charge; Clifton v. Ct. 170, where a president of a bank was indicted for embezzling property of the institution; United States v. Whiskey, 28 Fed. Cas. 537, where amendments to the information by adding counts were allowed.

Probable cause.— Term "probable cause" means less evidence than would justify condemnation, and in all cases of seizure has a fixed and well-known meaning; it imports a seizure made under circumstances which warrant suspicion, p. 348.

Cited in The Thompson, 3 Wall. 162, 18 L. 57, applying this principle to a case where a captured vessel was restored without costs or damages; United States v. Ship Recorder, 2 Blatchf. 121, F. C. 16,130, holding it made no difference whether the collector acted under a mistake as to facts or as to the law; The Ship La Manche, 2 Sprague, 214, F. C. 8,004, where a vessel was led into the predicament in which she was found by the mistakes of the revenue officers of the captor's own government; The George, 1 Mason, 27, F. C. 5,328, holding that justification from probable cause may be forfeited by subsequent misconduct or negligence; United States v. The Reindeer, 27 Fed. Cas. 768, holding that the court will certify that reasonable cause existed for the seizure, when there was ground for suspicion; United States v. Three Bales of Cloth, 28 Fed. Cas. 108, holding the fact that the public appraiser reported that certain goods were invoiced 19 per cent. below their market value, was of itself reasonable ground of suspicion; The Gala Plaid, Brown's Adm., 7, F. C. 5,183, holding that where goods are restored, a claimant cannot recover damages where the officer was warranted in the seizure; Averill v. Smith, 17 Wall. 92, 21 L. 616, holding trespass would not lie when the seizure was made by the collector where it was his duty to make it; Brown v. Griffin, Chev. L. 33, holding that a true bill found constituted a presumption of probable cause; Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 357, holding that under the act to prevent traffic in liquor a finding of liquor was evidence of probable cause; Sarah B. Harris, 1 Hask. (Fox's Dec.) 60, F. C. 12,344, holding that a verbal assent from a customs officer to land goods was not a compliance with the act of 1799; United States v. One Sorrel Horse, 22 Vt. 657, holding a horse was within the provisions of an act requiring one importing "merchandise" to give a manifest; The City of Mexico, 25 Fed. 925, the court saying that persons who carry on trade up to the brink of illegality must avoid at their peril additional circumstances of suspicion; United States v. Three Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty Boxes, 8 Sawy. 133, 12 Fed. 405, holding that where opium was seized, the burden of proof is on the claimant to show the property was of domestic manufacture; The Brig Busy, 2 Curt. 587, F. C. 2,232, holding that the having on board of a considerable number of cigars not entered and with no account of their purchase and price was sufficient to put the burden on the claimant; Chaffee v. United States, 18 Wall. 546, 21 L. 914, on the point that the burden of proof is on the claimant where probable cause was shown for the seizure; Lilienthal's Tobacco v. United States, 97 U. S. 265, 24 L. 904, holding an instruction that if one violated the revenue laws the burden was on him to prove it was not done to defraud the government, to be correct.

The principal case was said to be qualified in its interpretation of the words "reasonable cause" in United States v. Diamond Rings, 1 Sprague, 297, F. C. 16,572, where the court considered what was a sufficient concealment of goods under the collection law of 1799.

Miscellaneous.— Cited on the point that statutes prescribing for the seizure of things without service of process have been held constitutional in Glennon v. Britton, 155 Ill. 245, 40 N. E. 598, holding a statute authorizing search warrants was constitutional. Cited erroneously, Smith v. Montoya, 3 N. Mex. 11, 1 Pac. 181.

Embargo.— Condemnation for violation of embargo act is proper where a vessel originally American was captured and condemned and purchased by her former master, an American, and took on goods other than the provisions and stores necessary for the voyage and cleared out as a Dane, p. 349.

Cited on the point as to the right to withhold freight where goods are damaged in Bradstreet v. Heron, Abb. Adm. 214, F. C. 1,792, holding that consignees are entitled to a reasonable opportunity to ascertain whether the goods correspond in quantity and condition.

Statute of limitations.— In Maryland the statute of limitations does not run against accounts between merchant and merchant, either of whom resided out of the province, p. 353.

Cited in West v. Hymer, 7 Ohio, 236, on the point that "beyond seas" and "out of the State" are analogous; Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 483, 22 Am. Dec. 62, upon the power and duty of a State to refuse to admit an application of a public law adopted by other States for regulating international rights.

Distinguished in Didier v. Davison, 2 Sandf. Ch. 69, where the accounts between the merchants were within the statutory bar.

Statute of limitations.— Averment that a creditor had come within province so as to set the statute of limitations in motion, is not sufficient unless it aver that the plaintiff had become a resident of the State within such time as to cause the statute to run, p. 354.

Insurance.— Underwriter on the cargo of a ship is not responsible for the payment of freight where there was an abandonment, p. 362.

Cited in Indianapolis Ins. Co. v. Mason, 11 Ind. 182, note, where a flat boat stranded and sank and it became necessary to reship the cargo, which was damaged; Shultz v. Ohio Ins. Co., 1 B. Mon. 345, holding that the law of insurance is scrupulous in scrutinizing the cause of loss; Daniels v. Atlantic M. S. Co., 24 N. Y. 454, on the point that the existence of a lien on a cargo for freight does not vary the legal responsibility of the underwriter of such cargo after abandonment; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 12 Wheat. 396, 6 L. 670, holding that freight was not a charge upon the salvage of a cargo in the hands of the underwriters, whether the assured is owner of the ship or not.

Shipping.— Freight pro rata itineris is not due where a voyage has been abandoned unless there is a voluntary acceptance of the goods themselves at an intermediate port, p. 362.

The following cite, affirm and apply this principle: The Ann D. Richardson, Abb. Adm. 504, F. C. 410, holding that without delivery at destination the acceptance at an intermediate place was necessary to enable the shipowner to recover freight; Halwerson v. Cole, 1 Spears L. 323, 40 Am. Dec. 604, where a vessel put into an intermediate port owing to stress of weather, where the vessel was sold; Brown v. Harris, 2 Gray, 360, holding that passage money may be recovered back on the breaking up of a voyage; The Ship Nathaniel Hooper, 3 Sumn. 550, 551, 554, F. C. 10,032, where a vessel struck on a reef, part of her cargo jettisoned, and she abandoned; Marcardier v. The Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cr. 50, 3 L. 484, where a technical total loss was sought on the ground of deterioration of the cargo; Sampayo v. Salter, 1 Mason, 44, F. C. 12,277, where a vessel was captured and condemned at an intermediate port and part of the cargo was restored and sold at the same port; Shultz v. Ohio Ins. Co., 1 B. Mon. 339, holding an insurance company not to be liable for the extra freight incurred by transshipment; Weston v. Minnot, 3 Wood. & M. 442, 444, F. C. 17,453, holding that freight contracted for in gross cannot be apportioned for part unless an apportionment becomes feasible and just; Rogers v. West, 9 Ind. 407, note, on the point that freight pro rata itineris is never allowed unless there is a new contract express or implied; Rossiter v. Chester, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 176, where a vessel was by stress of weather compelled to put into an intermediate port and the goods were there accepted; Adams v. Haught, 14 Tex. 254, holding it was not acceptance where a vessel was compelled to put into an intermediate port and the master refusing to repair, the owner received the goods; Welch v. Hicks, 6 Cow. 510. 16 Am. Dec. 445, holding that the acceptance must be voluntary. See note to 60 Am. Dec. 154, citing cases on the subject of freight pro rata itineris; Rosenberg v. Frank, 58 Cal. 405, as to the meaning of the words "pro rata" where these words in a will were construed.

Discussed and disapproved in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 12 Wheat. 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 6 L. 672, 673, and said to be a hasty decision against pro rata freight. Distinguished, Scow No. 190 and Four Hundred, etc., Bales of Cotton, 88 Fed. 321, holding where there are several distinct carriers for different stages of the transportation, a pro rata recovery may be had where goods are damaged in transit and sold.

Nonintercourse act.— On an information for violation of nonintercourse act the evidence to sustain a conviction should be so strong as to fully satisfy the mind of the fact it is intended to establish, p. 365.

Nonintercourse act.— On an information against a vessel for violation of the nonintercourse act, evidence of the identity of the vessel is sufficient when it impresses the mind with a conviction almost irresistible, p. 365.

Election.— Widow is put to an election where provision is made for her in the will and it is manifest the testator did not intend the provision to be in addition to her dower, for the same person cannot hold both under and against a will, p. 378.

Affirmed and followed in Wright v. West, 2 Lea. 81, 31 Am. Rep. 588, holding that a widow who is insane and did not dissent from a will may in equity claim as if she had dissented; Washburn v. Exemplification.— If a record from another court is certified in the manner prescribed by statute, evidence that the attestation is not in due form is not admissible and the record so authenticated is properly admitted in evidence, p. 412.

This ruling is approved and the principle applied in the following citing cases: Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 414, 43 Am. St. Rep. 122, 38 Pac. 90, where the question was as to how proof was made of probate of a foreign will; Giles v. by a deputy clerk is insufficient; Duncommun v. Hysinger, 14 Ill. 251, on the point that the judge need not certify to the official character of the clerk; Haynes v. Dec. 700, holding a certificate is sufficient if it complies with the form prescribed in the place where made; Bonesteel v. Sullivan, 104 Pa. St. 13, where an exemplification of papers as the same remain on file was held admissible; Edmiston v. Distinguished in Richardson v. Hobart, 1 Stew. 504, 18 Am. Dec. 72, where a decree was held to be evidence although the whole record was not produced.

Evidence.— Writing which is a mere transcript to the minutes of a court is not admissible, p. 412.

Cited and rule applied in Pepin v. Lachemeyer, 45 N. Y. 32, where a transcript from the docket of a court was held inadmissible under the act of congress; Donald v. McKinnon, 17 Fla. 748, where it was held that enough should appear to show jurisdiction; In re Coleman, 15 Blatchf. 426, F. Variance is immaterial where it does not change the nature of the contract, p. 414.

Weaver, 2 Port. 545, where a variance in the description of a contract did not change its nature or legal effect; Drake v. Fisher, 2 McLean, 73, F. H. 161, 162, holding that declarations for false affirmations on an express contract need not contain the precise words used; Moore v. Lake Co., 58 N. H. 255, holding the expressions "would draw lumber to the pond of said mill" and "would deliver lumber to said mill" were equivalent; State Bank v. Godfrey, 3 Ala. 184, where a contract was alleged to be for services for a particular year and the contract produced was for one year; Connolly v. Cottle, Breese, 365, where the note declared on was payable to the plaintiff and the note produced was payable to the creditors of a third person jointly; Stone v. Lawrence, 4 Cr. C. C. 11, F. tion was for the sale of a condenser and the evidence was of the sale of various articles, the variance was fatal.

7 Cr. 487–496, 3 L. 414, OLIVER v. MARYLAND INS. CO.

Shipping.—An idle waste of time, after a vessel has completed the purposes for which she entered a port, is a deviation which discharges the underwriters, p. 490.

Cited in Natchez Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 2 Smedes & M. 376, 41 Am. Dec. 595, holding that the taking of a brig in tow amounted to a deviation; Riggin v. Patapsco Ins. Co., 7 Harr. & J. 291, 16 Am. Dec. 308, holding a fear of capture at the port of destination founded on mere rumors will not justify a deviation.

Distinguished in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 12 Wheat. 390, 6 L. 668, where the court said that whether a delay constituted a deviation depended upon the usage of trade.

Shipping.— If a vessel exhausts the whole time at one port which, according to the usage, was allowable only for the purpose of taking in the whole cargo, the subsequent delay at another port, for the purpose of completing the cargo, is unreasonable and will discharge the underwriters, p. 491.

Cited and principle applied in Hostetter v. Park, 137 U. S. 40, 34 L. 572, 11 S. Ct. 4, on the point that touching at a port out of the course is no deviation where such departure was within the usage of trade; Constable v. National S. S. Co., 154 U. S. 66, 38 L. 911, 14 S. Ct. 1068, holding that the berthing of a ship at a pier other than her own was not in legal effect a deviation; Hostetter v. Gray, 11 Fed. 181, holding that after the express provisions of the contract, the usage of the trade was the predominating test as to deviation; Thatcher v. McCulloh, Olcott, 370, F. C. 13,862, where it was the known usage of trade and navigation to touch at this intermediate port.

Shipping.—Apprehension of danger of capture will justify a vessel in remaining in a port; but the danger must be obvious and immediate in reference to the situation of the ship at the particular time, p. 493.

Cited in Crosby v. Fitch, 12 Conn. 421, 31 Am. Dec. 749, on the point that a pretended danger will not justify any unusual or hazardous experiment.

Miscellaneous.— Cited on the point that if there was negligence, one is liable for loss, although the immediate cause of the loss was an act of God, in Morgan v. Dibble, 29 Tex. 120, 94 Am. Dec. 268.

King, 1 Whart. 459, on the point that a penalty does not arise on an offer to do the act where it is consequent on an act completed.

Rule affirmed and applied in The Martha, 1 Blatchf. & H. 166, F. C. 9,144, where the court said that courts of admiralty dealt liberally with suitors in matters of practice; Anonymous, 1 Gall. 26, F. 7 Cr. 500–504, 3 L. 419, RIGGS v. LINDSAY.

Bills and notes.— One authorizing another to draw upon him is liable to such other in an action for money paid, for the amount of the drafts, protest and costs, if he fails to accept and pay them in consequence of which the other is compelled to take them up, p. 503.

Rule approved and followed in Greene v. Goddard, 9 Met. 223, holding that one requesting another to draw bills of exchange, undertook and was liable to indemnify him for so doing; Bowen v. 7 Cr. 504–506, 3 L. 420, McINTIRE v. WOOD.

Mandamus.— Power of Circuit Courts to issue mandamus is confined exclusively in those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction, p. 506.

This important decision, following in the wake of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cr. 137, 2 L. 60 (q. v.), left the Circuit as well as the Supreme Court without power to issue mandamus except in aid of a jurisdiction already otherwise acquired. The citing cases indicate other applications and developments of the doctrine: Gares v. Northwestern, etc., Assn., 55 Fed. 210, holding that Circuit Courts could not issue mandamus even when, in the State where the court sits, mandamus was regarded as a civil action; Smith v. Jackson ex dem. Allyn, 1 Paine, 455, F. C. 13,064, holding that mandamus will not lie to a District Court to compel it to expunge amendments improperly made in the record; United States v. New Bedford Bridge Co., 1 Wood. & M. 438, F. C. 15,867, holding that the Circuit Court has such jurisdiction only as is conferred upon it; Ladd v. Tudor, 3 Wood. & M. 332, F. C. 7,975, where the question was whether a Federal court could issue the writ to a State court; In re Forsyth, 78 Fed. 301, where the court refused to issue mandamus on the petition of a receiver in a State court as against a clerk of the District Court; United States v. Judges, etc., 85 Fed. 179; S. C., sub nom. In re Harless, 56 U. S. App. 35, rule applies to Circuit Court of Appeals, where there was an application to compel judges to admit one to bail; Ex parte Van Orden, 3 Blatchf. 169, F. C. 16,870, on the point that Federal courts cannot issue mandamus to any magistrate other than to those in the District of Columbia; Ex parte Crane, 5 Pet. 206, 8 L. 98, holding that the Supreme Court could compel a circuit judge to sign a bill of exceptions; Fisk v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 6 Blatchf. 396, 397, F. C. 4,827, holding that mandamus was not necessary to enforce affirmative action to remove a cause from a State to a Federal court; State v. Lake Erie & W. Ry. Co., 85 Fed. 3, holding that an application for a mandamus begun in a State court is not removable to the Federal court; Rosenbaum v. Board of Supervisors, 11 Sawy. 621, 28 Fed. 224, holding that the jurisdiction could not be conferred by commencing the proceedings in a State court and removing them to a Circuit Court; in the same case on appeal in 120 U. S. 453, 454, 455, 30 L. 745, 7 S. Ct. 634, 635, affirming the same principle; United States v. Plumer, 3 Cliff. 61, F. C. 16,056, holding that a writ of error coram nobis does not lie to the Circuit Court in a criminal case; Denton v. Baker, 79 Fed. 194, 48 U. S. App. 44, holding that a holder of a judgment against an insolvent national bank on a claim rejected by a receiver cannot resort to mandamus; Lyell v. Supervisors of Lapeer Co., 6 McLean, 456, F. Smith, 5 Tex. 478, holding the writ will lie to the heads of departments where the duty is plain and there is no discretion; Van Antwerp v. Hulburd, 7 Blatchf. 433, F. C. 16,826, holding that the Circuit Court could not compel an officer to perform a ministerial duty; Hoover v. McChesney, 81 Fed. 482, on the point that courts cannot interfere with the conduct of an officer except where the duties are ministerial; Enterprise Sav. Assn. v. Zumstein, 67 Fed. 1007, 37 U. S. App. 71, on the point that discretionary acts will not be controlled; Litchfield v. The Register & Receiver, Woolw. 312, F. W. 861, holding that mandamus would lie to correct an arbitrary exercise of discretion.

Carolan, 9 Tex. 253, where the question was whether mandamus would lie to the clerk of the District Court to compel the approval of an appeal bond; Bledsoe v. International R. R. Co., 40 Tex. 557, where there was an application to compel the countersigning and registering of bonds by the controller; Kuechler v. 7 Cr. 506–548, 3 L. 421, LIVINGSTON v. MARYLAND INS. CO.

Insurance.— False representation, though no breach of the contract, if material, avoids the policy on the ground of fraud, p. 535.

Cited in Marshall v. Columbian M. F. I. Co., 27 N. H. 166, holding that, in an application for fire insurance, whatever is material to the risk should be set forth correctly in the application; Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 8 How. 248, 12 L. 1066, where there was a representation that no lamps were used; Callaghan v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Edw. Ch. 77, holding that the assertion of a material circumstance in an unqualified manner, without knowledge, vitiates the policy.

Insurance.— To constitute a representation, there should be an affirmation or denial of some fact, or an allegation which would plainly lead the mind to the same conclusion. If expressions are ambiguous, insurer ought to ask an explanation and not substitute his own conjectures for an alleged representation, p. 536.

Cited in Nicoll v. American Ins. Co., 3 Wood. & M. 536, F. C. 10,259, on the point that, if the representations are ambiguous, the defendant should ask for explanations before taking the insurance; Allegre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 2 Gill & J. 160, 20 Am. Dec. 429, holding that orders for insurance must be liberally construed and with respect to the situation and circumstances of the parties.

Insurance.— Concealment of papers in general amounts to a breach of warranty; but this rule does not apply where, by the usage of trade, such papers ought to be on board, p. 536.

Residents.— A Spanish subject coming here to carry on trade between this country and the Spanish provinces under a royal Spanish license, and remaining during the war between Spain and Great Britain, is to be considered an American merchant, whether he carried on trade generally or confined himself to a trade from the United States to the Spanish provinces, p. 537.

Cited in Elbers v. United Ins. Co., 16 Johns. 134, on the point that a bona fide settler is deemed to be a resident.

Insurance.— Usage of trade to take on board certain papers is to be considered by the jury in determining whether such taking on board avoided a policy, p. 537.

Insurance.— In estimating materiality to the risk of papers taken on board, their effect, taken together, should be considered, not of one of them by itself, p. 538.

Notice.— Paper which expressly refers to another paper within the power of the party gives notice of the contents of that other paper, p. 538.

Abandonment.— Whether abandonment was in reasonable time or not is not a fact to be left exclusively to the jury, but to be decided by them under the direction of the court, p. 539.

Captures.— Such acts or omissions as would induce a capture and detention according to the common practice of belligerents are proper for the consideration of the jury in estimating the risk, p. 540.

Instructions.— Party has a right to direct and positive instructions, and the jury are not to be left to believe in distinctions where none exist, or to reconcile propositions by mere argument and inference, per Story, J., p. 544.

Principle approved and applied in Campbell v. Campbell, 54 Wis. 98, 11 N. W. 458, holding that a refusal in slander of a proper instruction as to the damages was error; Cahn v. Reid, 18 Mo. App. 136, holding one was entitled to instructions on every legal phase of the case justified by the evidence; Gray v. McDonald, 28 Mo. App. 492, where the court said the principle governing should be substantially stated in the instructions; Koontz v. Kaufman, 31 Mo. App. 420, holding that a party has a right to direct and positive instructions; Rives v. McLosky, 5 Stew. & P. 337, holding that

Dec. 432, where the evidence clearly showed that the instruction asked was relevant; Long v. Rodgers, 19 Ala. 337, holding that a charge, if full and fair, is not erroneous, although not in the language requested; Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 272, holding that where one requests a charge in the presence of the jury, and the court replies, "I will charge it," without anything more, it is error; Blake v. Smith, 3 Fed. Cas. 606, on the point that misdirection affecting the result is ground for setting aside a verdict; Snyder v. Laframboise, Breese, 346, 12 Am. Contracts.— Joint contract can never be defeated by the mere private contract of an individual to whom the others have confided no authority, p. 568.

Cited in Lawrence v. Vilas, 20 Wis. 391, on the point that a debt owing by one of two or more partners cannot be set off against a partnership demand.

Demurrer to evidence is allowed or denied in the exercise of a sound discretion under all the circumstances of the case, p. 568.

Roe, 1 Hill, 472, note, where cases on the office and effect of a demurrer to evidence are collected; Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 68, 1 S. E. 340, holding the rule that discretionary matters are not reviewed must be confined to cases which are purely matters of discretion or such as in their result cannot do injury; Jenkins v. Demurrer.— Party demurring to evidence must admit as true, not only all the facts proved by the evidence introduced by the other party, but also all the facts which that evidence legally may conduce to prove, p. 568.

Cited and principle applied in Johnson v. United States, 5 Mason, 436, F. C. 7,419, holding that a party demurring is bound to admit all the facts the evidence conduces to prove; Nolan v. Cited in Morrison v. McKinnon, 12 Fla. 558, holding that it is discretionary with a court to compel one to join in a demurrer to evidence; Catlin v. FEBRUARY TERM, 1814.

GRIFFITH v. FRAZIER.

Present—All the Judges.

So long as a qualified executor is capable of exercising the authority with which he has been invested by the testator, that authority cannot be conferred, either with or without limitation by the court of ordinary, on any other person. And if during such capability of the executor, the ordinary grant administration, either absolute or temporary, to another person, that grant is absolutely void. If a judgment be rendered against one as executor who is not executor, it does not bind the estate of the testator, and an execution upon such a judgment could not legally be levied upon such estate. By the law of South Carolina, administration durante absentia testatoris, cannot be granted after probate of the will and letters testamentary granted.

The acts of a tribunal, upon a subject not within its jurisdiction, are void.

By the law of South Carolina the 30 day rule is substituted for a scire facias to a judgment in those cases only where lapse of time prevents the plaintiff from suing out execution.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the South Carolina District.

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought by the plaintiff in the Circuit Court (who was also plaintiff in error), to recover a tract of land lying in the District of South Carolina, and in the possession of the defendant, to which the plaintiff asserted a title derived from a certain Joseph Salvadore.

Both parties admitted that Salvadore was legally seized of an estate, in fee, in the land in dispute. It appeared further, that Salvadore had executed several bonds in favor of a certain Daniel Bordeaux; that Bordeaux brought an action against Salvadore on these bonds, and obtained thereon a judgment by default, which was entered up and signed on the 30th of August, 1786; that no further steps were taken in the cause until the 2d of January, 1787, when an execution issued thereon, and was lodged in the sheriff's office on the same day; that Salvadore departed this life on the 29th of December immediately preceding. Salvadore left a will and two or three codicils, by which he appointed his three daughters, a certain William Stevens, and a certain Joseph Dacosta, his executors. All these persons were absent, out of the state, excepting Dacosta, who proved the will and codicils, and regularly qualified as executor thereto, on the 5th of January, 1787; he continued to reside in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, until some time in the year 1789, when he went to Savannah, in the state of Georgia, where he continued to reside until 10*] *November, 1790. On the second day of October, 1790, one James Lamotte requested and obtained from the ordinary of Charleston a citation, in behalf of the principal creditor of Salvadore, who was Bordeaux, to show cause why letters of administration with the will annexed should not be granted to him. On the return of the citation, no cause being shown to the contrary, the ordinary did, on the 8th of October, 1790, grant general letters of administration with the will annexed, on the estate of Salvadore, to Lamotte. A certificate was also obtained from the ordinary, by which it appeared that it was the custom of the ordinary court to grant letters of administration durante absentia of the executor. Bordeaux, on the 27th January, 1791, obtained a rule from the court of Common Pleas, against Lamotte, as administrator of Salvadore, to show cause within thirty days why the judgment obtained against Salvadore, as aforesaid, should not be revived, and an execution issue thereon. This rule was made absolute on the 15th of March, 1791, "subject to future argument." On the 16th of April following (no further argument or proceeding having been had on the said rule and no court intervening in the meantime), an execution issued on said judgment, against Lamotte, administrator, &c., was lodged in the sheriff's office, and levied upon the land in question, by the sheriff, on the 11th of May, 1791. The land was sold at public outcry to the highest bidder, on the 6th of June, 1791, and by a deed of the same date was conveyed by the sheriff to Peter Freneau, the purchaser. On the 16th of July, 1796, a decree was rendered in the suit, Pierce Butler v. Daniel Bordeaux and Peter Freneau, directing the said Peter to convey to such person as Pierce Butler should appoint. In pursuance of this decree Peter Freneau conveyed to Samuel Jackson, under whom Griffith, the plaintiff in this case, claims by regular conveyances. Frazier, the defendant, represents the heirs of Salvadore.

On the motion of the defendant the Circuit Court instructed the jury, that the letters of administration granted to James Lamotte were totally void; that therefore the judgment of Bordeaux was not revived against the estate of Salvadore; that the sale and conveyance by the sheriff passed no title to the purchaser; and that *the evidence was not sufficient to [*11 maintain the plaintiff's action. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was rendered in his favor. The plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the court, and sued out a writ of error to the judgment.

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, after stating the facts of the case, contended,

1st. That the letters of administration, being durante absentia of the executor, were lawfully and properly granted by the ordinary to James Lamotte.

2d. That the question whether the granting of these letters were legal or not, was a question proper for the decision of the court of ordinary; and that the judgment of that tribunal was conclusive until reversed on appeal to the state court having competent jurisdiction; that, consequently, the sale in the present case was valid, and the plaintiff's title good.

Jones, contra,

1. The grant of administration durante absentia was absolutely void: which being the case, it is clear that the subsequent sale of the property in question by the sheriff was illegal and invalid.

Dacosta, the executor, had duly qualified; and the circumstance of his having absented himself from the state of South Carolina for the space of twelve months, is a matter of no importance, unless at the same time he was incapable of performing his duty as executor. But this does not appear to have been the fact. The ordinary therefore had no right to grant letters of administration to Lamotte.

As to the certificate, said to have been given by the ordinary, stating that it was the custom of the ordinary court to grant administration durante absentia of an executor, it would be shown, on the part of the defendant, that in every case which could be produced in support of that custom the executor had not qualified.

The jurisdiction of the ordinary relative to 12] the appointment *of an administrator is determined by the act of the testator in appointing an executor. The administrator derives all his rights from the court of ordinary, and nothing from the will. (1 Com. Dig., 340; 1 Salk., 302 [Toler ex'r., 76, 98]; 2 Bac. Abr., 381, 386, 401; 2 Plowd., 271.)

The grant of letters of administration has, in some cases, been decided to be void, even after the refusal of the executor to take upon himself the execution of the will. (2 Bac. Abr., 386; Went., 145.)

The ordinary, in granting administration, is a ministerial, not a judicial officer. (Toler, 50, 66; Jac. Law Dict., Tit. executor; 12 Mod., 437.)

In the case under consideration, the executor had proved the will; and it did not appear to the ordinary that there were any goods and chattels unadministered. If this were the fact, the ordinary had no jurisdiction in the case. (2 Bac. Abr., 385; Griffith's collection of South Carolina laws, p. 35, 492; Ober's administrator v. ———, MS. report of a case decided in South Carolina.)

By the statute of 38 Geo. 3 (c. 87), to remedy the defect of the law in not giving to the ordinary the power of appointing an administrator durante absentia of an executor who had proved the will, it was evident that, previous to that statute, the ordinary possessed no such power. That statute was so explained in the case of Taynton v. Hannay (3 Bos. and Pul., 26; Toler, 104).

When the executor had taken upon himself the trust of executing the will, the goods were out of the jurisdiction of the ordinary. (Went., 39; 4 Burn's Eccl. Law.)

If the jurisdiction of the ordinary ceased upon the qualification of the executor, all his subsequent acts in relation to the business were void. (3 T. R., 130; Toller, 128.) The Supreme Court of the United States has decided this principle in cases analogous to the present. (4 Cranch, 241, Rose v. Himely; 3 Cranch 331, Wise v. Withers.) Where a court has no jurisdiction in regard to a particular subject, trespass will lie against a sheriff for executing its orders relative thereto.

*2. Admitting the administration granted [13 to Lamotte to have been rightful, yet the execution against him, under which the land in question was sold, was absolutely void; because the thirty day rule, under which the plaintiff attempted to revive the judgment in this case, was admissible only where the judgment had expired by lapse of time merely; but was not competent to revive a suit or a judgment against the representative of a dead party, which could only be done by scire facias, and no scire facias having issued in this case to make Lamotte a party, the execution against him was absolutely void for want of a judgment whereon to ground it. (Griffith's collection of S. Carolina laws, 466, 7, sec. 7.)

Pinkney, Attorney-General, same side.

The principal if not the only point in controversy is, whether the court of ordinary had jurisdiction in the case now under consideration.

The ordinary in receiving probate of a will acts ministerially; and when the will is proved he is functus officio. The authority of the executor is derived from the will. The only power of the ordinary is to ascertain the existence of the will.

If administration be granted upon the supposition that no will exists, and a will afterwards appear, all the proceedings under the administration are void; the administration is a mere nullity. (Toler, 120, 121.)

If there be a will, administration cannot be granted until the executor has refused or neglected to appear on summons. (Toler, 93.)

If administration be granted durante absentia of the executor, it becomes void upon the return of the executor and probate of the will. After probate the ordinary has no further jurisdiction.

The reason of the thing is obvious. The will vests the testator's property in the executor. He has a right after probate to appoint an attorney. But according to the doctrine contended for by the plaintiff, the ordinary *may [14 also appoint an attorney in the place of the executor. This would be a manifest inconsistency. The executor, after accepting the trust, is bound to administer, and is liable for the goods entrusted to him. See MS. report of the case of Ford v. Travis, in the Court of Appeals of South Carolina, in which the court decided unanimously that after probate of a will, the grant of administration is void although the executor is absent.

Harper, in reply.

If this case is against the plaintiff in error, it is a case of sheer law against justice. The plaintiff in error is a fair, bona fide, purchaser without notice, under the sanction of the decrees of the courts of the state where the land lies.

The principle contended for by the defendant is only true as to the general disposition of the estate. It does not apply to the temporary interference of the ordinary in particular cases the peculiar circumstances of which render such interference necessary; such as cases of administration durante minori ætate, ad colligenda bona, &c.

In the case of Ford v. Travis, cited by the counsel on the opposite side, the ordinary had granted unlimited administration for all purposes and forever; but in the case now before the court, the grant of administration is special and temporary, as appears by the recital in the letters themselves.

The grant of these letters was nothing more than the appointment of a curator. In England the ordinary has a general power to issue letters of administration durante absentia. The statutes of Edw. 3 and H. 8, it is true, did not give a direct authority to grant administration in any case where there was an executor; but a practice grew out of the equity of those statutes, to grant temporary administration during the inability of the executor to act; as pendente lite, minori, ætate, executor insane, &c. (2 P. Williams, 576, Walker v. Wollaston.)

The general power of the ordinary to grant 15] administration *ceases on the probate of a will in which an executor is named; but not his power over the estate for special, temporary purposes. The case in P. Williams, just cited, in which case probate had been granted, states the reasons for this temporary interference. The reason for granting administration durante absentia is the same as for granting it durante minori ætate. The degree of the necessity makes no difference; it is sufficient that there is a necessity. It is said that the executor may appoint an attorney. True; but suppose he does not; suppose that, without so doing, he abandons the estate, and leaves the country. Would not this be a case for the interference of the ordinary in the temporary appointment of an administrator? The only inference that can be drawn from the statute of Geo. 3, c. 87, which has been cited on the other side, is, that the power of the ordinary to grant administration in such cases was doubted; not that it did not exist; and so is the case in 3 Bos. & Pul., 26, to be understood. The statute of Geo. 3 is only declaratory of the common law; it does not enact a new law.

Such, then, is the doctrine in England on this subject. In South Carolina it is the same. Until the year 1712, there is no trace of the existence of ordinaries in South Carolina. In that year an act was passed declaring the statutes of 13 Edw. 1, c. and 31 Ed. 3, c. 11, to be in force in that colony, and enacting that the powers mentioned in those acts as belonging to the ordinary in England, shall be exercised by the same kind of officer in South Carolina.

The act of 1744, directing the manner of returning inventories, speaks of ordinaries as then existing.

The act of 1789, directing the manner of grauting probate and administration, gives that power to the county courts in those counties where such courts were established, and, in the other counties, leaves it to the ordinaries.

The statute of H. 8 is not in force in South Carolina. The common law is.

16*] *The doctrine, therefore, relative to the subject under consideration is the same in South Carolina as in England; and the power of the ordinary is the same.

That it has been the practice of the ordiuary court to grant administration durante absentia, the defendant does not deny, but urges that it has never, until the present case, been granted after probate by the executor. Perhaps not; but the reason is that no such case has before occurred. If it had, there is no doubt that the ordinary court would have granted administration as it has now done. The courts of the same description in England would have done the same. If they had not, the legislature would have interfered.

2. The judgment of the ordinary is conclusive that he acted judicially, and upon a subject properly cognizable by his court. Therefore, even admitting that he erred in granting the letters of administration to Lamotte, yet Lamotte was administrator de facto, and his acts bound the estate of Salvadore until those letters should be revoked.

That the subject was one properly cognizable by the ordinary, cannot be denied. He had jurisdiction under the equity of the statutes already cited, to grant temporary administration. He had jurisdiction to ascertain whether or not there was a will of personal property; aud no prohibition would lie to his proceedings. In a contest between two persons of the same name, both claiming to be executor, he might decide which of the two was entitled to administer the estate. He was competent to put such a construction upon the statutes as he might think correct, and to ascertain his powers growing out of the equity of those statutes. His judgment, therefore, in the present case, unless reversed on appeal to the Court of Common Pleas of South Carolina, was conclusive in every other court where it might come incideutally in question. Yet this court is now called upon not only to declare the judgment of the ordiuary void, and to reversed the same, but to reverse, also, that of the Appellate Court by which his judgment has been confirmed.

3. The judgment on which the execution in this case *issued, was properly revived [17 by a court of competent jurisdiction, and its judgment can be questioned only in an appellate court.

The judgment was revived by a thirty day rule. That rule was, in fact, a scire facias. The proceeding was conformable to the usual practice in South Carolina. The Court of Common Pleas of that state adjudged the execution to be awarded upon this revival. Can this court, under such circumstances, reverse that judgment? Suppose the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas had been founded on a scire facias, and that scire facias had been informal. Could this court, in such a case, reverse the judgment? We contend that it could not in either case. The court that ordered the execution to be awarded had jurisdiction so to do; and its decisiou is final.

The 9th section of the law of South Carolina, respecting the thirty day rule to revive judgments, &c., gives express authority to the courts of that state to issue execution without a scire facias. But it is objected that this act is applicable only to cases of lapse of time, not to cases of the death of the party. But this is matter of construction on which those courts were competent to decide.

The doctrine in the case of Ford v. Travis, so much relied upon by the defendant's counsel, is only that an unconditional, unlimited, administration, where the executor has previously obtained probate of the will, is void; not that a temporary administration would have been so in a like case.

4. Admitting the execution to have been improperly issued, still the sale of the property under that execution was valid.

All acts under a judgment obtained by fraud are valid; a fortiori, if the judgment be founded on a mistake either of law or fact. (3 Cranch. 306, Simms and Wise v. Slacum.)

It is laid down in 2 Bac. Abr., 270 (Tit. Execution), that "if upon his judgment the plaint-18 iff takes out a fieri facias*, and thereupon the sheriff sells a term for years to a stranger, and the judgment is afterwards reversed, the defendant shall only be restored to the money for which the term was sold, and not to the term itself; for by the writ the sheriff had authority to sell; and if the sale may be avoided afterwards, few would be willing to purchase under executions, which would render writs of execution of no effect." The following authorities go to establish the same point. (Roll. Ab., 778; Cro. Eliz., 278; Cro. Jac., 246; 8 Rep., 96, Matthew Manning's case; Id., 142, Dr. Drury's case; 1 Wils., 302, Earl v. Brown.) It is true that these cases all relate to sales of personal property; but there is no difference as it respects the sale of lands under a fieri facias, or what was equivalent thereto, as in the present case. These lands were sold as personal effects. (1 Haywood's N. Carolina Reports.)

Pinkney, contra, contended,

1. That the case in 3 Bos. & Pul. did not state that the statute of Geo. 3 was founded on a doubt, but upon a clear defect of jurisdiction. That no case could be found to sanction the grant of administration after probate in a case like the present. That the case of Ford v. Travis was decisive that no such administration was valid in South Carolina.

2. That the judgment of the ordinary was not conclusive that he had no jurisdiction in a case like that under consideration. That the Court of Appeals of South Carolina was of this opinion, and had therefore declared the judgment of the ordinary void. (2 Bac. Abr., 376.)

3. That the judgment on the rule to show cause was not conclusive; and this, besides the other reasons which have been already mentioned, because it was against a person not a representative of the testator.

4. That this was not the case of a sale to a third person, as in the authority cited from Bacon, and the other cases to the same point; but that the plaintiff claimed under Bordeaux, as a purchaser.

*That the statute of South Carolina, [19 respecting the thirty day rule, was only applicable to cases of lapse of time, not to cases of the death of the party.

That as to the case in 1 Wils., 302, cited by the plaintiff's counsel, it did not appear that the court decided on the validity of the sale, nor that any person wished to disturb it.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The plaintiff in error, who was also plaintiff in the Circuit Court, brought a writ of trespass quare clausum fregit, in order to try his title to certain lands, lying in the District of South Carolina, which were in possession of the defendant.

The title of the plaintiff, which constituted the sole question in the cause, appeared on the trial to be as follows:

Joseph Salvadore, being seized of the lands in which the trespass is alleged to have been committed, departed this life some time in the year 1786, having first made his last will in writing, in which he named several executors, one of whom, Joseph Dacosta, made probate of the will, and took upon himself the burden of executing the same; after which, in the year 1789, he left the state of South Carolina, and resided in Georgia. In the year 1790, letters of administration on the goods of Salvadore, unadministered by Dacosta, his qualified executor, were granted to James Lamotte.

In August, 1786, a judgment was obtained by Daniel Bordeaux against Salvadore. In January, 1791, a thirty day rule, which, by an act of the state of South Carolina, was, in certain cases, substituted in the place *of a [20 scire facias, was issued to revive this judgment against Lamotte as administrator of Salvadore. This rule being served and returned, the following indorsement was made on it: "15th March, 1791, made absolute subject to a future argument."

"Fi. fa. 16th April, 1791."

An execution issued on this judgment, under which the land was sold, and was conveyed by the sheriff to Peter Freneau by a deed dated the 6th day of June, 1791. On the 16th of July, 1796, a decree was rendered in the suit, Pierce Butler v. Daniel Bordeaux and Peter Freneau, directing the said Peter to convey to such person as Pierce Butler should appoint. In pursuance of this decree, Peter Freneau conveyed to Samuel Jackson, under whom the plaintiff claims by regular conveyances.

On the motion of the defendant, the Circuit Court instructed the jury that the letters of administration granted to James Lamotte were totally void; that therefore the judgment of Bordeaux was not revived against the estate of Salvadore; that the sale and conveyance by the sheriff passed no title to the purchaser; and that the evidence was not sufficient to maintain the plaintiff's action. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was rendered in his favor. The plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the court, and has sued out a writ of error to the judgment.

The sole defect alleged in the title of the plaintiff being in that part of it which depends on the sale and conveyance of the sheriff to Peter Freneau, the validity of that sale is the principal if not the only question in the cause. In support of it the plaintiff contends,

1st. That the letters of administration, being durante absentia of the executor, were properly granted to James Lamotte.

2d. If the ordinary erred in granting these letters, still Lamotte was administrator de facto; and his acts bound the estate of Salvadore until those letters should be revoked.

*3d. That the judgment on which the [21 execution issued was properly revived by a court of competent jurisdiction and its judgment can be questioned only in an appellate court.

The negative of these propositions is maintained by the defendant in error.

That the appointment of an executor, and his acceptance of the office, constitute a complete legal owner of the personal estate of the deceased is admitted; but it is contended that these acts suspend without annihilating the power of the ordinary. So long as the executor is capable of exercising the authority with which he has been invested by the testator, it can be conferred on no other person; but when he becomes incapable, from any cause whatever, as by insanity or death, the power of appointing some person, who shall secure the estate from ruin, necessarily reverts to that tribunal which the law appoints for the general purpose of providing for the management of the property of dead persons. All cases of temporary administration, as during the minority of an executor, or during his absence previous to the probate of the will, are considered as exercises of the same power, though in a less degree, and as proving that the ordinary may, after the executor has qualified, if he shall absent himself so as, in the opinion of the ordinary, to disqualify him from performing his duty, appoint an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, whose power shall continue until the return of the executor.

The court does not concur in this reasoning. In the cases stated at bar, and in all cases where temporary administration has been granted, unless under a special act of the legislature, the executor was, for the time, absolutely incapable of performing his duty. There existed an actual legal disability to perform the functions of his office. Until probate of the will, and until letters testamentary are obtained, the executor cannot obtain any judgment; because it cannot appear that he is executor.

There is, therefore, an absolute neeessity for appointing some person who, until probate, 22] shall take care of *the estate. But this is not the case with an executor who, after taking out letters testamentary, absents himself from the state. He is still capable of performing, and he is still bound to perform, all the duties of an executor. There exists no legal disability in the executor, and, consequently, there is no necessity for transferring to another those powers which the testator has conferred on a person selected by himself.

This power does not appear ever to have been exercised by the ordinary in England anterior to the statute of 38 George 3d; and in South Carolina, the ordinary possesses no power which was uot possessed by the ordinary in England previous to that statute. The practice of the particular ordinary who acted in this case would not be sufficient to constitute the law, had it even never received judicial reprobation; but the case of Ford v. Travis puts an end to any doubt on this point.

The second point is one of more doubt and greater intricacy. That the ordinary erred in granting letters of administration to Lamotte, is thought very apparent; but the effect of these letters is less obvious. By the plaintiff it is contended, that they constituted Lamotte an administrator de facto, rendered his acts valid, so far as third persons are interested, and exempted them from question where they can be examined only incidentally. By the defendant it is contended, that they were granted by a person having no jurisdiction in the case, and are therefore an absolute nullity; that Lamotte was not, de facto, the administrator of Salvadore, and that his acts, as administrator, stand on no better or higher ground than the acts of any other person who should assume that character.

The well-known distinction between an erroneous act or judgment by a tribunal having cognizance of the subject-matter, and the act or judgment of a tribunal having uo cognizance of the subject, is not denied; but it is contended that the ordinary had jurisdiction in this case. The ordinary, in South Carolina, is the court in which wills are proved; in which letters testamentary and letters of administration are granted. He judges whether the applicant be entitled to administration or not, and rejects or admits the claim, according *to [23 his opinion of the law. Whether his judgment be correct or not, still it is his judgment; and when exercised upon an application for administration, it is exercised on a subject cognizable in his court.

That he grants letters of administration in cases not expressly authorized by statute, and in which a will exists in which an executor is named, proves that he has jurisdiction in such cases; and if he grants administration in one of them improperly, the judgment is erroneous and voidable, but not void.

This argument has been very strongly urged, and there is great force in it. The difficulty of distinguishing those cases of administration in which a court having general testamentary jurisdiction may be said to have acted on a subject not within its cognizance, is perceived and felt. But the difficulty of marking the precise line of distinction, does not prove that no such line exists.

To give the ordinary jurisdiction, a case in which, by law, letters of administration may issue, must be brought before him. In the common case of intestacy, it is clear that letters of administration must be granted to some person by the ordinary; and though they should be granted to one not entitled by law, still the act is binding until annulled by the competent authority; because he had power to grant letters of administration in the case. But suppose administration to be granted on the estate of a person not really dead. The act, all will admit, is totally void. Yet the ordinary must always inquire and decide whether the person whose estate is to be committed to the care of others, be dead or in life. It is a branch of every cause in which letters of administration issue. Yet the decision of the ordinary that the person on whose estate he acts is dead, if the fact be otherwise, does not invest the person he may appoint with the character or powers of an administrator. The case, in truth, was not one within his jurisdiction. It was not one in which he had a right to deliberate. It was not committed to him by the law. And although one of the points occurs in all cases proper for his tribunal, yet that point cannot bring the subject within his jurisdiction.

24*] *The case of letters of administration granted on the estate of a person in full life, is not the only one which may serve for illustration; suppose administration to be granted on the estate of a deceased person whose executor is present, in the constant performance of his executorial duties. Is such an appointment void, or is it only voidable?

In the opinion of the court it would be an absolute nullity.

The appointment of an executor vests the whole personal estate in the person so appointed. He holds as trustee for the purposes of the will, but he holds the legal title in all the chattels of the testator. He is, for the purpose of administering them, as much the legal proprietor of those chattels, as was the testator himself while alive. This is incompatible with any power in the ordinary to transfer these chattels to any other person by the grant of administration on them. His grant can pass nothing; it conveys no right; and is a void act.

If the ordinary possesses no power to grant administration where an executor is present performing his duty, what difference can his absence make, provided that absence does not disqualify him from executing his trust? If all his powers as an executor remain, if he is still capable of appearing in courts of justice as the representative of the deceased, if he is still the legal owner of the chattels of the deceased, and still capable of disposing of them, it would seem that he is potentially present though personally absent. It is not easy to perceive any principle on which the ordinary can assert his power to take the estate out of the executor and vest it in an administrator. If he cannot do this then, the attempt to do it must be a void act. If the administrator durante absentia be only the agent of the executor, it still occurs that the executor can himself appoint, and is the proper person to appoint, his own agent. There is no necessity for the intrusion of the ordinary.

Let the case be supposed of a suit by the executor while actually resident abroad. Would he be incapable of sustaining the action? Would 25] his absence be a good *plea in bar? If it would not, how can the grant of letters of administration to another take the property in the thing sued for out of the executor and place it in that other?

Letters testamentary, when once granted, are not revocable by the ordinary. He cannot annul them, or transfer the legal interest of the executor to any other person. His rights and his duties are beyond the reach of the ordinary. How, then, can this be effected by the grant of letters of administration?

The cases in which administration has been granted notwithstanding the existence of a will, appear to be cases in which it is not apparent that there is any person possessing right in the chattels of the testator, or cases in which that person is legally disqualified from acting.

Where administration is granted pending a dispute respecting a will, it is not certain that there is an executor, or that there is a will.

If it be granted during the minority of an executor, it is because the executor is legally disqualified from acting, and indeed has not taken upon himself, and could not take upon himself the trust reposed in him. He may, when of age, reject all the rights and powers conferred by the will; and, consequently, the interest is not yet a vested interest. The rights and powers of the ordinary remain until those of the executor commence.

So in the case of an absent executor who has not yet made probate of the will and qualified. Those letters testamentary which are indispensable to his character as executor, and which, during their existence, leave the ordinary without any further power over the subject, are not yet granted. The executor has as yet no evidence that he is executor. He is not yet able to act as one. He may never be able to act; for he may never take out letters testamentary. He may renounce the executorship. The ordinary, then, is not yet deprived of that power which he possesses to appoint a person to represent a dead man who has no representative. His *jurisdiction over the subject remains [26 until he parts with it by issuing letters testamentary.

The difference between granting administration in cases where there is a qualified executor, capable, in law, of acting, and where he has not qualified, is such as, in reason, to justify the opinion that though, in the latter case, the ordinary may have jurisdiction, and his act, though erroneous, may be valid till repealed, yet, in the former case he can have no jurisdiction, and his act is in itself an absolute nullity.

If, under any circumstances, the ordinary could grant administration during the absence of an executor who has made probate of the will and is legally competent to act, then he would have jurisdiction of the subject, and would judge of those circumstances; but if, in no possible state of things, he could grant such administration, it would be difficult to conceive how he can have jurisdiction.

If we refer to authority, we can find no case and no dictum which admits the jurisdiction of the ordinary, where there is an existing executor capable of acting. In many cases it is stated that an administration granted where there is such an executor, is void. Toller, in his "Law of Executors" (page 120), says: "If there be an "executor, and administration be granted be- "fore probate, and refusal, it shall be void on "the wills being afterwards proved, although "the will were suppressed, or its existence were "unknown, or it were dubious who was ex- "ecutor, or he was concealed, or abroad at the "time of granting the administration." It is also void "if granted because the executor has become a bankrupt," or if granted "durante "minoritate where the infant had attained his "age of seventeen," until the statute of 38 G. 3. So "if granted by a bishop where the intestate "had bona notabilia, or by an archbishop of "effects in another province."

The case of Ford v. Travis, decided in South Carolina, is express to this point, and renders a further reference to English books unnecessary.

The counsel for the plaintiff admits this to be the law *where an absolute administra- [27 tion is granted; but denies the law to be applicable to the grant of a temporary administration.

However correct this distinction may be in many cases, its application to that at bar is not admitted.

No temporary administration can be granted where there is an executor in being, capable of acting, and where the case will not justify the grant of a temporary administration, it would seem to be as completely out of the jurisdiction of the ordinary as the grant of an absolute administration, where that is not within his power.

The case, put by Toller, of administration durante minoritate where the executor is of the age of 17, seems full in point. This is a temporary administration, and the minority of the executor is a fact for the consideration of the ordinary. Yet if, in such a case, he grants administration, the act is void, because, in fact, it is not a case in which he can grant it.

The reasoning of the court in the case of Ford v. Travis appears applicable to this case. They say the executor having proved the will, "was in the nature of a trustee; he could neither abandon his trust nor be deprived of his interest in the estate of the deceased by any act of the ordinary. The ordinary, by proving the will and qualifying the executor, executed his power; and no law exists in this state authorizing him to resume it during the life-time of the qualified executor, notwithstanding he may be absent from the state. Letters of administration granted under such circumstances are void ab initio.

If the ordinary cannot resume his power so as to grant an absolute administration, he cannot resume it for a limited time. He cannot, by any act of his, devest the interest of the executor for an instant. The power may revert to him by operation of law, but cannot be assumed by any act of his own.

The grant of a temporary administration, as during the minority of an executor, is ad usum 28] *et commodum executoris. But in this case the administration is, for the time, absolute, and makes the administrator the entire representative of the deceased. It would not be unworthy of remark, if the case depended on it, that though the application of Lamotte was for administration during the absence of the executor, yet the grant itself is without limitation.

But, in its very nature, the appointment of an administrator, during the absence of an executor under no disability, is essentially nothing more than the appointment of an agent for that executor. This, the ordinary has not the power to do. The executor alone can appoint his agents.

If the ordinary had no jurisdiction in the case, then the grant of administration was void ab initio, and all the acts of the grantee are void. (Toller, 128; 3 Term. Rep., 125.)

It is contended by the plaintiff, that could this administration even be considered as null, where that forms the direct question before the court, as it did in Ford v. Travis, yet that point cannot be examined where it is collateral and incidental.

The answer which has been given at bar to this argument is entirely satisfactory. The question has never been examined in a court of law sitting as an appellate court. The question has never been, whether the letters of administration shall be revoked or not, but whether they were originally void, so as not to warrant the particular act in support of which they were alleged.

But in this case the letters of administration come as directly before the court as in the case of Ford v. Travis. The conveyance from the sheriff to Freneau forms a part of the plaintiff's title; and the validity of that conveyance may depend on the question whether Lamotte was or was not the administrator of Salvadore. The question, therefore, must necessarily be decided; and a majority of the court is of opinion that administration was granted by a court having no jurisdiction in the particular case, and is therefore absolutely void.

*3d. It is contended on the part of the [29 plaintiff, that the judgment on which the execution issued was properly revived by a court of competent jurisdiction, whose judgment is therefore conclusive until reversed.

The first objection made to this judgment of revivor is, that it was made without legal process. The thirty day rule is substituted for the scire facias only in cases where lapse of time prevents the plaintiff from suing out execution.

However this court might construe the law on an appeal from a judgment of revivor in such case, that question has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, and cannot be reviewed here.

The second objection is, that the letters of administration being a mere nullity, no party representing the estate of Salvadore was before the court, and consequently the judgment could not bind that estate.

This question is one of considerable difficulty. Had the judgment been revived against the executor himself, without the service of process, it would perhaps, while in force, have protected all proceedings under it. But this judgment is revived against Lamotte, who was not the representative of Salvadore. In the opinion of a majority of the court, an execution on this judgment could not legally be levied on the property of Salvadore; and if so, the title was not vested in the sheriff by the service of the execution, and could not be conveyed by him to the purchaser. Upon this point, the case cited from 1st Wilson, 302, is a strong one against the opinion of the court; but in that case, the execution, though irregular, was issued on a real judgment, and justified the sheriff in taking the effects of the deceased. On its face it was unexceptionable. It issued at an improper time; but in all other respects was correct. In this case the execution issued on a judgment which was itself a nullity; and it authorized the sheriff to take the effects, real and personal, of Joseph Salvadore in the hands of James Lamotte to be administered. Now, the property of Salvadore was not in the hands of Lamotte, but was in the hands of his executor.

*The case in Wilson, too, is so briefly, [30 I might say obscurely, reported, as to leave the principle on which the court decided entirely uncertain. It does not appear that the object of the motion extended further than the restoration of the money. This was not an attempt to set aside the sale; and nothing appears in the case from which is to be conclusively inferred what the opinion of the court would have been on that question.

In the opinion of a majority of the court, there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it is affirmed with costs.

Wednesday, February 16th. Harper observed that he understood the opinion of the court to be founded considerably on the form of the fieri facias, inasmuch as it directed the sale of the lands of Salvadore in the hands of Lamotte, when, in fact, there were no lands in the hands of Lamotte.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.

That was one ground of the opinion; but another was, that the sale was founded on a void judgment.

Harper, as to the first point, suggested to the court that the form of the fieri facias was against the lands as well as the goods.

VAN NESS v. FORREST.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

A promissory note, given by one member of a commercial company to another member, for the use of the company, will maintain an action at law by the promisee in his own name, against the maker, notwithstanding both parties were partners in that company, and the money when recovered would belong to the company.

If the declaration be upon a joint note, and the defendant plead that the note is the separate note of one of the defendants, and was given to and accepted by the plaintiff in full satisfaction of the debt, this plea is bad upon special demurrer, because it amounts to the general issue.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

The case as stated by MARSHALL, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

31*] *The defendant in error, who was president of a commercial company consisting of four or five hundred members, sold certain merchandise, the property of the company, to Jehiel Crossfield, and took his note payable in twenty days to Joseph Forrest, president of the commercial company, for the purchase money. Default having been made in payment, Joseph Forrest instituted a suit against Jehiel Crossfield and John P. Van Ness, who was a dormant partner of Crossfield, and also a partner of the commercial company.

The declaration contains several counts. The first is on the promissory note, which is charged as the note of Crossfield and Van Ness, trading under the firm of Jehiel Crossfield. The second and third, for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered, the fourth for money had and received by the defendants, to the use of the plaintiff, and the fifth on an insimul computassit.

The defendant, Van Ness, pleads the general issue, on which plea issue is joined.

He also pleads in bar several special pleas, amounting in substance to this, that the several assumpsits in the declaration mentioned, were made for goods, wares, and merchandise belonging to the commercial company, consisting of many partners, and of which both the plaintiff and himself were members.

The third plea alleges, that the plaintiff did agree to accept and did accept the separate promissory note of the said Crossfield, in payment of all and singular the debt and debts, promises and assumptions in the plaintiff's said declaration above supposed; in pursuance and execution of which agreement aforesaid, the said defendant, Jehiel Crossfield, made the said promissory note in the plaintiff's said declaration mentioned, and delivered the same to the said plaintiff, on the day of the date of the said note, at the county aforesaid, and the plaintiff then and there accepted the same as payment, in pursuance of the aforesaid agreement.

To these several special pleas the plaintiff in the *court below demurred specially, and [32 the defendant joined in demurrer.

On argument the demurrers, except to the third plea, were overruled, and the pleas sustained as to the 2d, 3d and 4th counts, but the demurrers were sustained as to the 1st and 5th counts of the declaration. The demurrer was also sustained as to the 3d plea, which was adjudged bad as to all the counts.

On the trial of the issues, Van Ness objected to the evidence offered by the plaintiff below, to support the first count, and his objection being overruled, excepted to the opinion of the court. This exception brings on the whole question made by the pleas on the point, that the goods for which the note was given were partnership goods belonging to a company of which both the plaintiff and defendant were members.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff below, on which judgment was rendered, and the cause is brought into this court by writ of error.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error, contended,

1st. That this action is not sustainable, it being brought by one partner against another. And 2d, That the separate note of Crossfield was a discharge of the original debt due from Crossfield and Van Ness.

1. An action does not lie by one partner against another, unless for a balance stated and acknowledged upon settlement of the partnership accounts.

The suit was as much for the use of Van Ness as of any other of the stockholders. The plaintiff was only a conventional president. The stockholders must all join in the action, and then Van Ness would be both plaintiff and defendant.

2. The plea states, that the plaintiff agreed to take the separate note of Crossfield in full satisfaction for the goods sold and delivered. This was decided by this court to be a good defense in the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville (6 Cranch, 253).

J. Law*, contra. [*33

It is true that one partner cannot sue another on an implied promise, but he may upon an express promise. (2 T. R. 479, Foster v. Allanson; 1 East, 20, Wright v. Hunter.) After verdict, the promise shall be taken to be express. (4 Cranch, 224, Grant v. Nailor.)

The defendant cannot set up a trust to defeat the plaintiff's legal right to recover. If the trustee of a feme sole should bring an action against the husband, he could not defend himself by pleading that the money, if recovered, would be for the use of his wife, and that the wife could not sue him at law. The defendant cannot be permitted to look behind the legal plaintiff for the purpose of setting up an inequitable defense. If this doctrine were to prevail, private banking companies could not recover money lent to stockholders.

The causes of demurrer assigned are, that the plea amounts to the general issue; and that the plea neither admits nor denies the promise laid in the declaration.

Jones, in reply.

The cases cited do not take this case out of the general principle, that one partner cannot sue another.

This is not an express promise of the defendant. It is only by implication that he is charged. It is a promise that the law raises upon the fact that he is a partner with him who expressly promised. In all the money counts, the promise is implied.

As to the objection that the plea amounts to the general issue. That point is settled also in the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It is contended by the plaintiff in error,

1st. That this action is not sustainable, it being brought by one partner against another.

34*] *2nd. That the separate note of Crossfield discharges the original debt, due from Crossfield and Van Ness.

As the first error assigned by the plaintiff is, if it be really an error, appareut ou the bill of exceptions, as well as in the pleas, it is not necessary to examine the formality of the pleas respecting it.

It is alleged that, at law, one partner can sue another on a claim growing out of the partnership in no other case than for a general balance on a stated account.

The terms in which this proposition has been laid down are perhaps too general.

In the case at bar, the suit is instituted on a promissory note given, not to the company, but to Joseph Forrest, president of the company. Although the original cause of action does not merge in this note, yet a suit is clearly sustainable on the note itself. Such suit can be brought only in the name of Joseph Forrest. It can no more be brought in the name of the company than if it had been given to a person not a member, for the benefit of the company. The legal title is in Joseph Forrest, who recovers the money, in his own name, as a trustee for the company. Upon the record, and technically speaking, he is the sole plaintiff, and the court can perceive no reasonable or legal objection to his sustaining an action on the note. The principle that a company cannot sue its members, does not apply to the case; nor does the principle, that a partner cannot sue a partner on a partnership transaction, apply to any case where a note in writing is given for money, not to a firm, but to an individual member.

The third plea alleges, that the plaintiff in the court below agreed to accept the separate promissory note of Crossfield in payment, and that, in execution of this agreement, Crossfield made the note in the declaration mentioned, which was accepted in payment of the several assumptions stated in the declaration.

Now, the note, in the declaration mentioned, is a joint note, so that this plea in one place alleges it to be a joint note, and in another place to be a several note.

*It becomes unnecessary to inquire into [*35 the effect of this repugnancy, if it be one, because the plea, if to be understood as averring that the note, in the declaration mentioned, is a several and not a joint note, would amount to the general issue. The plea is no more, to the first count, than non assumpsit. For if the note was not the note of Van Ness, he had not made the assumpsit stated in the first count. This is ill upon a special demurrer, when assigned as cause of demurrer.

The plaintiff in error supposes the case of Sheehy v. Mandeville & Jamesson, reported in 6th Cranch, 253, to be a case in his favor, on this point. The court thinks otherwise. In that case, as in this, a note was given by one partner for a debt contracted by the firm. In that case, as in this, one count in the declaration was special, on the note, stating it to be a joint note, and other counts were general, on the original transactions. The defendant, whose name was not on the note, stated it to have been received in discharge of the open account. The court decided that the plea was good, not in bar of the special count on the note itself, but in bar of the general counts, for goods sold and delivered.

Upon the special count, the court was in favor of the plaintiff below, who was also plaintiff in error, and the judgment of the Circuit Court, which had been against him, was reversed. The case of Sheehy v. Mandeville & Jamesson, then, is not in favor of the plaintiff in error, so far as his third plea applies to the first count in this declaration.

This court is of opinion, that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court either in sustaining the demurrers to the several pleas filed in that court to the first count in the declaration, or in admitting the note, in the declaration mentioned, to be given in evidence to the jury, on the trial of the issue of fact. This opinion renders it unnecessary to examine the decision of the Circuit Court, as it respects the pleas to the other counts, since, should their decision respecting the pleas to those counts even be deemed erroneous, their judgment will stand.

Judgment affirmed with costs, and damages, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and costs.

*THE BANK OF ALEXANDRIA [*36
v.
HERBERT.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

The trustee of an insolvent debtor in the District of Columbia, represents the creditors of the insolvent, and can take advantage of a defect in a mortgage, of which the insolvent himself could not.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in chancery at Alexandria.

A bill in chancery was brought by W. Herbert, Jr., trustee for the creditors of John Potts, an insolvent debtor under the act of Congress for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia, against the bank of Alexandria, to recover the proceeds of a tract of land, the property of Potts, which had been sold by consent and the money deposited in the bank. This land had been conveyed by Potts to Ludwell Lee in trust to secure the payment of money borrowed of the bank by Potts, but the deed of mortgage had not been recorded within the time limited by the law of Virginia, which governs this case, and which declares that all deeds of mortgage whatsoever, although good between the parties, shall be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, unless they be recorded within eight months after their date.

Swann, for the appellants.

Although the deed to Lee would be void as to a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, yet it is not void as to Herbert, who is the trustee of Potts under the insolvent law for the District of Columbia. (Laws U. S., vol. 6, p. 294.) A trustee under that law is like an assignee under a commission of bankruptcy in England. He stands merely in the place of the insolvent. He takes the estate as the insolvent held it. He is bound by the same equity, and liable to the same obligations. (Cooper's B. L., 128, 307; 2 Vez., 633; 1 Atk., 94, 162; 2 Vern., 564, 609, Taylor v. Wheeler; 1 Br. C. C., 269, Russel v. Russel.) The deed to Lee being good against Potts, is equally valid against Herbert.

37*] Taylor*, contra.

No English authority can apply directly to this case. Potts remained in possession ten years after the deed to Lee, and until his insolvency and the execution of the deed to Herbert, when he delivered to Herbert the possession.

But the deed is void as to creditors as well as purchasers, and creditors are not affected by notice, although purchasers are. The fact that Herbert had notice does not appear; but if it did, he represents the creditors; and their rights are his. If there had been no deed to Herbert, the creditors might have obtained a decree in their own names to vacate the deed to Lee and compel a sale.

But if this cause depends upon the decisions under the bankrupt law, yet the assignee of a bankrupt represents the creditors, and can take advantage of defects which the bankrupt himself could not. (Cooper, 307.) In the case of Taylor v. Wheeler (2 Vern., 564), it does not appear that the creditors had a right to avail themselves of the defect in the mortgage. If Herbert represents the creditors, the fourth section of the statute of Virginia is conclusive. (1 P. P. Rev. Co., 157.) If he does not represent the creditors, then all the provisions of the insolvent law are of no avail. If the deed cannot be set aside by a bill in the name of the trustee, the judgment creditors may file a bill in their own names and set it aside.

Swann, in reply.

The assignee of a bankrupt also represents the creditors, but yet it has been decided (1 Atk., 94), that although creditors might vacate a deed, yet an assignee could not.

The case of Taylor v. Wheeler is very strong. The mortgage was void at law for want of a surrender of the copy-hold in due time, yet it was decreed that it should be made good against the assignee of the mortgageor, who, it was admitted, represented the creditors. But the chancellor said that the complainant also was *a creditor, and had trusted to this par- [38 ticular fund, but the others were general creditors; and upon that distinction his decree seems to be founded. The reason of that case is precisely applicable to the present. The bank lent the money upon the credit of this very security.

February 16th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

In this case a bill was brought in the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, by William Herbert, Jr., trustee for the creditors of John Potts, an insolvent debtor, against the bank of Alexandria, to recover the proceeds of a tract of land, the property of Potts, which had been sold by consent, and the money deposited in bank.

This land had been conveyed by Potts to the bank to secure the payment of a sum of money borrowed by him, but the deed of mortgage had not been recorded until eight months after its date had elapsed. The law of Virginia, which governs this case, declares all deeds of mortgage whatsoever, though good between the parties, to be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, unless they be recorded within eight months from the date.

The question is whether this mortgage can be set up in favor of the bank against the trustee for the creditors.

The Circuit Court decreed in favor of the trustee, and from that decree there is an appeal to this court.

For the appellant it is contended that the trustee may be assimilated to the assignees of a bankrupt, and he has adduced some cases from the books showing that in England a deed declared to be void in law has been supported against the assignees in favor of the particular creditor who holds a lien upon it.

The resemblance between the trustee for the estate of an insolvent debtor in the District of Columbia and the assignees of a bankrupt is admitted; yet a clear distinction exists between the cases cited at bar and *that before the [39 court. In those cases the deed was declared void without any view to creditors. In this case the deed is declared void for the particular benefit of creditors. To set up this deed against the creditors would be to defeat the very object for which the law was made.

The counsel for the appellant is well apprised of this distinction, and though he claims for his clients the benefit of this deed against the trustee, he admits that it could not be sustained against the creditors suing in their own names.

In reason there can be no difference between this suit, which asserts the right of the creditors in the mode prescribed by law, and an assertion of that right in their own names. Nor does the law distinguish between them. The cases cited did not turn on any distinction between the rights of the assignee and the creditors, but on the preference which ought to be given to him who has trusted on the credit of the particular fund over those who have trusted the general fund.

The decree is affirmed with costs.

MARCARDIER
v.
THE CHESAPEAKE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Where a technical total loss is sought to be maintained upon the mere ground of deterioration of the cargo at an intermediate port, to a moiety of its value, all deterioration of memorandum articles must be excluded from the estimate. Therefore, in a cargo of a mixed character, no abandonment for mere deterioration in value during the voyage can be valid, unless the damage on the non-memorandum articles exceed a moiety of the value of the whole cargo including the memorandum articles.

Where the general owner of a ship retains the possession, command and navigation of the same, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter party is to be considered as a mere affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership. In such case, the general owner is also owner for the voyage. Consequently, if he be the master of the vessel, he is incapable of committing barratry.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

The facts of this case were thus stated by STORY, J., in delivering the opinion of the court.

This is an action on a policy of insurance, underwritten by the defendants, on the 29th of October, 1806, for $31,000, upon any kind of lawful goods on board the brig Betsey, whereof 40] Alexander M'Dougal was then *master, on a voyage at and from New York to Nantes. M'Dougal was the general owner of the brig, and, on the 1st day of October, 1806, by a charter party of affreightment made with the plaintiff, granted, and to freight let, to the plaintiff, the said brig, excepting and reserving her cabin for the use of the master and mate and for accommodation of passengers, as therein mentioned, and so much room in the hold as might be necessary for the mariners, and storage of water, wood, provisions, and cables, for the voyage from New York to Nantes; and M'Dougal, by the same instrument covenanted to man, victual, and navigate the brig at his own charge during the voyage, and to receive on board any shipment of goods, not contraband, which the plaintiff should tender at the side of the ship, or within reach of her tackles, at New York, and to stow and secure the same, and proceed therewith to Nantes, and there discharge the same. The passengers on board the brig were to be at the joint expense of the parties, and the passage money was to be equally divided between them. The other clauses in the charter party are not material to be stated, except that the plaintiff covenanted to pay the stipulated freight and demurrage. The cargo, put on board by the plaintiff, was of the invoice value of $29,889, of which $7,439 were in memorandum articles. The brig sailed on the voyage, under the command of M'Dougal, on the 9th of November, 1806, and during the voyage was compelled by stress of weather, and other accidents, to bear away for the West Indies, and arrived at the port of St. Johns, in Antigua, on the 22d day of December. There the master made application to the Vice-Admiralty for a survey, &c., and such proceedings were had upon his application, that the cargo was landed, and by a decretal order of the court, of the 31st of January, 1807, the same was ordered to be sold for the benefit of all concerned, reserving the question as to freight. Under this decree, the cargo was accordingly sold, and the sales completed before the 28th of March, 1807; and the net proceeds of the whole of the plaintiff's property amounted to $13,767. The net proceeds of the memorandum articles, included in the same sum, were $6,863.30. The whole proceeds were paid over to an agent appointed by M'Dougal, and the freight for the whole voyage was allowed him by the Admiralty, upon a report *of commissioners, to whom the [41 question was referred. The brig was repaired at Antigua, within a reasonable time, at the expense of one-sixth only of her value, and capable of performing the voyage with the original cargo; but M'Dougal voluntarily abandoned the voyage at Antigua, for his own emolument and advantage. Of the cargo, 99 bags of coffee were spoiled and thrown overboard, and the residue greatly damaged by the perils of the seas; and the whole cargo, including the memorandum articles, sustained a damage, during the voyage, exceeding a moiety of its original value. On the 4th of February, 1807, and within a reasonable time after receiving information of the loss, the plaintiff abandoned the whole cargo to the underwriters.

The declaration contained two counts, for a total loss; 1st, by the perils of the seas, and 2d, by barratry of the master. At the trial, the court below, upon the facts and circumstances above stated, held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, as for a total loss of the cargo insured, including the memorandum articles; and the cause came up to this court, upon a bill of exceptions to that opinion.

Harper, for the plaintiff.

The great controversy between the parties in this case turns on the question, whether the loss of the cargo now under consideration was partial or total. It is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that it was a total loss.

1st. By the dangers of the seas.

2d. By the barratry of the master.

By the dangers of the seas—

1st. Because the voyage was broken up and lost by the deterioration of the cargo, to more than half of its value.

2d. Because there may be a total loss of memorandum articles, by the loss of the voyage; although the articles themselves remain in existence, and of some value.

*By the barratry of the master— [42

1st. Because the acts imputed to him, amount to barratry, if he were in a situation to commit it.

2d. Because by the charter party the plaintiff became owner pro hac vice, and M'Dougal merely master, so as to be in a situation to commit barratry.

The question to be first considered may be stated as follows:

Whether, in case a cargo consists partly of memorandum articles (on which no partial loss can be recovered), a total loss is incurred by the breaking up of the voyage on account of such a deterioration of the whole cargo (including a deterioration of the memorandum articles), as reduces the value of the whole cargo more than one-half.

We hold the affirmative of the question.

But there are two cases which have been cousidered as very strong in favor of the negative. These are:

1st. The case of Wilson and another v. Smith (3 Bnrr., 1550, eited also in Marsh., 1st Am. ed., 141). This was of a ship with a cargo of corn, which, having met with a storm, was obliged to run for the nearest port to refit, where she inenrred a considerable expense in repairs.

On her arrival at her port of destination, it was fonnd that the corn was damaged to more than half its value. Lord Mansfield deeided, that this loss, not being of the natnre of a general average, nor arising from the ship's being stranded, conld not be recovered on the policy; for that the words of the memorandum, "free from average, nnless general, or the ship be stranded," did not make a condition, but only an exeeption.

The answer to this ease is, that the vessel had arrived at the plaee of destination; the voyage therefore was not broken up, and so no total loss could be elaimed on the gronnd that the eargo was deteriorated more than half its valne. 43] *2d. The other ease, and that whieh is chiefly relied upon by the defendants, is the ease of Cocking v. Fraser (Marsh., 1st Am. ed., 144).

Here the voyage was broken np; and it was decided by Lord Mansfield, and the other justices who sat in the eause, one of whom was Mr. Jnstice Bnller, that if the articles for which the insnrer is warranted to be free from average, except general, specifieally remain after the voyage, though by sea damage they are rendered of no valne, yet, if the ship has not been stranded, this is only a partial loss, for whieh the insurer is not liable.

The authority of this ease, it must be confessed, would go far to prevent the present plaintiff from reeovering as for a total loss, were it not for the observations made upon it by Lord Kenyon, in the case of Burnett v. Kensington, (7 T. R., 210.) (Also Marsh., 1st Am. ed., 151.) The opinion of the conrt in that case tends very mueh to invalidate its anthority.

The principle of Cocking v. Fraser is also overrnled in the ease of M'Andrews v. Vaughan (Marsh. 1st Am., ed. 150, and Park, 114), which goes to show that, where a cargo eonsists of memorandnm artieles, if the voyage be lost, the insured may reeover as for a total loss, though the eargo be not wholly destroyed. And there is, in faet, the same reason that the breaking up of a voyage, in case of memorandum articles, shonld eonstitute a total loss, as where the cargo eonsists of artieles not mentioned in the memorandum. The general doetrine now is, with regard to both descriptions of goods, that there may be a total loss by the breaking up of the voyage.

Dyson v. Rowcroft (3 Bos. & Pul., 474) is another ease against the principle laid down in Cocking v. Fraser. The opinion of the court herc was, that it is a total loss of memorandnm artieles, although they may remain in speeie, if they beeome so much damaged as to be no longer worth carrying to the port of destination.

The next question is, whether there was a 44] total loss *by the barratry of the master, and this must be decided by ascertaining who was the owner of the vessel for the voyage; for it is agreed on all hands that if the master was in a situation to commit barratry, he was actually guilty of that offense.

A person may be owner for the voyage, who is not the general owner of the ship; and barratry may be eommitted against such person by the master, although the barratrons aet of the master may have been done with the consent of the actual general owner. (Cowp., 143, Vallejo v. Wheeler.) See the same also in (Marsh. 1st Am. ed., 454.)

In the case now before the court, Marcardier, the plaintiff, was owner of the vessel pro hac vice, althongh M'Dongal, the master, was the general owner. We eontend, therefore, that, according to the principles laid down in the case last eited, the master was in a situation to eommit barratry against the plaintiff; that he has actnally done so; and therefore that the plaintiff is entitled to recover as for a total loss.

Pinkney, eontra.

It has been contended for the plaintiff, that there may be a total loss by the breaking up of a voyage, if the goods on board be deteriorated more than half. No English authority to this effeet is recolleeted. The eourts in New York have so deeided, it is true; bnt the principle may be considered as arbitrary, and the deeision as loeal.

Aceording to MARSHALL (Eng. ed., vol. 2, p. 486), if the goods insured specifically remain, and are aetnally landed at the port of delivery, however damaged in the voyage, the injnry will amount bnt to a partial loss. Why, then, should the insured have a right to abandon as for a total loss at an intermediate port if the goods can be carrried, in the same or another ship, to the plaee of destination? All the authorities in favor of the right to abandon at an intermediate port, are cases where the voyage was broken up by the incapaeity of the ship to perform it. Bnt in the present case there was no sneh ineapaeity. The vessel *was [45 repaired at Antigua within a reasonable time, at the expense of one-sixth of her value, and was eapable of performing the voyage, with a considerable part (at least one-third) of the original cargo. The case, therefore, is materially different from those eited on the part of the plaintiff. (Vid. Park's observations in the cases of Cocking v. Fraser, and Dyson v. Rowcroft, 1 Park, 6th Lon. ed., 152; also, 2 Marsh. Eng. ed., 586, Manning v. Newnham.)

It is the opinion of the best judges in cases of this nature, that the law of abandonment has already been carried far enough; bnt the counsel for the plaintiff would carry it to an extent hitherto unpreeedented.

With regard to memorandum articles, all the authorities go to show that there must be an actual total loss, in order to justify an abandonment. A technical total loss is not snffieient. The underwriters are not liable for mere deterioration, however great, of sueh articles. They refuse to have anything to do with it on aceount of the diffieulty of knowing the real cause of such deterioration. (1 Marsh., Eng. ed., 227), note to the ease of Cocking v. Fraser. As to memorandum articles, also, the intermediate port makes no difference.

In the case of Dyson v. Rowcroft (3 Bos. & Pul., 474) there was an actual total loss. The eourt, in that ease, do not mean to say that memorandum articles may be subject to a technical total loss.

The alleged barratry is next to be considered. The question arising on this point is, as has been already stated, whether the master, under the circumstances of the case, could commit barratry. If he could, the facts seem to show that he was guilty of the offense. But we contend that the master was, in fact, the owner of the vessel for the voyage, as well as general owner, and therefore, since barratry is a fraud against the owner, he could not be guilty of that offense, inasmuch as a man cannot commit a fraud against himself. The charter-party, in this case, is of a peculiar construction; it sounds in covenant throughout; it is clearly not an assignment of the property to the plaintiff, pro 46*] hac vice: *The master finds the crew, pays them, provides for them, and has the whole management of the vessel. He must, therefore, be considered as owner for the voyage. In Vallejo v. Wheeler, the charter-party is not set forth, but it is stated in the case that the freighter employed the master and crew, and paid the crew. The court said it would be different if it were not a general freighting. Here the plaintiff was not a general freighter. Loft, who also reports the case of Vallejo v. Wheeler (Loft, 641), says, that where the master employs and pays the crew, &c., the charter-party seems to be rather a covenant, and does not make the freighter owner for the voyage. (1 Johnson, 229, M'Intire v. Bowne; 8 Johnson, 272, Hallet v. The Columbian Insurance Company; 1 Cranch, 214, Hooe & Co. v. Groverman.)

Harper, in reply.

The question as to barratry is, who had the beneficial interest in the vessel during the voyage. There can be no doubt that the beneficial interest was in the plaintiff. It is of no importance, as it regards the ownership of the vessel, by whom the crew was furnished, provided for, &c.. The freighting of a vessel where the crew and other necessaries for the voyage are provided by the general owner, is merely like hiring a house ready furnished, instead of hiring it empty, where the temporary ownership is no less in the hirer in the former case than in the latter.

Thursday, Feb. 17. Absent. WASHINGTON, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The plaintiff in this case contends, that there was a total loss, which authorized an abandonment by both of the perils stated in the declaration, viz.:

1st By the perils of the seas, and

2d. By barratry of the master.

And first, as to a total loss by the perils of the seas.

47*] *It seems now clear that a technical total loss may arise from the mere deterioration of a cargo by any of the perils insured against, if the deterioration be ascertained at an intermediate port, of necessity, short of the port of destination. In such case, although the ship be in a capacity to perform the voyage, yet if the voyage be not worth pursuing, or the thing insured be so damaged and spoiled as to be of little or no value, the insured has a right to abandon the projected adventure, and throw upon the underwriter the unprofitable and disastrous subject of insurance. It has therefore been held, that if a cargo be damaged in the course of the voyage, and it appears that what has been saved is less in value than the amount of the freight, it is a clear case of a total loss. It does not, however, appear that the exact quantum of damage which shall authorize an abandonment as for a total loss, has ever become the direct subject of adjudication in the English courts. The celebrated treatise Le Guidon (ch. 7, art. 1), considers that a damage exceeding the moiety of the value of the thing insured is sufficient to authorize an abandonment. This rule has received some countenance from more recent elementary writers; and, from its public convenience and certainty, has been adopted as the governing principle in some of the most respectable commercial states in the Union; and perhaps is now so generally established as not easily to be shaken. (1 John. c., 141; 1 John. R., 335, 406; Marsh. Ins., 562; Note 92, Am. edit., 1810; Park, 194, 6 edition.)

But this rule has never been deemed to extend to a cargo consisting wholly of memorandum articles. The legal effect of the memorandum is to protect the underwriter from all partial losses; and if a loss by deterioration, exceeding a moiety in value, would authorize an abandonment, the great object of the stipulation would be completely evaded. It seems, therefore, to be the settled doctrine that nothing short of a total extinction, either physical or in value, of memorandum articles at an intermediate port, would entitle the insured to turn the case into a total loss, where the voyage is capable of being performed. And perhaps, even as to an extinction in value, where the commodity specifically remains, it may yet be deemed not quite settled whether, *under the like cir- [48 cumstances, it would authorize an abandonment for a total loss. (Dyson v. Rowcroft, 3 Bos. & Pul., 474; Maggrath v. Church, 1 Caines R., 242; Cocking v. Frazer, Marshall, 227; Park, 152, 6th edition.)

The case before the court is of a mixed character. It embraces articles of both descriptions; some within and others without the purview of the memorandum. If, in such a case, a deterioration exceeding a moiety in value be a proper case of technical total loss, it will follow that, in many cases, the underwriter will, indirectly, be rendered responsible for partial losses on the memorandum articles. Suppose, in such a case, the damage of the memorandum articles were 40 per cent., and to the other articles 10 per cent., in the whole amounting to half the value of the cargo, the underwriter would be responsible for a technical total loss, and thereby made to bear the whole damage, from which the memorandum meant to exempt him. Indeed, cases might arise in which the damage might exclusively fall on memorandum articles; and if it exceeded the moiety, in value, of the whole cargo, might load him with the burden of a partial loss, in manifest contravention of the intention of the parties. A construction which leads to such a consequence cannot be admitted unless it be unavoidable. And we are entirely satisfied that such a construction ought not to prevail. The underwriter is, in all cases of deterioration, entitled to an exemption from partial losses on the memorandum articles; and in order to effectuate this right, it is necessary, where a technical total loss is sought to be maintained upon the mere ground of deterioratiou of the cargo, at an intermediate port, to a moiety of its value, to exclude from that estimate all deterioration of the memorandum articles. Upon this principle, on a cargo of a mixed character, no abandonment for mere deterioration in value during the voyage can be valid, unless the damage on the nou-memorandum articles exceed a moiety of the value of the whole cargo, including the memorandum articles. The case is considered, as to the underwriter, the same as though the memorandum articles should exist in their original sound state. In this way, full effect is given to the contract of the parties. The under-49*] writer *is uever made responsible for partial losses on memorandum articles, however great; and the technical total losses for which alone he can be liable, are such as stand unaffected by the perishable nature of the commodity which he insures.

In the present case, the facts alleged by the plaintiff do not show a depreciation of a moiety in value, excludiug the memorandum articles. There is no evidence of the quantum of depreciation of any part of the cargo. The forced sales at Antigua could not, under the circumstances, constitute a medium by which to ascertain it. Admitting, therefore, the rule to be correct that the party had a right to abandon where the depreciation exceeds a moiety of the value, the plaintiff has not brought himself within that rule as applied to a cargo of a mixed character like the present. The court below were right, therefore, in deciding that there was uo total loss proved by the perils of the seas.

The next question is, whether there was a total loss by the barratry of the master. And this depends exclusively upon the consideration, who was the owner of the brig for the voyage; for it is conceded on all sides that the conduct of the master was barratrous, if he was in a situation to commit that offense. Barratry is an act committed by the master or mariners of a ship for some unlawful or frauduleut purpose, contrary to their duty to their owners, whereby the latter sustain an injury. It follows, therefore, from the very terms of the definition, that it cannot be committed by a master who is owner for the voyage; because he cannot commit a fraud against himself. But it may be committed against a person who is owner for the voyage, although he may not be the general owner of the ship. A person may be owner for the voyage, who, by a contract with the general owner, hires the ship for the voyage. and has the exclusive possession, command and navigation of the ship. Such is understood to have been the case of Vallejo v. Wheeler, (Cowp., 143.) But where the general owner retains the possession, command and navigation of the ship, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter party is considered as a mere affreightment sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with 50*] the character *or legal responsibility of ownership; such was the case of Hove & Co. v. Groverman, in this court (1 Cr. 214). In the first case the general freighter is responsible for the conduct of the master and mariners during the voyage; in the latter case, the responsibility rests on the general owner. On examining the charter party in the present case, there can be no doubt, from the terms and stipulations that it falls within the latter class of cases. The master, who was the general owner, retained the exclusive possession, command and management of the vessel, and she was navigated at his expense during the voyage. The whole charter-party, except the introductory clause, sounds merely in covenant. The ownership was not devested by the covenant of affreightment, and, consequently, the master was incapable of committing barratry. There was, then, no total loss on the second count in the declaration.

The opinion of the Circuit Court on this exception must be sustained. But there are other exceptions on the record in which it is admitted by the parties that the Circuit Court erred. The points intended to be raised in these exceptions have, in effect, been decided by this court in Caze and Richaud v. The Baltimore Insurance Company, at February term, 1813. For the errors in these exceptions the judgment must be reversed, with directions to the Circuit Court to award a venire facias de novo.

HALL v. LEIGH ET AL.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

If two joint owners of merchandise consign it to a merchant for sale, and inform him that each owns one moiety; and if they give separate and variant instructions, each for his own moiety, one of the consignors alone may maintain a separate action against the consignee for a violation of his separate instructions.

THIS case is so fully stated iu the opinion of the court that it is deemed unnecessary to add more than that Harper and Pinkney, for the plaintiff in error, did not argue the case, as there was no appearance for the defendants in error, but simply stated that they contended that the separate instructions of each owner severed the joint iuterest, and cited 1 Esp., 117 and Watson on Partnership, 233, 234.

*February 18th. LIVINGSTON, J., de- [51
livered the opinion of the court as follows:

This cause comes here on a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Maryland.

This action was brought by the plaintiff, who was also plaintiff below, to recover the proceeds of one hundred bags of cotton which had been shipped to the defendants, aud by them sold on commission.

At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff, together with William Potts & Co., in 1807, made a joint shipment of two hundred bales of cotton to the address of the defendants, who resided at Liverpool, to make sale thereof for their joint benefit. This cotton belonged one-half to the plaintiff, and the other half to Wm. Potts & Co. The shipment was accompanied by two letters to the defendants, the one written by the plaintiff bearing date 14th February, 1807, in which, after advising them of the shipment, he adds: "Mr. Potts has written you on the sub- "ject of his interest in this adventure: for my- "self I have to request that you will, after "covering me in cost and charges, make such "disposition of my one-half the shipment as "your own judgment may think best for my "interest."

The other letter was written by William Potts & Co., and is dated 5th February, 1807, in which they also advise the defendants of the shipment, which they say is "for account of Mr. Hall and ourselves each one half," and after directing what is to be done with their moiety, they observe that "under present cir- "cumstances, Mr. Hall will decline drawing on "his proportion, as he wishes you to avoid "selling at the present prices as long as possi- "ble; we refer you to him for more particular "directions."

In another letter of the 13th April, 1807, the plaintiff directed the defendants that, after effecting sales of his half of the cotton, on the terms of his first letter, "they should pass the net proceeds of his proportion to the credit of Messrs. W. Potts & Co., and furnish him 52*] *with sales and account current as soon as possible, to enable him to settle with those gentlemen here."

After the receipt of these letters the defendant, on the 5th June, 1807, sold one hundred bags of the cotton on account of William Potts & Co., at 17*d.* sterling per pound, and immediately advised them thereof.

The defendants afterwards, that is, on the 31st December, 1807, had the remaining one hundred bags of cotton, valued at 14*d.* sterling per pound, at which price they took it to themselves, and carried the amount to the credit of William Potts & Co., and on the 1st March following, sold them at a higher price. The plaintiff thinking the defendant guilty of a breach of orders, brought this action to recover damage, and on the preceding evidence, the Circuit Court was of opinion that he could not separately maintain an action against them, on which a verdict and judgment passed against him.

Although the purchase of this cotton was on the joint account of the plaintiff, and of William Potts & Co., yet as, in its shipment to the defendants, their distinct interests were not only disclosed, but as separate and variant instructions were given as to the disposal of it, and as, under these directions, the defendants acted throughout the whole of their agency in this business, it is not easy to perceive on what ground they now allege that they can be liable only in a joint action in the names of the present plaintiff, and of William Potts & Co. By their own conduct they have precluded themselves from every objection of this nature, for they have contracted, as to the one half of this property, with the plaintiff, and as to the other moiety, with William Potts & Co., and it will be seen by a recurrence to the testimony, not only that their engagements with these parties are distinct, but of different kinds. In selling the proportion of W. Potts & Co. they had a discretion, but over the other they had no right to sell for less than cost and charges. This court, therefore, is of opinion that the action was well brought, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court was erroneous and must be reversed.

*THE COMMON COUNCIL OF ALEXANDRIA [*53

v.

PRESTON.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J., and JOHNSON, J.

A purchaser of real estate in Alexandria is not personally liable for arrears of taxes assessed before his purchase.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

This was a motion in the court below for judgment and execution against Preston (under the 11th section of the act of Congress of 25th of February, 1804, "to amend the charter of Alexandria," vol. 7, p. 48), for taxes due to the corporation for the years 1804, 5 and 6, on a lot of ground in Alexandria, which Preston purchased of Scott in the year 1807, after the taxes were due. The assessors' books were returned on the 1st of May in every year to the office of the clerk of the common council, where they remained subject to public inspection.

The court below being of opinion that the summary remedy by motion, judgment, and execution, was given only against the person who was proprietor at the time of the assessment of the taxes, dismissed the motion; and the common council brought their writ of error.

The 11th section of the act to amend the charter of Alexandria is as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That whenever taxes "upon real property, or other claims charged up- "on real property within the town, shall be due "and owing to the common council, and the "proprietor shall fail to discharge the same, "the said common council, after giving the "party reasonable notice when he resides in "town; sixty days' notice when he resides out "of the town and in the United States; and "after six months' publication in the newspa- "pers when he resides out of the United "States; shall be empowered to recover the "said taxes or debts, by motion in the court "of Alexandria; and, provided it shall appear "to the satisfaction *of the court that [*54 "such taxes or claims are justly due, judgment "shall be granted and an execution shall issue "thereupon, with the costs of suit, against the "goods and chattles of the defaulter, if any "can be found within the town; if not, that the "whole property, upon which the tax or claim "is due, shall, by order of the court, be leased "out at public auction for the shortest term of

"years that may be offered, on condition "that the lessee pay the arrearages, and also "the future taxes accruing during the term, "and be at liberty to remove all his improve- "ments at the expiration of the lease; provided "always that the common council may prose- "cute any other remedy, by action, for the re- "covery of the said taxes and claims which is "now possessed or allowed."

E. I. Lee, for the plaintiff in error.

The question arising upon this case is, whether the proprietor, for the time being, of a lot in Alexandria, is personally liable to a judgment and execution for arrearages of taxes assessed upon the lot before he became the proprietor thereof.

The act of Congress gives a remedy, by motion, judgment and execution, against the proprietor who shall fail to discharge the taxes. Preston was the proprietor at the time of the demand of payment, and has failed to pay. He is therefore within the express letter of the law. The "defaulter" also is the person who has failed to pay on demand; the person who was liable to pay when the demand was made upon him. Every proprietor of the land is liable for its taxes so long as he is proprietor. The claims, according to the words of the act, are charged upon the real property. They accompany the land into whose hands soever it may pass. The law was intended to give a remedy against any proprietor of the land. The taxes are placed on the same footing as other charges which are liens on the land. It is not a case of greater hardship than that of other liens on real estate. Caveat emptor is the rule where he has the means of knowledge. Here the assessors' books were always accessible. The purchaser is bound to take notice of the non-payment of the taxes. He purchases at his peril.

55*] Swann*, contra.

The statute uses the definite article, "the proprietor." The question is, which proprietor? Scott or Preston? We say it means him who was proprietor when the tax was laid, and in whose name the land was assessed, and who was unquestionably liable in the first instance. He was "the proprietor," "the defaulter" contemplated by the legislature. If he was liable, did his liability cease when he sold the land? or is he still liable? There is nothing in the law to justify an idea that the legislature contemplated a succession of proprietors who should be successively liable; a succession of debtors; nor that they should be all liable at once; nor that the corporation should have its choice out of the several successive proprietors. It suggests the idea of one proprietor only, and of one debtor, or defaulter only; and if but one, it can be no other than him who was confessedly liable; him who was proprietor at the time of the assessment. The tax is a lien on the lot so far as to authorize the court to direct it to be leased out to anyone who will pay the taxes, in case the goods and chattels of the debtor cannot be found.

The books of the assessor and collector are not matter of record. The purchaser has no right to inspect them. The tax is a secret lien.

February 19th. The court affirmed the judgment, without assigning their reasons.

PLEASANTS
v.
THE MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY.

When a cargo is insured by diverse policies, in some of which the rate of exchange is fixed at which the prime cost of the cargo shall be valued; in ascertaining the amount of the interest of the insured, upon settlement of those policies in which the rate of exchange is fixed, the whole cargo is to be valued at that rate of exchange, without regard to the rate of exchange by which the value may have been ascertained in the other policies.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action upon a policy of insurance, dated on the 18th of May, 1810, on the cargo of the brig Elizabeth from St. Petersburgh or Cronstadt to Philadelphia, against all risks, for 6,000 dollars, "valuing *the [56 invoice ruble at 46 cents." The invoice amounted to 95,565 71 rubles, equal, at 46 cents per ruble, to $43,960.23.

Before this policy was made the plaintiff had effected eight other policies in Philadelphia to the amount of 36,900 dollars. In the first seven of these policies there was no valuation of the ruble; but in the eighth it was valued at 40 cents. The defendants, at the time of executing this policy, had no knowledge of those affected in Philadelphia.

The vessel and cargo were captured by a Danish vessel and condemned. The plaintiff abandoned in due time.

The underwriters at Philadelphia paid. But on settlement of the seven first policies, in which the value of the ruble was not fixed, and which insured 29,900 dollars, the underwriters, in order to ascertain whether the plaintiff's interest in the cargo amounted to the sum insured by those policies, viz., 29,900 dollars, insisted upon fixing the value of the ruble at thirty-three and a third cents.

On settlement of the eighth policy, which valued the ruble at forty cents, and which insured 7,000 dollars, the calculation (in order to ascertain whether the plaintiff had still a sufficient interest left to entitle him to receive the 7,000 dollars insured by that policy) was made by converting the whole amount of the invoice into dollars at 40 cents per ruble, and deducting therefrom the 29,900 dollars received upon the seven preceding policies. By this mode of calculation it appears (according to the statement in the bill of exceptions which, however, does not seem to be accurate) that after the plaintiff had received the 29,900 dollars insured by the seven first policies, and the $7,000 insured by the eighth policy, his remaining interest to be covered by the ninth policy, was only 1,481 71 rubles, equal, at 46 cents per ruble, to 682 dollars, 58 cents.

But if, on settlement of this last policy, the plaintiff is entitled to have the value of his interest in the cargo ascertained by converting the whole amount of the invoice *into [57 dollars, at the rate of 46 cents per ruble, and deducting therefrom the 36,900 dollars covered by the eight prior policies, then his remaining interest to be covered by this policy would be more than the 6,000 dollars insured thereby.

The only question saved by the bill of exceptions at the trial below, was whether the plaintiff should recover according to the first or according to the latter mode of calculation.

The plaintiff contended for the latter, but the court overruled him, and directed the jury that he was only entitled to recover according to the former; they found a verdict accordingly; whereupon the plaintiff brought his writ of error.

The point was now submitted to the court without argument, by Harper for the plaintiff in error, and Jones and Pinkney for defendant.

February 21st. All the Judges being present,

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is the case of an insuranee on a voyage from St. Petersburgh or Cronstadt to Philadelphia, effected in the year 1810. The vessel was captured and the assured abandoned. The only difficulty arises on the principles upon which the loss shall be adjusted.

Besides this policy, eight others were effected in Philadelphia. In seven of them no valuation was attached to the ruble. In the eighth it was valued at 40 cents, and on this, which was the ninth in order, at 46 cents. In settling the seven first the ruble was estimated at thirty-three and a third cents, which was the received value at Philadelphia. On the eighth it was settled at the stipulated value of 40 cents. The value of goods laden on board the ship was proved to be 95,565 rubles. The sums paid on the eight first policies corresponded to the adjusted value of 94,084 rubles, leaving a balance of only 1,481, equal, at 46 cents, to about 682 dollars unpaid. But if the whole 58 amount of *the cargo be brought into dollars at 46 cents to the ruble, and the sum in dollars actually paid on the other policies be deducted, there will still remain more unpaid than would exhaust the whole sum underwritten on the ninth policy.

On the part of the defendant it is contended that the compensation paid to the plaintiff on the other policies is absolute and complete as to the corresponding amount in rubles, leaving only 1,481 unpaid. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the compensation was only relative, and cannot effect his rights as between himself and this defendant. And of this opinion is the majority of the court.

The object to be attained is, to secure to the assured a fair indemnity under all the advantages which he has purchased of the insurers.

The intention of the parties, in attaching a fixed value to the ruble, appears in the order for insurance, to wit, "to distinguish between the paper and specie ruble."

It is very well known that the ruble is the money of account in Russia. It was originally a coin corresponding in value to the American dollar. But by the forced circulation of a paper representative of the ruble, dependent on nothing but mere national faith or national force for its value, the silver ruble has nominally doubled or trebled itself in value. The astonishing and rapid fluctuation in its value appears from the evidence in this case, in which it is stated that in the year 1810 it varied from forty-eight to twenty-five cents.

To secure the assured against the effects of this fluctuation, was the object of the parties in attaching a specific value to the ruble; and as the whole cargo would be affected in value by this cause, and the policy was upon the cargo generally, we are of opinion that no other principle in calculating the loss would afford him the indemnity stipulated for in the policy.

The principle contended for by the defendant is subject to this obvious objection that it is not reciprocal. *Had the adjustment [59 of the value of the ruble in the other cases exceeded forty-six cents that adjustment would not in any respect have resulted to his benefit.

There is one difficulty of which the court are fully aware, which is, that the interest assigned in the abandonment if estimated in rubles will be inversely as the rate at which the ruble is estimated, so that he who pays most would acquire least. But in this case the objection does not arise; as the plaintiff by a compromise with the underwriters on some of the other policies has reserved a sufficient interest in the subject of abandonment to meet the just claims of these underwriters. And in no case would this consideration create a difficulty as between the parties to a policy. Among the underwriters alone in the distribution of the proceeds of the thing abandoned would it be necessary to determine on the correct rule to be applied in such a case.

Had the policy which is the subject of this suit been a valued policy, and declared the value of the whole cargo to be $43,929—the actual amount at the stipulated valuation of the ruble—the same objection would have presented itself, but certainly would not have availed to prevent a recovery.

The judgment below must therefore be reversed and the case remanded.

M'CALL ET AL.
v.
THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

If a policy insures against "unlawful arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes," &c., the qualification, "unlawful," extends in its operation as well to "restraints and detainments" as to "arrests;" and in such case, a detainment by a force lawfully blockading a port is not a peril insured against by a policy containing a warranty of neutrality.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

This was an action on a policy underwritten by the defendants, upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandise, on board the ship Cordelia, on a voyage from the island of Teneriffe, to Surabaya, and at and from *thence [60 to Philadelphia, warranted American property. The ship sailed on the voyage on the 5th of April, 1811, having on board a cargo of lawful goods, the property of the plaintiffs, of the value of 15,000 dollars, and pursued the voyage until the 18th of July following, when, being in a place called Madura Bay, within about twelve hours' sail of Surabaya, she was boarded by an officer of a British frigate, forming one of a squadron, then actually blockading the port of Surabaya, and all the other ports of the islands of Java and Madura. The frigate took possession of the Cordelia, and conducted her to the admiral commanding the blockading squadron, who, on the next day, dismissed the Cordelia, after indorsing her papers, and warning the master not to enter the port of Surabaya, or any other port in the island of Java, or of the island of Madura, on pain of capture. On the same day, the Cordelia made another attempt to enter Surabaya, but was chased by the same British frigate, and taken possession of a second time. After being detained two days, the Cordelia was again released, and the master was ordered to depart instantly from the coast of Java, and the neighborhood of Surabaya, upon penalty of capture, and impressment of his men. The master, finding it impracticable to pursue his voyage further, resolved to return to Philadelphia, where he arrived on the 19th of November, 1811. At the time of sailing on the voyage from Teneriffe, the blockade of Java was unknown to the parties. The plaintiffs abandoned to the defendants, immediately after the arrival of the Cordelia at Philadelphia, which gave them the first knowledge of the occurrences. The defendants refused to accept the abandonment.

The policy contained the usual risks, except that the word "unlawful," was printed before "arrests," so that the clause stood, "unlawful arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, or people of what nation, condition or quality soever." The declaration alleges, that the ship and cargo were, during the voyage, "by persons acting under the authority of the British government, and by a certain ship of war belonging to that government, unlawfully seized, restrained, and detained," and thereby become totally lost.

The Circuit Court directed the jury, that, on 61*] this *state of facts, the plaintiffs were not in law entitled to recover; to which the plaintiffs excepted and brought this writ of error.

Harper, for the plaintiffs.

Insisted that this direction was erroneous, because the voyage was broken up, and lost.

1st. By men of war.

2d. By detention of princes; the blockade having prevented the accomplishment of the voyage.

That the plaintiffs had therefore a right to abandon, and were entitled to recover for a total loss.

In support of his argument, he cited the case of Barker v. Blakes (9 East, 280), cited also in 2 Marshall, 835, Appendix.

Jones, contra.

This case is very distinguishable from that of Barker v. Blakes.

1st. In that case, the voyage was interrupted as to the ultimate and only port of destination. Here, there was an interruption as to an intermediate port only, which cannot, we contend, constitute a total loss. The adventure from Teneriffe to Philadelphia might have been as profitable as the accomplishment of the whole voyage.

Another distinction between the two cases arises from the different phraseology employed in the respective policies. The English policy employs general words, so as to include any detention of princes, &c. Here, the policy is limited to unlawful detention of princes, &c. Unless, therefore, this detention can be shown to be unlawful, the case is not within the policy; and it is clear, that it was not unlawful, unless the blockade was so. But this is not contended; the blockade was maintained by an adequate force, and was in every respect conformable to the law of nations.

*Again, in the case of Barker v. Blakes, [62 the blockade of Havre was not considered as the cause of the destruction of the voyage; the detention in Bristol was the only ground of loss. Here, on the contrary, the blockade is the sole ground of abandonment.

The abandonment itself, in the case now before the court, is liable to objection. An abandonment, to be valid, ought to be made during the impediment that causes the loss. But in this case the abandonment was not made till long after the impediment had ceased.

Pinkney, same side.

It was contended by the defendants in the court below, that they were not liable for the loss in this case.

1st. Because, under the words of the policy, that loss did not arise from any peril insured against.

2d. Because the plaintiffs had violated their warranty of neutrality.

3d. Because, at the time when the abandonment was made the property was not under the restraint of princes.

The same grounds of defense are now relied upon.

And, first, as to the words of the policy. This instrument insures against "unlawful arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings," &c. The word "unlawful" is that which the defendants consider as taking the present case out of the policy. This word is not inserted in the English policies, but has been introduced into those of the Marine Insurance Company and some other American offices. Some meaning must be given to the term, and that can be no other than the most usual meaning; so that unless it can be made to appear that the detainment in this case was unlawful, the defendants cannot be considered as liable. But, as has been said before, the blockade, which was the cause of the detainment, was lawful; the detainment itself was therefore lawful under the acknowledged law of nations.

*2d. As to the warranty of neutrality. [63 When the voyage was undertaken, and the policy underwritten, neither party knew that the port of destination was blockaded; but the underwriters protected themselves by a warranty of neutrality, and the assured consented to give it.

The import of the warranty is that the voyage shall be performed in a neutral manner; and, consequently, that if the vessel should find the port blockaded, she will discontinue the voyage. She does find it blockaded; and not only physical force, but the law of nations and the warranty oblige her to forbear the completion of the voyage. She nevertheless attempts to enter the port, and that, too, after being warned off by the admiral commanding the blockading squadron. Has the assured in such a case a right to set up the compliance with his own warranty as the foundation of a total loss, or of any loss? With such a warranty in the policy, can the underwriter be considered as engaging that, if the port of destination should be found blockaded, the voyage shall be completed? If such is his engagement, then he stipulates that the vessel shall violate the warranty; because without a violation of it, she cannot reach her port of destination, if she finds it blockaded. It is plain that his undertaking is only for a neutral voyage; and, therefore, that, the moment it becomes unneutral, the policy is discharged by force of the warranty acting upon the whole contract.

Cases upon the British orders in council are far less strong than this; for they made no blockade acknowledged by the law of nations. Physical force was there everything; and neutral duties were not affected by them. But here, the neutral obligations of the vessel turn her back, and intercept her path, and extract the case out of the policy.

3d. Here was no restraint of princes. Restraint must be physical; and an abandonment, to be of any avail, must be made during such restraint. In the present case the physical restraint continued but one day; all afterwards was mere moral restraint, arising from the threat of capture and confiscation as prize of war. But *an apprehension, though just and reasonable, is not sufficient to justify an abandonment. (3 Bos. and Pul., 392, Hadkinson v. Robinson; 5 Esp. Ca., 50; 1 Campbell, Black v. Hagen.) See, also, the case of (6 Mass. T. R., 118), where the court decided that apprehension alone would not justify an abandonment; and, also, that if the master, after being once warned off, had made another attempt to enter the blockaded port, it would have been barratry.

Harper, in reply.

1st. With regard to the wording of the policy. It is unnecessary to examine what effect the term "unlawful" may have upon the subsequent words, inasmuch as the declaration states the loss to have been occasioned by men of war, with which the word "unlawful" had no connection. But if such examination be made, it will appear that this term applies only to the word "arrests," which, in the original printed form of the policy, was separated from the following part of the sentence by a comma, and was therefore the only word qualified by the preceding term "unlawful." The pointing of the sentence was the act of the parties, and, as such, material, and as much a part of the contract as the words themselves.

2d. As to the violation of the warranty of neutrality. The loss was complete before the second attempt to enter the blockaded port; and therefore could not have happened by reason of that attempt; consequently, the right of the plaintiffs to recover could not be affected by that, or any other act of the master, subsequent to the original loss, however inconsistent with neutrality that act might be.

3d. With regard to the time of abandoning. The plaintiffs abandoned immediately after the arrival of the Cordelia at Philadelphia, which gave them the first information of the loss. To have expected them to abandon before they knew anything of the loss would have been absolutely inconsistent with reason.

The cases cited from Bos. and Pul. and the Mass. T. R. are essentially different from the present, inasmuch *as in those cases there was no physical force to prevent the prosecution of the voyage. (Park., 226, 6th Ed., Blacketshager v. The London Assurance Co.)

Monday, February 21st. Present—All the Judges.

STORY, J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The court below, at the trial, held that the plaintiff, under the circumstances, was not entitled to abandon as for a total loss; and the correctness of that opinion remains for the decision of this court.

Whether the turning away of a ship from the port of destination in consequence of a blockade, be, in any case, a good cause for abandonment, so as to entitle the assured to recover from the underwriter as for a total loss by the breaking up of the voyage; and, if so, whether the doctrine could apply to a policy with a warranty of neutrality, the legal effect of such warranty being to compel the party to abandon the voyage, if it cannot be pursued consistent with neutrality, are questions of great importance, upon which the court do not think it necessary to express any opinion, because this cause may well be decided upon an independent ground.

The loss of the voyage, in the case at bar, was occasioned (if at all) by the arrest and restraint of the British blockading squadron. The right to blockade an enemy's port with a competent force is a right secured to every belligerent by the law of nations. No neutral can, after knowledge of such blockade, lawfully enter, or attempt to enter, the blockaded port. It would be a violation of neutral character, which, according to established usages, would subject the property engaged therein to the penalty of confiscation. In such a case, therefore, the arrest and restraint of neutral ships attempting to enter the port is a lawful arrest and restraint by the blockading squadron. It would follow, therefore, from this consideration, that the arrest and restraint, on account of which a recovery is now sought, is not a risk within the policy against which the underwriter has engaged to indemnify the plaintiff.

*But it is contended by the counsel for [*66 the plaintiff, in order to escape from this conclusion, that the word "unlawful" in the policy, is confined in its operation to arrests, and does not extend to "restraints and detainments." To this construction the court cannot assent. The grammatical order of the words and the coherence of the sentence require a different construction. It is not against every "unlawful arrest" that the underwriter undertakes to indemnify, but against "unlawful arrests, &c., of all kings, princes, and people," which have always been held to mean the arrests of kings, princes, or people, in their sovereign and national capacity, and not as individuals. The necessary connection of the sentence, therefore, requires that "arrests, restraints and detainments," should be coupled together; and, if so, the qualification of unlawful must be annexed to them all. The intent of the parties, also, urges to the same conclusion; for every arrest is a restraint and detainment; and it would be strange if the party could, under the allegation of a restraint, recover a loss from which the underwriter is expressly exempted by an unambiguous exception in the policy.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. EDRINGTON.

Present—All the Judges.

Under the statute of Virginia respecting wills, it is necessary, in order that lands acquired after the date of the will may pass by the will, that the intention of the testator should clearly appear upon the face of the will.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, sitting in chancery.

The bill sought to charge the lands of Christopher Edrington in the hands of his son and heir at law, W. P. Edrington, with a debt due by his father, Christopher Edrington, to the complainants, by simple contract.

It was contended, that the lands passed by the will of Christopher Edrington to his son, W. P. Edrington, charged with the payment of 67*] the debts of the testator, *although the lands were acquired by the testator after the date of the will.

The will expressed a desire that all the just debts of the testator should be paid by his executors as soon as the means in their power should permit. It also authorized his executors to dispose of and convey any of his property that might be necessary for payment of his debts; and afterwards it has these expressions: "Should my son, Wm. P. Edrington, to whom "I bequeath the whole of my property, after "the payment of my debts, and provisions "above made, die under the age of 21 years, I "then give," &c. The testator then proceeds to make certain pecuniary bequests, in the event of his son's so dying, and concludes by disposing of the residue of his property.

At the date of the will the testator had no lands. Those which the bill sought to charge were purchased a short time before his death.

By an act of the legislature of Virginia, in force at the date of the will (1 Rev. Co. P. P. 160), it is enacted, "that every person aged 21 "years and upwards, being of sound mind, and "not a married woman, shall have power, at "his will and pleasure, by last will and testa- "ment in writing, to devise all the estate, right, "title and interest in possession, reversion, or "remainder, which he hath, or at the time of "his death shall have, of, in, or to lands," &c.

The court below dismissed so much of the complainant's bill as sought to charge the lands in the hands of the heir, and they appealed to this court.

E. I. Lee, for the appellants.

The only question in this case is, whether the lands passed by this will to the devisee, W. P. Edrington. For if they did, he took them subject to the debts of his father, by the terms of the will.

By the statute they would pass, if such was the intention of the testator.

68*] *That such was his intention is to be inferred from the following facts which appear in the case.

It is evident from the will that he meant to dispose of his whole estate; and that his just debts should be paid at all events. He bequeaths to his son his whole property, after payment of his debts, and certain specific legacies. In the summer of 1803 or 1804, the testator offered to convey this land in payment of his debt to the complainants, which shows that he looked to the land as a fund for that purpose, and that he did not mean to cheat his creditors by converting his personal estate into lands.

The intention of the testator is to be collected not only from the words of his will but from his acts. (1 Wash., 96, Kennon v. M'Roberts; Id., 266, Shermer v. Shermer.)

Taylor, contra.

Under the statute of Hen. 8 (of wills) it has always been holden in England that no after-purchased lands can pass by a will. This will must have the same construction as if the devise had been to a stranger instead of the heir at law. It must have been the intention of the testator, at the time, to devise what he had, not what he had not. It does not appear that he even contemplated a purchase of lands. Under the first part of his will it is clear that he alludes only to personal estate.

In the case of Hamersly v. (3 Call., 289), it is said by the Court of Appeals of Virginia, that the intention to devise after-acquired lands must appear by expressions applicable to that kind of property.

February 23d. WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This was a bill filed on the equity side of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia by the appellants, in order to charge the real estate of Christopher Edrington in the hands of his son and heir at law, William P. Edrington, with the payment of a debt due to the appellants *by Christopher Edrington, the [69 father. The appeal being taken from that part of the decree of the Circuit Court which dismissed the bill so far as it seeks to subject the real estate in the hands of Wm. P. Edrington to the payment of the appellant's demand, the only question now to be considered is, whether the will of Christopher Edrington can be so construed as to charge his real estate with the payment of his debts?

The clauses of the will relied upon by the appellant's counsel for this purpose, are that which expresses the desire of the testator that all his just debts should be paid by his executors, &c., so soon as the means in their power should permit; also another, which authorizes his executors to dispose of, and convey, any of his property that might be necessary for payment of his debts; and a third, which is still stronger, and is expressed as follows: "Should my son, Wm. P. Edrington, to whom I bequeath the whole of my property, after the payment of my debts and provisions above made, die under the age of 21 years, I then give," &c. The testator then proceeds to make certain pecuniary bequests in the event of his son's so dying, and concludes by disposing of the then residue of his property.

At the time that this will was made it is admitted that the testator was not possessed of or entitled to any estate in land, but that afterwards, and a short time previous to his death, he purchased the tract of land which this bill seeks to charge. By an act of the legislature of Virginia, passed in the year 1785, and long before the date of this will, it is declared "that any person aged 21 years and upwards, being of sound mind, and not a married woman, shall have power, at his will and pleasure, by last will and testament in writing, to devise all the estate, right, title, and interest, in possession, reversion, or remainder, which he hath, or at the time of his death shall have, of, in, or to lands," &c. The circumstance, therefore, that the land in question was acquired after the execution of the will, presents no difficulty in this case, if it appears that it was the intention of the testator to devise it to his son; because if it passes at all under the will, it may readily be admitted that the devisee took it subject to the payment of the testator's debts; the parts 70 of the will above recited being *strong to impose such a charge. But although a testator may, under the above law, dispose by will of after-purchased lands, it is nevertheless necessary that his intention to make such a disposition should clearly appear upon the face of the will. The rule in England, as well as in Virginia, at the time this law was passed was, that a will, as to land, speaks at the date of it, and, as to personal estate, at the time of the testator's death. The law created no new or different rule of construction, but merely gave a power to the testator to devise lands which he might possess, or be entitled to, at the time of his death, if it should be his pleasure to do so. The presumption is, that the testator means to confine his bequests to land to which he is then entitled; and this presumption can only be overruled by words clearly showing a contrary intention.

In this will there are no expressions which indicate an intention to devise, or in any manner to charge, lands which the testator might afterwards acquire. It does not appear that the testator contemplated, at the time he made his will, the purchase of any land, and the words, "estate" and "property," to be found in it, may be fully satisfied by applying them to the personal property of which he was possessed.

It is therefore the opinion of the court that there is no error in the decree of the Circuit Court, and that the same ought to be affirmed with costs.

v.
THOMPSON AND MARIS.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J., and JOHNSON, J.

It is a fatal objection to a deposition taken under the judiciary act of 1789, section 30, that it was opened out of court.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

On the trial in the court below, the defendant, Beale, offered in evidence the deposition of Tunis Craven, taken before the judge of the District Court of the United States, for the District of New Hampshire, under the 30th sec. of the judiciary act of Sep. 24th, 1789 (vol. 1, p. 68), which, after prescribing the mode of taking *depositions, directs that "the de- [*71 "positions so taken shall be retained by such "magistrate until he deliver the same with his "own hand into the court for which they are "taken; or shall, together with a certificate of "the reasons aforesaid of their being taken, "and of the notice, if any, given to the adverse "party, be, by him, the said magistrate, sealed "up and directed to such court, and remain "under his seal until opened in court."

The deposition was sealed up by the judge, but directed to the clerk of the court, and he, supposing it to be a letter respecting his official business, opened it out of court.

The court below rejected the deposition; which being stated in a bill of exceptions, the defendant, Beale, brought his writ of error.

The question respecting the informality of opening the deposition out of court, was not argued in this court, there being another objection to it, which the counsel deemed more important, viz., that the deponent was the drawer of the note upon which the suit was brought against the defendant, Beale, as indorser; the purport of the deposition being to show that Beale had not due notice of the non-payment of the note by the deponent.

Law & Jones, for the plaintiff in error.

Morsell, for the defendants in error.

Feb. 23d. STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The single point in this case is whether the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, erred in rejecting the deposition of Tunis Craven.

Independent of all other grounds, the court are of opinion that the fact of the depositions not having been opened in court is a fatal objection.

The statute of 24th September, 1789 (ch. 20, sec. 30), is express on this head.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

*CLEMENTSON v. WILLIAMS. [*72

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

An acknowledgement of the original justice of a claim is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations; the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due.

The statute of limitations is entitled to the same respect with other statutes, and ought not to be explained away. Quære, whether an acknowledgment by one partner, after dissolution of the partnership, is sufficient to take a case out of the statute of limitations.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria.

The facts of the case are thus stated by the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff instituted a suit against James

Williams and John Clarke, merchants and partners trading under the firm of John Clarke & Co. The writ was executed on Williams only, who pleaded non assumpsit and the act of limitations, on which pleas issues were joined. The jury found that the defendant did not assume, and judgment was rendered in his favor.

At the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove the partnership, and also to prove dealings of Clarke & Co. with the plaintiff. He then offered a witness who proved that he presented, in December preceding the trial, to John Clarke a certain account against the said John Clarke & Co., in favor of the plaintiff; and that said Clarke stated that the said account was due, and that he supposed it had been paid by the defendant, but had not paid it himself, and did not know of its being ever paid. And the witness to whom the said Clarke made the said acknowledgement produces in court the identical account so presented to said Clarke and acknowledged by him as aforesaid, which account is in the words and figures following, to wit: "an account," &c. "And the plaintiff's counsel offered the contents of said account, and the acknowledgment of said Clarke, in evidence under the issue joined upon the plea of the statute of limitations, but the court decided that the said evidence so offered by the plaintiff of the contents of the said account, and of the acknowledgment of the same by the said Clarke, was not admissible evidence in this cause, and refused to admit the same." To this opinion the plaintiff excepted, and from the judgment of the Circuit Court he has appealed to this court.

73*] Taylor*, for the plaintiff in error.

The only question is, whether the acknowledgment of one partner, after the dissolution of the partnership, takes the case out of the statute of limitations.

We contend that it does, and rely on the following cases: Doug., 651, Whitcomb v. Whiting; 2 H. Bl., 340, Jackson v. Fairbanks, and 2 Johnson, 667, Smith v. ———.

F. S. Key, contra.

Although the opinion of the court may be supported upon other grounds, yet it may also be supported upon the point raised, viz., that the acknowledgment of one partner, after dissolution of the copartnership, cannot be received to take the case out of the statute. It can only be evidence of a new promise, and one partner cannot, after dissolution, bind the other. No acknowledgment of the debt by one partner, after dissolution, can be given in evidence on the general issue to fix the debt upon the other partner. The cases in Douglass and H. Blackstone are different. The joint concern was not dissolved. The authority in Johnson was only a dictum; the case was decided upon other evidence.

Such evidence would be extremely dangerous. No man could be safe if, after dissolution of the partnership, his partner could continue to bind him forever. At all events it is necessary that the plaintiff should first prove the orignal debt by other evidence.

Jones, in reply.

If the opposite doctrine be correct, then, even if each of the partners should acknowledge the debt, the evidence would not support a joint action.

The acknowledgment is not considered as a new promise, but simply as rebutting the presumption of payment arising from the length of time, and thereby taking the case out of the reason of the statute.

Feb. 19th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*It is contended by the plaintiff in error that, after the dissolution of the partnership, the acknowledgment of one partner is evidence to revive the original cause of action against both, and that the acknowledgment made in this case by Clarke is sufficient for that purpose. [74

It has been frequently decided that an acknowledgment of a debt, barred by the statute of limitations, takes the case out of that statute, and revives the original cause of action. So far as decisions have gone on this point, principles may be considered as settled, and the court will not lightly unsettle them. But they have gone full as far as they ought to be carried, and this court is not inclined to extend them. The statute of limitations is entitled to the same respect with other statutes, and ought not to be explained away.

In this case there is no promise, conditional or unconditional; but a simple acknowledgment. This acknowledgment goes to the original justice of the account; but this is not enough. The statute of limitations was not enacted to protect persons from claims fictitious in their origin, but from ancient claims, whether well or ill founded, which may have been discharged, but the evidence of discharge may be lost. It is not, then, sufficient to take the case out of the act, that the claim should be proved or be acknowledged to have been originally just; the acknowledgment must go to the fact that it is still due.

In the case at bar, the acknowledgment of John Clarke is that he had not discharged the account presented to him, but he does not say that it was not discharged. His partner may have paid it without the knowledge of Clarke, and, consequently, the declaration of Clarke that he had not himself paid it, and that he did not know whether his partner had paid it or not, is no proof that the debt remains due, and therefore is not such an acknowledgment as will take the case out of the statute of limitations.

There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed with costs.

*GRACIE [75

v.

THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF BALTIMORE.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

A policy on goods to be safely landed at Leghorn is discharged by landing them at the lazaretto; that being the usage of the trade.

Quære, whether ransom can be recovered where there is a warranty against particular average.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

The facts of the case, as stated by MARSHALL, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, were as follows:

This case arises on a policy of insurance bearing date the 19th of June, 1807, for $20,000 on the cargo of the ship Spartan, "at and from Baltimore to Leghorn," the risk to commence on the loading, and to continue "until the said goods shall be safely landed at Leghorn aforesaid."

The policy contained, in the printed part, the usual stipulation that the assured, in case of loss, shall labor, &c., for the preservation and recovery of the goods, to the expense of which the assurers would contribute according to the rate of the sum insured; in the policy is inserted, in writing, the words "warranted free from particular average."

The vessel sailed from Baltimore in June, 1807, and on the 15th of August arrived in the port of Leghorn.

According to the laws and usages of the place, ships arriving at that port, and their cargoes, were obliged to perform a quarantine of thirty days before admission of the cargo, or of any person on board, into the city; the ships performing it in the port, the cargoes in a certain lazaretto ereeted for that purpose on the shore of the port about half a mile from the city. Some specified articles were excepted from this rule, but the cargo of the Spartan did not come within the exception. On the arrival in port of a vessel liable to quarantine, the offi- [*76 cers *of government took possession of the cargo, and removed it in public lighters to the lazaretto. Freight was earned upon the depositing of the cargo in the lazaretto, but payment of it, though often made before, could not be enforced until after the expiration of the quarantine, and until payment, the lien for the freight continued on the goods. The duties also accrued in the lazaretto, and until they were paid the goods could not be removed thence into the city.

The goods remained in the custody of the officers of government until the expiration of the quarantine, during the continuance of which neither the master of the ship nor the consignees had any power to interfere with, or even see them, but under a permit from the local authorities; such permits were commonly allowed the consignees, who might take samples, and sell by those samples, while the goods were performing quarantine.

After quarantine was performed, and an order from the master obtained, the goods were received at the lazaretto by the owner or consignee, and transported at his risk and expense into the city. This transportation was most usually made by water; but there was a road along which light goods might be, and frequently were, carried. Even when goods were sold during the quarantine, they were removed at the risk and charge of the vendors.

In conformity with these regulations, the cargo of the Spartan was placed in the lazaretto. While it remained there, performing quarantine, a body of French troops took possession of the city, seized the lazaretto, sequestered the goods there deposited, and refused to give them up until a ransom, amounting to 53 per cent. on their estimated value, should be paid for them. This ransom the owners or consignees were compelled to pay in order to obtain restitution of their goods. This action is brought to recover it from the underwriters.

Judgment was rendered in the Circuit Court for the defendants, which judgment is now brought before this court by a writ of error.

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, con- [*77
tended,

1st. That the landing at the lazaretto was not a landing in safety at Leghorn, within the meaning of the policy.

2d. That the plaintiff is not prevented, by the warranty against particular average, from recovering the amount of the ransom paid.

1. The goods were not landed in safety at Leghorn. They were landed at the lazaretto, which is no part of the city of Leghorn. The landing contemplated by the policy was at the city—the place where the goods were to find a market; and not merely a landing at the port. The voyage as to the ship might terminate at the port, but the goods were to go to the city, and be landed in safety. After having performed quarantine at the lazaretto, they were to be reshipped into lighters and carried to the city.

But if the landing at the Lazaretto be a landing at Leghorn, yet they were not landed in safety within the meaning of the policy. It is natural to suppose that the parties meant such a landing as would put the cargo into the possession and under the control of the consignee. But while it was at the lazaretto, it was subject to the orders of the master, not of the consignee. It was still liable for freight, and although it is said to be part of the usage of the trade that the freight is earned by the delivery at the lazaretto, yet it is not payable until the termination of the quarantine. The lazaretto is a mere substitute for the ship as a place in which to perform the quarantine. If it had remained on board the vessel it would unquestionably have been at the risk of the underwriters. The landing was for their benefit inasmuch as the goods were safer on shore than in the ship.

The seizure was a detention of princes, and until the goods were ransomed they were lost. (1 Marshall, 264, 176, Waples v. Eames; Id., 269, 181, Pelly v. Roy. Ex. Assur.)

2. Notwithstanding the warranty against particular *average, the plaintiff may re- [*78 cover upon the clause of the policy authorizing him to labor and travel for the preservation of the property, to the expense whereof the underwriters promise to contribute according to the rate of the sum insured. The ransom was an expense incurred to save the residue and prevent a total loss, for which the underwriters would have been liable.

Jones and Pinkney, contra.

1. The voyage was ended by the landing of the goods at the lazaretto. The policy is satisfied if they are landed at the port of Leghorn. When the name of a place is used in a policy it means the port, although Leghorn is a city, yet the port is also called Leghorn. When a place is named as the terminus of the voyage, it means the usual place to which ships come to unlade. It does not always mean the caput portus. It sometimes means the house of general receipt. Doubtful expressions are to be construed in favor of the underwriters. (1 Burr., 348, 349, Tierney v. Etherington, cited by Lord Mansfield in the Bank Saul case of Pelly v. Roy. Ex. Assur.; 1 Marshall, 250, 251, Hargrave's Law Tracts, 46; Halc's Treatise de portubus Maris, ch. 2, p. 56.) The termination of the voyage, in fact and in law. is the landing of the goods at the usual place of landing, at the ultimatc port of destination according to the usage of that trade. The usage of the tradc is all important. The parties are bound to know it. It forms part of their contract. It may control and modify a warranty, and illustrate thc termination of the voyage. The case states that the freight was earned by delivery at the lazaretto—the duties had accrued to the Etrurian government—the transportation from thence to the city would have becn at the risk and expense of the consignee or the owner. It was also a placc where the goods might bc sold by samples. All these circumstanccs show that the voyage was cndcd. The general rule is that if the insured undertakes to transport the goods, the underwriters are discharged. (1 Marshall, 165, 249, Sparrow v. Caruthers; Id., 166, 253, Rucker v. Lond. Assur.; Id., 167, 254, Hurry v. Roy. Ex. Assur.) The lien for the freight depends either upon the agreement of the parties on the municipal law of the place; it does not affect the 79] question respecting the *termination of the voyage. In the cases of Tierney v. Etherington and Pelly v. Roy. Ex. Assur., the voyage confessedly was not terminated. The government of Leghorn receives the cargo at the lazaretto as the agent of the owner or consignee and holds it for his benefit; it is cntered on the books of the lazaretto in thc name of the ship, the master and the consignee, if known.

The policy was never construed to undertake that the consignee should have the unlimited control over the cargo after it was landed. But in this case it was under his control; not absolute, but modified by the municipal government of the place. The government had a right so to modify it. Thus, in London, somc goods must be dcposited in the King's warehouse. So also in France, the Emperor took it into his hcad to turn merchant and monopolize all the tobacco, and ordered it to be stored in his warehouses. In all countries the power of the consignee is in a certain degree modified. He had a power to take samples and sell by them.

It is said also that the goods were to bc landed at the placc of market. But if the place of market means the place where the goods may be sold, and wherc thcy are under the control of the consignee, the lazaretto was that place. The lazaretto was an appendage to Leghorn, as the Piræum was to Athens. Suppose the voyage had been from Carthagc to Athens, landing at the Piræum would havc terminated the voyage. So would a voyage from the West Indies to London terminate at the Wcst India dock; yet somcthing must be prcviously done by a consignee at the dock before he can have the complete control over the goods in the warehouses of the dock company. So, in the port of Baltimore, some goods must be delivered at the lazaretto. And if a cargo should be delivered at Fell's Point (which is out of the city) under a policy on a voyage to Baltimore, the policy would be discharged. The cargo would have been brought to its market.

In the case of Waples v. Eames, the ship was not 24 hours moored in good safety. There was no opportunity to unlade. But here the goods were actually unladen. *In the [80 Bank Saul case there was no question whether the voyage was ended. Thc ship was in itinere. Thc only question was whether, by the usage of the trade, the goods might be unladen for safc keeping while the vessel was repairing.

2. It was only a partial loss, which is excepted from the policy by the manuscript warranty against particular average; which means partial loss.

Although it would have been a total loss if abandonment had been offered while the goods wcre detained, yct as no such offer was made, it is now only a partial loss.

Those parts of the policy which are in manuscript are to be particularly rcgarded, as they control the printed form. (1 Marshall, 229, 305; Park, 4, 5, 60; 4 East, 130.)

Ransom is only a partial loss. It was never considered as coming under thc clause of laboring and traveling for the interest of all concerned. If it can come under that clause, then that clause is so far repealed by the express manuscript warranty that the underwriters shall not be liable for a partial loss. If the French general had taken a part of the goods, there could have been no question that the underwriters would not have been liable; the ransom represents the part which might have been so taken. The clause respecting the expenses of labor and travel was first introduced in 1741, to remove a doubt whether thc insured could so labor and travel without lósing his right to abandon; but he is not bound to labor and travel, nor to ransom. (1 Marshall, 234, 488; 3 Burr., 1734; Doug., 610.)

But if the underwriters arc liable under that clause of thc policy, they are only liable in thc proportion which the loss bears to the amount saved.

Harper, in reply.

1. Thc first point dcpcnds upon the usage of the trade. We say that the usage merely substitutes the lazaretto for the ship; like the cases of the storc ship at Gibraltar, *and the [81 Bank Saul at Canton. The principlc of all thcse cases is substitution. The goods were not in the power of the consignee. He could only make an executory contract. He had no more power over the goods than if they had been upon the ocean.

The lien for the freight continues until the end of the quarantine, when it is to bc paid, and not before, because the master has not until then done all that the contract requires.

2. It is said that the excception of partial loss operates upon evcry part of thc policy; not merely upon its general provisions, but upon every particular provision, howevcr contradictory it may be to that exception. But the two clauses—viz., the engagement to pay for labor and travel, and the warranty against partial losses—may stand together. The latter means warranted free from all partial losses except such as arise from labor and travel for the preservation of the goods. The blanks in thc printed form of the clause respecting labor and travel wcre filled in manuscript, as well as the warranty against particular average, and therefore are to be equally regarded. That circumstance also shows that the parties intended that both clauses should stand, and have effect. The ransom was as much the means of saving the underwriters from a total loss as if it had been strictly labor and travel.

February 19th. MARSHALL, Ch. J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The plaintiff in error contends,

1st. That the placing of the goods in the lazaretto was not "a landing in safety at Leghorn," and a termination of the voyage.

2d. If the loss happened during the continuance of the risk, the plaintiff is not prevented from recovering, by the warranty in the policy against particular average.

In support of his first point he contends that "Leghorn," in the policy, means the city, and not the port, of Leghorn.

82*] *2d. That the lazaretto being substituted for the ship for the greater safety of the goods, their situation, as it respects all parties while performing quarantine in the lazaretto, is precisely the same as if performing quarantine in the ship. This argument is supposed to be much strengthened by the facts that freight cannot be demanded until quarantine is performed, and that the lien for the freight continues after the landing of the goods.

3d. That a landing in safety must be such a landing as places the goods at the disposal of the owner or consignee.

However true it may be in general that when we speak of Leghorn we speak of the city which bears that name, it does not follow that the same meaning is attached to the word when used in a policy. The insurance is "at and from Baltimore to Leghorn." Now, if, as is admitted, Baltimore means the port of Baltimore, it would seem not unreasonable to suppose that, in the same instrument, Leghorn means the port of Leghorn—the place which is the ultimate destination of the vessel on board which the goods are laden. The voyage is understood to be terminated when the vessel arrives at her port of destination, and has been moored there in safety for twenty-four hours.

But it will be conceded that the termination of the voyage as to the ship does not necessarily terminate the risk on the goods. This risk may continue when the voyage as to the ship is ended. Its duration depends on the intention of the parties, and this intention must be found in their contract.

This brings us to consider the argument that the goods, while performing quarantine in the lazaretto, remain at the risk of the insurer in like manner as if performing quarantine in the ship.

The words of the policy being "beginning the adventure on the said lawful goods and merchandises from and immediately following the lading thereof on board of said vessel at Baltimore aforesaid, and so shall continue and endure until the said goods and merchandises shall be safely landed at Leghorn aforesaid." The risk continues until the goods be safely 83] landed, although the *voyage as to the ship might be terminated previous to their landing.

In ordinary cases, where the government does not interfere between the parties, this risk would continue until the goods should be landed in safety at the usual place, and at the disposal of the consignee. If it were usual to receive goods at the lazaretto or at any other place on the shore of the port, it would be the duty of the owner or consignee to receive them there, and a landing at such place, it is admitted, would be a landing at Leghorn.

If, on the other hand, the goods while performing quarantine remained on board the ship, and could not be landed, it is not to be doubted that they would remain at the risk of the insurer. How, then, it is asked, can the substitution of the lazaretto for the ship alter this risk? A substitution made, not by the act of the parties, but of the government of the country? A substitution which does not alter the rights of the parties since it leaves the lien of the master for his freight unimpaired, and gives no power over the goods to the owner or consignee? A substitution beneficial to the insurer since it diminishes the risk on the goods?

Whatever might be the effect of this reasoning if the establishment of the lazaretto and the laws of quarantine had been of so recent a date as not to have been in the contemplation of the parties to the contract, as to which the court gives no opinion, this cause may well be decided upon the usage found in this case—a usage of ancient date and of general notoriety. It existed and was known to exist when this contract was formed. When the parties stipulated that the adventure should continue till the goods were landed in safety at Leghorn, they knew that the place of landing was the lazaretto, and that the landing would be made under the direction and control of the local authority. This, then, must be considered as the landing contemplated in the policy. It is the landing which terminates the risk. Had the parties intended to continue the risk during the continuance of the goods in the lazaretto, they would have inserted, in the policy, words manifesting that intention. Instead of terminating the adventure on the landing, a *fact which [84 they knew must take place at the Lazaretto thirty days before the goods could be delivered to the owner or consignee, they would have continued it till the goods should be landed in safety and should perform their quarantine.

The court is of opinion that under this policy the goods in the lazaretto were not at the risk of the underwriters, and consequently that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court.

It is affirmed with costs.

GRACIE
v.
THE MARY'D INS. COMP'Y.

This case differs from that against the Marine Insurance Company of Baltimore only in one particular. A part of the cargo remained on board the ship until the arrival of the French troops, when the departure of the vessel was prohibited by the general and the ransom made.

This circumstance does not, in the opinion of the court, vary the case; because, omitting all other considerations, the loss, within the risk, being on only a part of the cargo, is a partial loss, and is affected by the warranty against particular average loss.

This judgment is also to be affirmed with costs.

RICHARDS AND OTHERS,
ASSIGNEES OF M'KEAN, A BANKRUPT,
v.
THE MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

Upon the death of an assignee under the bankrupt law of the United States, the right of action, for a debt due to the bankrupt, vested in the executor of the assignee.

If an executor do not cause himself to be made party to a suit brought in the life-time, and in the name of the testator, and pending at his death, it is to be considered as a voluntary abandonment of the action, so as to exclude the executor from the equity of the exceptions to the statute of limitations.

Quære, whether the commissioners of bankrupt had a right to appoint a second assignee in case of the death of the first?

At common law, no action could be renewed by journey's accounts, in a case of voluntary abandonment.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of covenant on a 85] policy of insurance *under seal. The defendants pleaded the Marylaud statute of limitation of 12 years (1715, ch. 23, § 6), which enacts, "that uo specialty whatsoever shall be "good aud pleadable, or admitted in evidence "against any person or persons of this prov- "iuce, after the principal debtor aud creditor "have been both dead 12 years, or the debt or "thing in action above 12 years' standing," with a saving of 5 years in cases of infancy, &c.

The replication to this plea stated in substance the following facts: That the cause of action accrued on the 1st of May, 1797. That M'Kean was declared a bankrupt, and on the 19th of March, 1801, his estate was duly assigned to Thomas Allibone, who, on the 6th of October, 1806, instituted a suit on the policy and died ou the 1st of August, 1809, whereby the suit was abated. That on the 11th of January, 1810, the plaintiffs were, by the comuissioners, appointed assignees in pursuance of the choice of the creditors regularly convened for that purpose, and brought the present action at the next term after the death of Allibone, the former assignee. To this replication there was a general demurrer.

The judgment of the court below, upon the demurrer, was in favor of the defendants; and the plaintiffs brought their writ of error.

Harper, for the plaintiffs in error, made four points.

1. That an assignee, under the commission of bankruptcy, had no interest in the effects of the bankrupt which could vest in his executors or administrators, but was a mere trustee or agent of the commissioners.

2. That the commissioners had power, upon the death of an assignee, to appoint another in his stead, and so toties quoties.

3. That under the equity of the statute of limitations the plaintiffs had a right to bring a fresh suit upon the abatement of the first.

4. That there was a good continuance of the suit by journey's accounts.

*1. The bankrupt law gave no estate [86 to the assignee. He had no interest in the effects of the bankrupt; the object of the law was merely to appoint a curator of the estate, with an authority like that of an administrator. It was a mere personal agency which terminated by the death of the assignee. It was the intention of the law that this agent should have the confidence of the creditors; but that inteution would be defeated if the executor or admiuistrator of the assignee should bccome the agent. (Vide Baukrupt law of the United States, vol. 5, p. 50, § 6, 7 and 8.)

2. The commissioners, under the equity of the 6th and 8th scctions, had power to appoint a new assignee or assignees in case of the death of the assignee for the time being. Their power was like that of the ordinary in granting letters of administration. No express authority is given to the ordinary to grant letters de bonis non, yet his authority to do it was never disputed. The iutention of the baukrupt law was that there should always be an assignee until the estate should be settled. The general power to appoint, implies an authority to keep the office always full. The plaintiffs, therefore, had power to maiutain this action.

3. The act of limitations does not apply to this case. (2 Salk., 421, Cary and Ux. v. Stephenson.) The priuciple of that case was that the plaintiffs had done all in their power, aud, therefore, the statute of limitation was not a bar. To make the statute apply there must be negligence on the part of the plaiutiff' and injury to the defendant by the delay. If an administrator comuence the action within a year after the granting of letters of administration, the statute is no bar, unless it began to run in the life of the iutestate. So in the case of an executor of an executor. (Buller N. P., 150; Esp. N. P., 150.) These cases all depeud on the same general principle—the cquity of the statute. If there be no negligence on the part of the plaintiff aud no injury to the defendant, the easc is within that equity.

4. This uew action is a good continuation of the old suit by journey's accounts. (6 Co., 10, Spencer's case). A new action by Journey's accounts may be had where the former actiou abates by the fault of the clerk, &c., but *not if it be abated by his own default. [87 The doctriue applies as well to personal as to real actions. (1 Ld. Ray., 283, Elstob v. Thorowgood.) The principle of that case is that where the second plaintiff derives his authority from the saine source as the first, he may have the action by Journey's account.

Pinkney, contra.

The argument divides itself into two parts.

1. The construction of the act of Congress.

2. The effect of the act of limitations.

1. Under the bankrupt law the commissioners had no power to appoint a new assignee in case of the death of the first assignee. Their power in this respect was limited to the case of a removal of the assignee by the creditors. Much is said about the equity of the statute, but this court is authorized jus dicere, non jus dare. The 6th section provides for the appointment of an assignee. The 7th authorizes the commissioners to appoint a temporary assignee without the consent of the creditors, and the 8th section provides for the removal of an assignee, and the appointment of another in his place. If the court can extend the equity of the statute to the case of the death of an assignee, it must be by a very liberal construction.

By the 18th section the estate and effects of the bankrupt are to be conveyed to the assignee, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever. The 50th section conveys the same idea. The estate descends to the heir of the assignee, clothed with the trust, and he has all the rights and is subject to all the responsibilities and duties of the original assignee.

But if the court can, by equity, extend the power of the commissioners to the appointment of a new assignee in case of death, then, under the 9th section of the act, the new assignee might have been substituted for the old, and the action would not have abated by the death, but might have been prosecuted to judgment by the new assignee. So that if the suit was 88] abated, it was through *his negligence, or voluntary act; and no plaintiff, who is in default, can have the benefit of the equity of the statute by journey's accounts.

2. As to the Maryland statute of limitations. It differs from the English statute of 21 Jac., which contains no limitation of actions upon specialties, judgments or recognizances. The same rule of equitable construction, therefore, cannot apply to both. But even if the same rule of construction could be applied to the Maryland statute, yet it does not contain the same clause upon which the equity arises in England.

The object of the statute was to prevent injury to defendants by the loss of evidence. If the statute once begins to run nothing will stop its course but an effectual suit. If a promise be made to a feme sole, and the day after the cause of action accrues, she marry, the statute continues to run notwithstanding the coverture; so in case of non compos, absence, &c. (4 Bac. Ab., 479, note; 1 Bac. Ab., 413.)

But it is only the equity of the 4th section of the English statute that could have aided the plaintiffs. That section allows a new action to be brought within a year, in three cases. 1. Where judgment has been reversed by writ of error. 2. Where judgment has been arrested; and, 3. Where an outlawry has been reversed. (4 Bac. Ab., 471, Gwillim's edition, § 4.) The courts have said that abatement is within the same reason, but they have not said that other representatives than those mentioned in the 4th section may bring a new action, (except in the case in Lord Raymond, which has been overruled in that respect. (1 Ld. Ray., 284.)

The Maryland statute does not contain a section similar to the 4th section of the 21st James.

Harper. But that section of the English statute has been always in use in Maryland in that respect, and is in daily practice in their courts; and, therefore, and by force of the bill of rights and constitution of Maryland, has been adopted as part of the law of the land.

89*] Pinkney. The statute of James is not in force in Maryland in respect to those cases for which the statute of Maryland provides. This statute professes to provide a limitation for all actions, and to enumerate all cases in which exceptions should be made. With the English statute before them, and while exercised in selecting such parts of it as they thought proper, the legislature cannot be presumed to have been so negligent as to omit the 4th section if they intended to adopt it.

But if it be in force in Maryland, this court will not push the equity of it farther than has been done in the courts in England. They have never permitted such a representative as these plaintiffs are to bring a new action, nor any one to bring a new action where the benefit of the former one has been lost by negligence or voluntary abandonment; which we say was the case here, for the action might certainly have been continued and maintained by either the executor of Allibone or by the new assignees. In the case cited from 2 Salk., 421, Cary v. Stephenson, the cause of action arose after the death of the intestate and before the letters of administration were granted. For if the statute had begun to run in the life of the intestate, it would have continued to run although no administration had been granted.

The next case is Carver v. James, or Carver v. James, or Karver v. James, as it is differently called in several books. (Buller, N. P., 150; Esp. N. P., 150; Wille's Rep., 255.) In that case the action was brought by the executor, and the equity of the 4th section of 21 Jac. extends only to the party himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, and not to any other representative. The case cited from 1 Ld. Ray., 283, supports the same doctrine. Both plaintiffs were executors of the original creditor. The court decided the case upon the doctrine of journey's accounts and the equity of the 4th section of the statute of James. The case put by the court, by way of illustration, is precisely in point. If the first plaintiff had been administrator (instead of executor) durante minoritate, the executor, when of age, could not have continued the suit by journey's accounts, nor would he have been aided by the equity of the statute, because he was not the legal representative of the *former plaint- [90 iff. There is no case in which an assignee has been decided to be within the equity of that section of the statute. Although both assignees may derive their authority from the same source, yet the one is not the legal representative of the other. The opinion in the case of Elstob v. Thorowgood (Ld. Raymond, 283) is expressly retracted in the case of Kinsey v. Heyward (1 Ld. Ray., 432), where the same court say "that in no "case can a writ of journey's accounts be, "but by the same plaintiffs, or some of them, "who were plaintiffs in the former writ; and "that to say that the general executor, and the "executor durante minoritate, were as one per- "son in the office, is to strain the point too far; "for it must be the same plaintiff, not only by "representation, but by name; for the second "writ is a continuance of the first, which can- "not be but by the same person, not in repre- "sentation only, or in respect of their office, "but strictly and truly the same person."

Jones, same side.

Even if the doctrine of journey's accounts could apply, the plaintiffs were too late. In journey's accounts the writ is said to be granted per dietas computatas, which originally meant as many days journeys as the plaintiff was distant from the Court of Chancery, where he was obliged to go to get a new writ, accounting 20 miles for a day's journey, and it was originally necessary to show the number of days in the replication that by computation it might appear that he was within the time allowed. This was afterwards settled by a general rule to be 30 days. In this replication the plaintiff has replied simply the facts, and says nothing of the dietas computatas. The new writ, by journey's accounts, operates a continuance of the old suit, and in the judgment the plaintiff recovers the costs of both writs, and, therefore, it must be brought by the same plaintiff. (8 Co. 10, Spencer's case; 2 Inst., 288; 2 Com. Dig., 433, Tit. costs.) In none of the cases decided upon the equity of the statute of James has the plaintiff prevailed upon appeal. They are little better than obiter dicta.

Harper, in reply.

The opposite counsel almost admit our con-
91 *] struction *of the bankrupt law. The authority of the assignee is like that of an administrator. The power of the commissioners is like that of the ordinary.

Although the writ was abated, yet the plaintiffs might renew the suit. They were not in default by not continuing the old writ, for if they might have continued it, they were not obliged so to do. Thus in Maryland an executor may be made a party in the place of his testator; but if he does not come in and the suit is thereby abated, he may bring a new suit. The right of the plaintiffs to continue the old suit, under the 9th section of the bankrupt law, was doubtful. They preferred a safe, plain, clear, undeniable remedy. Their having done so ought not to exclude them from the equity of the statute of limitations.

It is well known to every lawyer in Maryland that the 4th section of the statute of James had been used and practiced in the courts of that state, and it has, therefore, become the law of the land by force of the bill of rights.

The case of Kinsey v. Heyward was not reversed on its merits; the doctrine of the Court of Common Pleas, that the plaintiff was within the equity of the 4th section of the statute of James, was not denied by the King's beneh. Nor was the case of Carver v. James reversed upon the merits. The doctrine, therefore, was in effect affirmed by implieation; because they would not have assigned other causes of reversal if the principle of the case itself was erroneous.

February 25th. JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This is an action of covenant brought on a policy of insurance under seal. The facts as made out in the pleadings are these: The cause of action accrued on the 1st May, 1797. M'Kean was declared a bankrupt, and on the 19th Mareh, 1801, his estate was assigned to Thomas Allibone. On the 6th of October, 1806, the assignee instituted a suit on this policy and died on the 1st of August, 1809.

On the 11th of January, 1810, the plaintiffs 92 *] were *appointed assignees in pursuance of the choice of the creditors regularly convened for that purpose, and brought the present action to the term next after the death of the assignee.

The plea is the statute of limitations. To this is filed a speeial replicatiou, setting forth the above facts with a view to sustain an exception from the operation of the statute. The case comes up on a demurrer to the replication, and for the defendant there were two points made at bar. 1st. That the action is not maiutainable at all by the present plaintiffs, because the bankrupt act makes no provision for the appointment of a new assignee upon the demise of the first. 2d. That the right of action vests in his personal representative and could be maintained by him; that the abatement by the death of the first assignee was a voluutary abandonment of the suit, and put the case of the plaintiffs out of the reason of the exceptions from the operation of the statute. In support of the action it was conteuded, that the former suit abated by the death of the first assignee; that the right did not vest in his executors, because it was a mere trust or agency; that the right of substituting the new assignees in the action is securcd only in the case of removal by the creditors; that this case is without the statute of limitations upon an equitable construction of that statute; and lastly, that this action is a good continuance of the former, by journey's account.

We are of opinion that the plea of the statute of limitations must be sustained. On the first point made by the defendaut, the court would be understood to give no opinion. Being satisfied that the plaintiff has not brought himself within auy one of the exceptions which havc bcen admitted to the statute of limitations, and feeling no inclination to multiply those exceptions, they dispose of the case upon the second ground alone. The cases which, though literally within the words of the statute, havc been held to be without its spirit, are those only in which circumstances intervened, which rendered it impossible or inconsistent with known and established principles, that a cause of action could be revived by the renewal of the contract, or enforced by a suit at law within the time prescribed. The object *of the law is to [*93 secure the individual from the machinations of dishonesty, when attempted under the advantages attendant upon lapse of time, loss of papers, and death of witnesses. But when cases present themselves in which no laches can be imputed to the plaintiffs, but great injusticc would be done by applying to such cases the effect of the statute, the conclusion of reason and of the law is that such cases were not in the mind of the legislature when enacting that law. Such are the eases of a want of parties, plaintiff or defendant, whereby a temporary suspension of legal remedy takes place. But in no case of a voluntary abandonment of an action has an exception to the statute of limitations been supported. And such, we are of opinion, is the case before us. Whether it was or was not a case in which the bankrupt law authorizes the appointmeut of the present assignee we deem immaterial. The ease is certainly not within the express letter of the statute, and it is only under its equitable, and perhaps its proper construction, that the appointment of the new assignees (the present plaintiffs) can be supported. But the same equity which would support this appointment, would support the substitution of the new assignees for the former in the existing action. We are, however, of opinion, that the first assignee was not a mere naked agent or attorney for the creditors. The words of the bankrupt act (sect. 13) are, that the debts assigned to him shall be vested in him, as if they had been contracts made with himself originally. Now, one necessary incident to such a contract would be, that the right of action would vest in his personal representative, and the act of Congress saves the suit from abatement by authorizing the substitution of the executor or administrators instead of the deceased plaintiff. The same answer applies to the antiquated doctrine of continuance by journey's account. The fact is, that the mode of continuing a suit in the name of the executor or administrator provided for by statute is a complete substitute for the continuance by journey's account. But even at common law, such a continuance or connection of suit was allowed in no case of voluntary abandonment, and if the benefit of it was intended to be asserted, it was necessary to claim it in the form of renewing the action.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

*CROWELL AND OTHERS v. M'FADON. 94*]

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

Under the 11th sect. of the embargo act of 25th of April, 1808, the collector was justified in detaining a vessel by his honest opinion that there was an intention to violate or evade the provisions of the embargo laws. It was not necessary for him to show that his suspicion was reasonable.

ERROR to the Supreme Judicial Court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The case, as stated by DUVALL, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

An action of trover for 650 barrels of flour, of the cargo of the schooner Union, was brought by John M'Fadon against Joseph Otis and the appellants, in the Court of Common Pleas for Suffolk County, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, where a trial was had and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants. From this decision there was an appeal to the Supreme Judicial Court of that state, in which the cause was again tried and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiff for $3,716.30 and costs. Joseph Otis died whilst the suit was depending in the Supreme Judicial Court.

The following are the principal facts appearing on the record in this case: The schooner Union, Benjamin Hawes, commander, with a cargo of 650 barrels of flour and five tons of logwood shipped by John M'Fadon, of Baltimore, was cleared at that port for Machias, in Massachusetts, late in the month of April, in the year 1808. She had originally cleared for Passamaquoddy, on the 26th of April, before the collector had received notice of the act of the 25th of the same month which authorized him to detain the vessel. The destination was changed to Machias, and a clearance obtained accordingly. But the original destination of the flour on board—for Eastport—remained on the face of the manifest. The flour was shipped for account and risk of Josiah Dana, of Machias, and in his absence Jonathan Bartlett, of Eastport, or his assigns. The Union sailed from Baltimore the last of April, and meeting with head winds, the commander put into Hyannis in the district of Barnstable. She was soon afterwards boarded by Joseph Crowell, one of the inspectors of the revenue in that district, who, on inspecting her papers, thought proper to submit them *to the examination of Joseph Otis, [*95 the collector. The collector, upon a consideration of the circumstances before stated, was of opinion that it was the intention of the concerned to violate or evade the provisions of the embargo laws, and therefore detained the vessel by virtue of the authority vested in him by the 6th and 11th sections of the act of the 25th of April, 1808, (vol. 9, p. 68), until the decision of the President of the United States could be had thereon. The President, after due inquiry, approved and confirmed the conduct of the collector. The vessel remained in this situation until the 25th of July, when she was taken to Gage's Wharf by Joseph Hawes, inspector of the port, and her cargo was landed and stored, with the assent of the agent of the owners, and the vessel discharged. On the fourth of October following, the collector offered to deliver the flour to the agent on payment of the expense of storing.

The collector detained the Union under the 6th and 11th sections of the act of the 25th of April, 1808. The 6th section provides "that no ship or vessel having any cargo whatever on board, shall, during the continuance of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, be allowed to depart from any port of the United States for any other port or district of the United States adjacent to the territories, colonies or provinces of a foreign nation; nor shall any clearance be furnished to any ship or vessel bound as aforesaid without special permission of the President of the United States." The 11th section provides that the collectors of the customs be and they are respectively authorized to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, whenever in their opinion the intention is to violate or evade any of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo until the decision of the President of the United States be had thereupon.

With this evidence the cause came on to be heard in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and at the trial the judge charged and instructed the jury that, under the circumstances proved by the defendant, neither the said collector or any person by his order, by virtue of the act aforesaid, had any right to intermeddle with or unlade the cargo of the said schooner, and that *such unlading was [*96 an unlawful act and a conversion of the cargo by the defendants; and with this direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff to the amount before mentioned. To this opinion an exception was taken and the cause was removed to this court by a writ of error in pursuance of the 25th section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States.

Pinkney (late Attorney-General of the United States), for the plaintiff in error, Contended, that as the landing and storing the cargo was by consent of the agent of the owner, the only question was, whether the collector was justified in detaining the vessel by his honest suspicion that the intention was to violate or evade the provisions of the embargo laws.

Upon this point he insisted that it was not incumbent on the collector to show that he had reasonable grounds of suspicion. It was sufficient if he satisfied the jury that, in his honest opinion, there was such an intention.

Harper, contra,

Contended, that the question was not whether the detention was justifiable, but whether the unlading was justifiable. If the landing was by the consent of the agent of the owner, it was a consent forced upon him by the detention of the vessel.

But Congress could not mean to subject the vessel to the arbitrary opinion of the collector. The detention was not lawful unless the circumstances justified the suspicion. The collector must at least show probable cause. The facts of the case did not authorize the suspicion.

Pinkney, in reply.

The question is still the same. As the unlading was with the assent of the agent of the owner, it was a lawful act if the detention was lawful. The law did not mean to make the collector responsible for the sound exercise of his discretion. He was to have no guide but 97] *his own honest opinion. It is not like the case of capture as prize of war, where the officer acts at his peril, and must exercise a sound discretion and must have reasonable grounds of suspicion. But here it is put upon the opinion of the collector, and he is bound to act upon that opinion. If he fails to do so, he is liable for a misdemeanor in his office. If he honestly errs in his suspicion he is excused. Whether it be his honest opinion is a matter for the decision of the jury.

This cause was argued at last term by the Attorney-General & Jones for the plaintiffs in error, and by Amory & P. B. Key for the defendants in error.

Pinkney, Attorney-General,

Suggested a doubt whether an action for damages for a seizure on navigable waters was not as much a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction as if the proceedings were in rem.

Amory and Key,

Contended, that the 11th section of the act of 25th April, 1808, only gave authority to the collector of the district who was to grant the clearance, to detain the vessel, and that the collector of another district had no right to stop the vessel passing through an intermediate district. The law gave no right to seize, but merely to detain, which shows that the authority is given only to the collector within whose official control the vessel is. The collector to whom application is to be made for a clearance is the only person to whom the discretion is entrusted. He has the best means of information, and if suspicion should be excited, it is there only that the owner can furnish the means of removing it. The opposite construction of the law would give to collectors at the mouths of our bays the whole control of our commerce, and would subject it to much vexation. The whole trade of the Chesapeake would be subject to the control of the collector of Norfolk.

Jones, in reply,

Contended, that the law authorized any collector of *any district to stop and detain [98 any vessel which might be passing through his district, if he really suspected her of an intention to violate the provisions of the embargo laws.

Feb. 28th. DUVALL, J.,[1] after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"This court is unanimously of opinion that the direction of the judge of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts was erroneous. The law of Congress under which the collector acted is clear and explicit. The collector was bound by law to seize and detain the Union, on her arrival in this district, if, in his opinion, it was the intention to violate or evade any of the provisions of the embargo laws, and his conduct was approved and confirmed by the President. The landing and storing the cargo, whether to preserve it from injury or to secure it from ruin (which, in this case, was done with the consent of the agent of the owner), was a necessary consequence of the detention. The law places a confidence in the opinion of the officer, and he is bound to act according to his opinion; and when he honestly exercises it, as he must do in the execution of his duty, he cannot be punished for it.

The judgment of the court below is reversed with costs.

Approved—9 Cranch. 356.

BEATTY'S ADMINISTRATORS.
v.
BURNES'S ADMINISTRATORS.

Absent—WASHINGTON, J.

The Maryland statute of limitations of three years is a good bar to an action of assumpsit for money had and received, brought to try a title to lands in the city of Washington, under the 5th sect. of the act of Maryland, of Nov. 1791, ch. 45.

Quære, whether, by the Maryland act of cession of the District of Columbia to the United States, the state conveyed to the United States the vacant and unappropriated lands in the district.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting at Washington.

*The case as stated by STORY, J., in de- [99 livering the opinion of the court, was as follows:

This is an action for money had and received, brought by the plaintiffs as administrators of Charles Beatty, deceased, against the defendant as administrator of David Burnes, deceased. The declaration alleges the promise to have been made in the life-time of the respective intestates. The defendant has pleaded the general issue, and the statute of limitations of Maryland.

1—JUDGE LIVINGSTON was absent when this opinion was delivered. JUDGE STORY gave no opinion, having some impression that he was, at a former period, retained as counsel in the cause, although he did not remember arguing it.

Upon the trial in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, the plaintiffs sought to support their action under the 5th section of the statute of Maryland, of Nov., 1791, ch. 45, concerning the territory of Columbia, and the city of Washington; that section is as follows:

"And be it enacted, That all the squares, "lots, pieces and parcels of land within the "said city, which have been or shall be appro- "priated for the use of the United States, and "also the streets, shall remain, and be for "the use of the United States; and all the lots "and parcels which have been or shall be sold "to raise money as a donation as aforesaid, "shall remain and be to the purchasers ac- "cording to the terms and conditions of their "respective purchases."

"And purchases and leases from private per- "sons claiming to be proprietors and having, "or those under whom they claim having, "been in possession of the lands purchased or "leased, in their own right, five whole years "next before the passing of this act, shall be "good and effectual for the estate, and on the "terms and conditions of such purchases and "leases respectively, without impeachment, and "against any contrary title now existing; but "if any person hath made a conveyance, or "shall make a conveyance or lease, of any "lands within the limits of the said city, not "having right and title to do so, the person, "who might be entitled to recover the land un- "der a contrary title now existing, may, either "by way of ejectment against the tenant, or in "an action for money had and received for his "use against the bargainor or lessor, his heirs, ex- "ecutors, administrators or devisees, as the case "may require, recover all money received by 100*] "him *for the squares, pieces or parcels "appropriated for the use of the United States, "as well as for lots or parcels sold, and rents "received by the person not having title as "aforesaid, with interest from the time of the "receipt; and on such recovery in ejectment "where the land is in lease, the tenant shall "thereafter hold under, and pay the rent re- "served to the person making title to and re- "covering the land, but the possession, bona "fide acquired, in none of the said cases shall "be changed."

The plaintiffs offered evidence, that on the 16th of April, 1792, Charles Beatty, the intestate, returned into the land-office for the western shore of Maryland, a certificate of survey dated on the 3d of April, 1792, and then paid the usual caution money for the land described in said certificate. On the 23d May, 1792, a caveat against the issuing of a patent for the lands on said certificate was filed by David Burnes, the intestate, which caveat was discontinued on the 23d of May, 1801, by virtue of a certain act of the state of Maryland. On the same day a patent issued from the land-office to Charles Beatty for the land described in said certificate, which land is within the limits of the city of Washington, and was taken up by Beatty as a vacancy; but Beatty never had actual possession thereof, nor ever claimed to make division thereof with the city commissioners as an original proprietor pursuant to the statute of Maryland, 1791, ch. 45. In fact the same land had been held and claimed by David Burnes in his own right, for more than five years before the passing of the statute aforesaid, as included in the lines of a grant made as early as 1720. The plaintiff offered evidence, however, that the land included in Beatty's patent was without the lines of the land to which Burnes was, under his grant, really entitled, and that it was vacant land of the state of Maryland. The warrant, under which Beatty's patent was obtained, was (before the location within the limits of Washington), in part, located upon and applied to other lands of the state of Maryland, not within the said city, or the county in which it was situate while belonging to Maryland. Burnes, in his life-time, and before the statute of 1791, ch. 45, made a conveyance of the land in controversy as an original proprietor to certain trustees for the purposes named in that *statute, and received of the city com- [101 missioners on account of parts of the same land appropriated to city purposes, the sum of $7,343.82, in various sums paid between October, 1792, and June, 1796; and also received $1,000 on account of other parts of said land which he sold and conveyed to individuals. Burnes died in May, 1799, and administration of his estate was granted in Prince George's County, in the same year to his widow, who died in January, 1807. In April, 1803, administration of his estate was granted to the defendant, by the Orphan's Court of Washington County, in the District of Columbia. Beatty died some time before May, 1805, and in that month administration of his estate was granted to the plaintiffs. The present action is brought to recover the money so received by Burnes, upon the ground that it was the proceeds of the sale and disposition of land included in Beatty's patent. No demand or claim was ever made by Beatty on Burnes or his administrators, in his life-time, for the same money, although both parties from the year 1791 until their respective deaths lived within the limits of the District of Columbia and within two miles of each other; nor did the plaintiffs ever make any demand or claim upon the defendant until February, 1810. Under these circumstances the court below were of opinion that the plaintiffs could not sustain the action, and upon that direction the jury found a verdict for the defendant.

F. S. Key, for the plaintiffs in error.

Two questions arise in this case.

1st. Whether the plaintiffs have a good cause of action under the patent to Beatty, if not barred by the statute of limitations; and,

2d. Whether the statute of limitations is a bar to the action.

1. As to the title of Beatty. The caveat by Burnes was pending when Congress assumed the jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, which was on the 27th of February, 1801. The patent did not issue until the 23d May, 1801, but according to the law of Maryland, adopted *as the law of that part of the District [102 of Columbia in which the land lies, the title has relation to the return of the certificate of survey and payment of the purchase money to the state, if the original warrant of survey was general; but if it was a special warrant, the title relates to the date of the warrant. That is to say, in either case the title relates to that act of the party which appropriates and locates a particular tract of land under a warrant of survey. Beatty had two warrants. The first was a special warrant for 80 acres, and was dated the 22d of April, 1791, before the statute of Maryland of 1791, which ceded the territory of Columbia to the United States. The other warrant was for 6 acres, and was dated the 26th of March, 1792. A special warrant contains the name of the county in which it is to be executed, and also such a location, or description of the land intended to be surveyed, as the party directs. It binds and secures the land, therein described, from the operation of other warrants, but it may be located anywhere else. A common warrant is for the number of acres required, "not formerly surveyed for, nor cultivated by any person," and is directed to any surveyor legally required. (Kilty's Landholder's Assistant, 468.)

Beatty's title relates (if not to the date of the first warrant) to the date of the return of the certificate of survey, and payment of the purchase money, which was on the 16th of April, 1792.

Nothing but the form of a grant was necessary to complete the title before Congress assumed the jurisdiction.

But it is contended, that the state of Maryland, by the 2d section of the act of Nov., 1791, ch. 45, ceded to the United States the land in question. That section is as follows: "Be it enacted," &c., "that all that part of "the said territory called Columbia, which "lies within the limits of this state, shall be, "and the same is hereby acknowledged to be, "forever ceded and relinquished to the Con"gress and government of the United States, "in full and absolute right and exclusive juris"diction, as well of soil as of persons resid"ing, or to reside, thereon, pursuant to the 103*] "tenor and effect of *the eighth sec"tion of the first article of the constitution of "government of the United States; provided "that nothing herein contained shall be so con"strued to vest in the United States any right "of property in the soil, as to affect the rights "of individuals therein, otherwise than the same "shall or may be transferred by such individu"als to the United States; and provided also "that the jurisdiction of the laws of this state, "over the persons and property of individuals "residing within the limits of the cession afore"said, shall not cease or determine until Con"gress shall by law provide for the government "thereof, under their jurisdiction, in manner "provided by the article of the constitution "before recited."

This section did not transfer to the United States the vacant lands in the District of Columbia.

The 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States only gave Congress power "to exercise exclusive legislation over "such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) "as may, by cession of particular states, and "the acceptance of Congress, become the seat "of the government of the United States." It did not authorize Congress to accept the right of soil. The act of Maryland does not use the words of conveyance of soil. They purport only a cession of jurisdiction. "Ceded and relinquished" are not words of grant. If they conveyed the soil they conveyed the persons also, for the same words are applied to them as to the soil. The legislature of Maryland were not competent to convey the soil, and it is doubtful whether they could transfer the jurisdiction. A title to vacant lands in this part of the district could only be attained by the regular proceedings in the land-office of Maryland.

2. As to the statute of limitations.

The action of assumpsit given by the 5th section of the act of Nov., 1791, c. 45, is not to be considered as within the clause of the statute of limitations applicable to assumpsits. It purports to be a substitute for an action of ejectment, which is limited to 20, not to 3 years. It is evident that the object of the legislature was merely to protect the possession, not to take away the right. *It is therefore natu- [*104 ral to suppose that they intended that every person who could maintain ejectment should be entitled to maintain this action of assumpsit which was given in lieu of it, and only given that the judgment might affect the vendor and not the vendee: and that the plaintiff should recover the price and not the land itself. The statute applied to conveyances and sales, then, already made, as well as to conveyances and sales thereafter to be made. Suppose a sale made more than three years before the statute. The legislature did not surely intend to give a barred remedy in the place of an effective one. An action of debt given by statute for an escape is not barred by the statute of limitations.

But this is a case of trust, and trusts are not within the statute of limitations. Burnes received the money for the use of Beatty. In a case of trust, the statute does not begin to run till a demand is made. On this point there is a case of money received by an attorney for his client; and another of fees received for a judge by his clerk. We could not prevent Burnes from receiving the money. The law, therefore, makes him our trustee.

Jones, contra.

It is said that the legislature of Maryland was not competent to convey the soil, and that Congress had no power to accept it.

Exclusive legislation comprehends all the rights over the territory and inhabitants which the state of Maryland had. If, therefore, the authority rested upon those words alone, the right to accept a cession of the soil would be implied. The constitution of the United States requires a cession of territory before Congress could exercise exclusive legislation. The constitution of Maryland does not limit the mode in which the state shall grant its vacant lands. It is competent to do it by a legislative act as well as by the intervention of the land-office. But the constitution of the United States is paramount to the constitution of Maryland as to the cession of the district of ten miles square. It authorizes particular states to cede as well as Congress to accept.

*The 2d section of the act of Mary- [*105 land, 1791, c. 45, has sufficient words to pass the right of soil as well as of jurisdiction. It declares "that all that part of the territory called Columbia, which lies within the limits of this state shall be, and the same is hereby acknowledged to be, forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and government of the United States, in full and absolute right" "of soil," and "full and absolute" "exclusive jurisdiction" "of persons residing," &c., with a proviso that the right of soil should not so vest in the United States as to affect the rights of individuals therein. This implies an intention that the right of soil should vest in the United States wherever the rights of individuals should not be affected thereby. It is not only clear, therefore, that the state was competent to convey, and has used sufficient words of conveyance; but it is equally clear that it was its intention to convey, and that it has conveyed to the United States all its lands which were vacant at the date of the act, (19th December, 1791). It follows, therefore, that on the 3d of April, 1792, the date of the survey, the state of Maryland had no vacant lands in the District of Columbia, liable to be surveyed under the warrant.

The act of 1791 gives the action only to a person whose title then existed, (19th Dec., 1791). Beatty's title relates back no farther than the 16th of April, 1792, the date of the return of the certificate of survey, and the payment of the money to the state.

2. As to the statute of limitations. We admit that when a statute gives an entire new cause of action, it may not be barred by the act of limitations. But this statute only gives a new form of remedy upon an old cause of action. The declaration does not purport to be founded on the statute. It contains only a general count for money had and received to the plaintiff's use.

As to a trust not being within the act of limitations, the cases on that point are all in equity. But here there was no trust. The parties were adverse claimants.

F. S. Key, in reply.

1. The state of Maryland had sovereign rights, 106] *and private rights. She meant to grant only her sovereign rights. She presumed that all the soil had been granted to individuals, and that there was no vacant land in the district. The terms she used are appropriate to a transfer of jurisdiction only.

The 3d section of the act of 1791, is conclusive that she did not mean to convey her private rights. By that section the lots in Carrollsburgh and Hamburgh (small villages included within the lines of the city of Washington), which were the property of the state, were subjected to the same terms of trust as the other lots in the city. That is to say, one half thereof was to be re-conveyed to the state, and the other half to be sold for the use of the public.

The constitution of Maryland speaks of the land-office, and thereby continues all the rules and laws of that office. No lands could pass from the state but through the forms of the land-office.

Beatty's title relates back at least as far as the 16th of April, 1792. But the special warrant was prior to the act of 1791, and the proviso of that statute saves all the rights of individuals, so that if Beatty had a right to locate his warrant in the city before the date of the act, that act did not deprive him of that right. He had a contrary title then existing. But if he had not, the state had, and he claims as her assignee.

The statute did not mean to exclude the heirs and assigns of those who then had title from the benefit of the remedy provided.

2. As to the statute of limitations. Burnes received the money as trustee. When he received it he knew of Beatty's claim. (1 Saund, 37, 383; 4 Bac. Ab., 472.)

Pinkney, as amicus curiæ,

Stated that he had never heard of the relation of title being carried farther back than to the certificate of survey; even on a special warrant; for, although special, it may be located anywhere.

*March 1st. Absent—JOHNSON, J. [107 and LIVINGSTON, J.

Story, J., after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

It is contended by the plaintiffs in error that the direction of the Circuit Court was erroneous. 1. Because the plaintiff's intestate had a good and valid title to the land surveyed under his patent, and was, therefore, entitled, under the 5th section of the Maryland statute of 1791, to the money received by the defendant's intestate therefor. 2. That this right was not barred by the statute of limitations.

In support of the first point the plaintiffs contend that the land belonging to the state did not, by the cession of the territorial jurisdiction, under the statute of 1791, pass to the United States, and was consequently liable to be appropriated by individuals under warrants pursuant to the laws of Maryland. That until 1801 the jurisdiction of Maryland continued over the whole ceded territory; and titles, therefore, might legally be acquired therein according to the public laws; and the patent of Beatty, being obtained in pursuance of those laws, gave him a complete and valid title.

On the other hand the defendant denies each of these positions, and further contends, that the plaintiffs are without the purview of the 5th section of the act of 1791, because that section extends only to titles then existing, and Beatty's title did not commence until April, 1792.

It is not necessary to consider the correctness of the positions urged by the respective parties as to this point, because we are of opinion that the case may well be decided upon the second point.

The action for money had and received is clearly embraced by the statute of limitations; and it is incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show that the present case forms an exception to its operation.

It is contended that the present suit, being a statute remedy, is not within the purview of the statute of limitations. *But we know [108 of no difference in this particular between a common law and statute right. Each must be pursued according to the general rule of law, unless a different rule be prescribed by statute; and where the remedy is limited to a particular form of action, all the general incidents of that action must attach upon it. Upon any other construction it would follow that the case would be without any limitation at all; for it would be quite impossible, upon any acknowledged principles, when a right had assumed the shape of a claim in personam, to attach to it a limitation which exclusively applied to the reality. Now, the statute of limitations has been emphatically declared a statute of repose, and and we should not feel at liberty to break in upon its general construction by allowing an exception which has not acquired the complete sanction of authority.

It is further contended, that by the operation of the act of 1791, (ch. 45), Burnes must be considered as a mere trustee of Beatty, and trusts are not within the statute of limitations. We are of a different opinion. The land in controversy was claimed by Burnes in his own right, and adversely to the plaintiffs' intestate. The money was received by him for his own use and in his own right as an original proprietor. He never admitted or acknowledged the title of the plaintiff, and no claim or demand was ever made upon him in his life-time. So far, then, from being received in trust, it was expressly received under a peremptory denial of any trust or right in the opposite party. Nor was the statute meant to make the adverse possessor without title a trustee for the party having title. It only substituted the action of assumpsit for the ordinary legal remedy by ejectment; and the adverse possessor of the land could no more be deemed a trustee of the money than he could be deemed a trustee of the land itself, for the benefit of the rightful owner, against whom he held by an adverse title.

The court are therefore of opinion that the statute of limitations is a good bar, and, therefore, that the judgment must be affirmed.

THE UNITED STATES.

Absent—JOHNSON, J.

The penalty of the 50th sec. of the collection law of 2d March, 1799, which requires a permit for the landing of goods imported, applies to goods the importation of which was prohibited by law.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina.

The case was submitted without argument.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The principal question in this case is, whether goods and merchandise, the importation of which into the United States was prohibited by the act of 18th of April, 1806, (vol. 8, p. 80), were within the purview of the 50th section of the collection act of 2d of March, 1799, (vol. 4, p. 360), so that the unlading of them without a permit, &c., was an offense subjecting them to forfeiture.

It has been contended on behalf of the claimant that they were not within the purview of the 50th section, because that section applies only to goods, wares and merchandise, the importation of which is lawful. To this construction the court cannot yield assent. The language of the 50th section is, that "no goods, wares or merchandise, &c., shall be unladen, &c., without a permit;" it is therefore broad enough to cover all goods, whether lawful or unlawful. The case, being then within the letter, can be extracted from forfeiture only by showing that it is not within the spirit of the section. To us it seems clear that the case is within the policy and mischief of the collection act, since the necessity of a permit is some check upon unlawful importations, and is one reason why it is required. The act of 1806 does not profess to repeal the 50th section of the collection act as to the prohibited goods, and a repeal by implication ought not to be presumed unless from the repugnance of the provisions the inference be necessary and *nn- [110 avoidable. No such manifest repugnance appears to the court. The provisions may well stand together and, indeed, serve as mutual aids.

In fact the very point now presented was decided by this court in the case of Locke, claimant, v. The United States, at February term, 1813.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

ARMITZ BROWN

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

British property found in the United States, on land, at the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain, cannot be condemned as enemy's property, without a legislative act authorizing its confiscation. The act of the legislature, declaring war, is not such an act. Timber, floated into a salt water creek where the tide ebbs and flows, leaving the ends of the timber resting on the mud at low water, and prevented from floating away at high water by booms, is to be considered as landed.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, which condemned 550 tons of pine timber, claimed by Armitz Brown, the appellant.

D. Davis, for the appellant.

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, in which court the property, consisting of about 550 tons of pine timber, twelve thousand staves, and eighteen tons of lathwood, were condemned. The libel states, that this cargo was loaded on board the Emulous, at Savannah, April 9th, 1812; that the cargo belonged to British subjects; that the ship departed for Plymouth, in England, April 18th, in the same year, and put into New Bedford for repairs; and that the cargo was there unladen, and remained there until seized by Delano, as well on his own behalf as on behalf of the United States. As to some of the allegations in the libel, there is no evidence whatever to support them; the ship never departed for Plymouth, never put into New Bedford for repairs. The facts are these:

The property in question was the cargo of the American ship Emulous, and was seized as enemy's property, about the 5th of April, A. D. 1813, nearly a year after the same had been discharged from the ship. From the transcript in the case, it appears that the Emulous was owned by John Delano and others, citizens of the United States; that, in February, 1812, the owners, by their *agent, chartered the [111 ship to Elijah Brown, as agent for Christopher Ide, Brothers & Co., and James Brown, British merchants; that, by the charter-party the ship was to proceed from Charleston, S. C., where she then lay, to Savannah, and there take on board a cargo of lumber, at a certain freight stipulated in the charter-party, and proceed with the same to Plymouth, in England, to unload there, or at any other of His Britannic Majesty's dock-yards in England. The ship proceeded to Savannah, took on board the cargo mention ed in the libel, and was there stopped by the embargo of the 4th of April, 1812. On the 25th of the same month of April, it was agreed between the master of the ship and the agent of the shippers, that the ship should proceed to New Bedford, where she was owned, with the cargo, and remain there, without prejudice to the charter-party; which agreement is indorsed upon the back of the charter-party. The ship accordingly proceeded to New Bedford, and remained there until the latter part of May following, when the cargo was finally unladed and discharged from the ship. The staves and lathwood were landed and put on a wharf. The timber was put into a salt water creek, which is not navigable, but where the tide ebbs and flows, and where the timber remained for safe keeping until the time of the seizure. The timber was secured in this creek by booms extended across the entrance thereof, and fastened by stakes driven into the flats. On the 7th of November, 1812, the property was sold to the claimant by E. Brown, the agent, in pursuance of the authority which he had for that purpose as agent of the shippers, and in pursuance of the advice of Delano, who afterwards seized it in the manner and for the purposes stated in the libel. This sale, the appellant contends, was made bona fide for a valuable consideration, which has since been paid, and after notice thereof given to Delano, in whose possession the property then was. The seizure was not made until five months after the property had been sold to the present claimant, and nearly twelve months after it was discharged from the ship. The claimant, it is admitted, is a citizen of the United States. E. Brown, the agent, by whom the property was sold, is a citizen of the United States, and James Brown, one of the owners of the cargo, is also a citizen of the United States, but resides in London and carries on trade and commerce in that city.

112*] *Upon these facts, the principal point which will be contended for by the counsel for the claimants is, that this property was lawfully acquired, before the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain; and that, it being found here at the time of the breaking out of the war, under the faith of the government, it is not, by the modern law of nations, nor by any law of the United States, liable to confiscation.

This question ought not to be decided upon the rigorous principles, and the ancient practice of the law of nations; but according to the mitigated law of war, sanctioned by modern usage in civilized nations. For, when the government of the United States was organized and finally established, it was not only its true policy, but its duty, "to receive the law of nations in its modern state of purity and refinement." (Per Judge Wilson in the case of Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall., 281.) It is contended by the counsel for the claimant in this case, that the principle and the usage adopted and sanctioned by the modern law of nations is this, "that enemy's property found in this country at the breaking out of a war, is not liable to confiscation." A different practice, said to have prevailed in Great Britain with regard to property in this situation, found afloat in their ports and harbors, will be hereafter considered.

The rule of the law of nations applicable to this case, is found in Vattel, p. 477. His words are: "The sovereign declaring war can neither "detain the persons nor the property of those "subjects of the enemy who are within his do- "minions at the time of the declaration. They "came into his country under the public faith. "By permitting them to enter and reside in his "territories, he tacitly promised them full lib- "erty and security for their return. He is "therefore bound to allow them a reasonable "time for withdrawing with their effects; and "if they stay beyond the time prescribed, he "has a right to treat them as enemies, though as "enemies unarmed. But if they are detained "by an insurmountable impediment, as by sick- "ness, he must necessarily and for the same "reason grant them a sufficient extension of "the term." In order to show the humane and liberal spirit with which the above rule is adopted by sovereigns *in modern times, [113 the same author adds: "At present, so far from "being wanting in this duty, sovereigns carry "their attention to humanity still further; so "that foreigners who are subjects of the state "against which war is declared, are frequently "allowed full time for the settlement of their "affairs."

Are not these just and equitable rules of the modern law of nations of authority in the judicial courts of the United States? Upon what principle or policy are they to be rejected, and those of an age dark, and even barbarous in comparison with the present, adopted in their stead? Does it comport with the interest and character of this government to reject principles and usages calculated to ameliorate and mitigate the state of war and to promote the interest of commerce, which, it appears, have been cheerfully adopted by all the monarchies of Europe? The contract which was entered into by the agents of the parties in this case, was made upon the presumption that, in case of war, the property would be safe. This presumption arose from the uniform practice, in similar cases, in all countries upon which the law of nations is binding.

It has been suggested that this rule in Vattel is applicable only to such persons as may happen to be in the country at the time of the declaration of war. Such, indeed, is the letter of the rule. But when there is the same reason, there is the same law; and no good reason can be assigned why the property of an absent owner should not be protected, as well as that of those who may happen to be resident in the country declaring war. In addition to this, it may be observed, that the owners of this property were, in law, present during the whole negotiation relative to this cargo, by their agent, E. Brown, by whom it was purchased, and who had the whole care and charge of it at the time that war was declared.

If the correctness or authority of Vattel should be questioned, he will be found to be supported by other writers of high character.

In Chitty's law of Nations, p. 67, it is thus written: "In strict justice, the right of seizure 114*] "can take effect *only on those posses"sions of the belligerent, which have come to

"the hands of his adversary after the declara"tion of war." And again, in p. 80: "Such "appears to be, at present, the law and practice
"of civilized nations with respect to hostile
"property found within their dominions at the "breaking out of war." These opinions are not only fairly collected from modern writers upon the law of nations, but are entitled to particular respect as coming from a man of high character for his professional talents, and legal science; and who has done and written more to improve and reduce to system the common law of England than any other writer upon that subject for the last thirty years.

The principles and practice of the modern law of nations here advocated, will also be found conformable to the common law. In Magna Charta, that venerable foundation of English law and liberty, it is provided, that merchant strangers in the realm of England at the beginning of a war, shall be protected from harm in body and goods, until it shall be made known to the high authorities of the nation, how British merchants should be treated in the enemy's country, and they were to be dealt with according to such treatment. (Magna Charta, chap. 30.) These provisions are commented upon, and emphatically eulogized by Montesquieu, 2d vol., p. 12.

Of similar character were the provisions of an ancient English statute, passed 27 Edw. 3, Stat. 2, chap. 17, in which it is enacted, "that "in case of war, merchants shall not be sent
"suddenly out of the kingdom, but may go "out of the kingdom freely, with their goods,
"within forty days, and shall not be in any"thing hindered or disturbed in their passage,
"or to make profit of their merchandise if "they wish to sell them; or, if in default of "wind or ship, or any other adverse cause,
"they cannot go, they shall have other forty "days, within which time they shall pass with "their merchandise, or sell the same as before."

It is respectfully contended, that no act or measure of the American government has ever indicated a disposition adverse to those humane and liberal provisions and usages of the common law, and of the law of nations. On the contrary, so far as the disposition and policy of 115*] *the government may be discerned by implication, it has manifested its entire acquiescence in, and its readiness to adopt them upon all proper occasions. The spirit and disposition of the government upon this subject, is apparent from the provisions in (I believe it may be said) every treaty which has been entered into since the establishment of the government. Articles for the protection and removal of the property of enemies found in this country at the breaking out of a war, are found in our treaties with France, Spain, Holland, Sweden, Prussia, Morocco, England and Algiers. It will not be contended that the provisions of these treaties, especially that with England, can be binding, when the treaties themselves are not in force; but the uniform practice of those governments, in agreeing to these provisions, is evidence of the highest nature that the government of the United States have adopted, and mean to adhere to, the modern law of nations in this respect; that it approves the liberality of the modern usages, and rejects, and, I hope I may add, abhors the rigorous rules and contracted principles of the ancient jurists; that the spirit of the government, and the character of its policy, is to cherish and carry into practice every principle and every custom and usage which is found favorable to commerce, and which will mitigate the evils incident to a state of war.

In the proceedings and measures of the government since the war, there can be found no expression of its will, that property in the situation of this cargo, should be confiscated or claimed for the use of the government; on the contrary, there are indications of another and more benign complexion. By the act of July 6th, 1812, sect. 6, the President was authorized, within six months from the date of the act, "to give passports for the safe transpor"tation of any ship or property belonging to "British subjects, then within the limits of the "United States." Nothing, therefore, can be more clear than that it was not the wish or intention of government to claim or confiscate property belonging to the enemy, then in the United States. If such had been its policy, instead of the liberal provisions of this statute, provision would have been made in this statute, or in the act declaring war, not only expressive *of the public will upon this subject, [116

but expressly declaring British property then within the United States liable to confiscation.

By the provisions of this statute, it is apparent that if this property had been on board a British ship, or if a British ship had been found in which to transport it, it would have come directly within the authority of the President, as to its safe transportation. Surely, then, it could never have been the intention of Congress to have it confiscated upon the ground that it had been lawfully on board an American ship, in the regular course of trade, was there arrested by the embargo, and then, for the convenience of all parties, discharged from the ship, and placed in a proper situation for safe-keeping, to abide the events of the embargo and the war.

The court will also notice, that, previous to the expiration of the six months allowed by the act of Congress, above quoted, for the exportation of British property, this cargo had been sold with the knowledge and approbation of the libelant. This transfer, having been made bona fide, conferred other and new rights upon a third party, viz., the present claimant. The principle quoted and relied upon, that that transfer was void upon the ground that it was made by an alien enemy in time of war, was probably never contemplated or known by the parties to the contract; and this may furnish a satisfactory, though perhaps not strictly a legal reason, why this property was not exported under the President's passport. At any rate, if the court should be satisfied that this property is not liable to confiscation, either by the law of nations or by any act of Congress, they will not trouble themselves about the effect of the transfer, but leave the parties interested to settle that matter among themselves.

Before the court will condemn this property, they will search for some proof of a decided intention, on the part of the government, that such property should be confiscated. It appears that all the acts of Congress, so far as they can be interpreted with reference to this question, manifest a contrary spirit. The act 117*] declaring *war, speaks no language adverse to the claim of the appellant. The prize act of the 26th of June, 1812, does not even glance at property in this situation. Will the court assume the power, by implication, to condemn the property; and this, too, against the most explicit declarations of the public will, so far as they can be collected from measures of an analogous nature? Why is this case singled out? Why do not the district attorneys enter the warehouses in the numerous seaports, and hunt for booty of this description? Such a proceeding would be as legal and as liberal as the present, though probably attended with serious mischief to the country, if retaliatory proceedings and measures should be adopted by the enemy; for it is a well-known fact that the amount of American property in England at the commencement of the war was immensely greater than that of English property in America at the same period.

It was stated, in the argument below, that the question relative to the confiscation of debts, or choses in actions, is illustrative of that which relates to the confiscation of goods. The modern usage and law of nations, and of our own country, relative to the confiscation of debts, are equally favorable to the claimant in this case.

In the first place, it is distinctly denied that there exists any power to confiscate the private debts of the enemy, excepting by a positive act of Congress. What figure would the attorney of the United States make, with a libel in the judicial courts, praying for a confiscation of a private debt? The exclusive right of this kind of confiscation, and even of goods, is in the legislature—per Chase, Justice, in the case of Ware v. Hylton, (3 Dal. 281). The question which has been discussed by the writers upon the law of nations is, whether it be lawful for the sovereign thus to confiscate. And although it is admitted that he may do it, yet, "in re-"gard to the safety of commerce, all the sov-"ereigns of Europe have departed from this "rigor; and as this custom has been general-"ly received, he who would act contrary to "it would injure the public faith; for stran-"gers trusted his subjects upon the presump-"tion that the general custom would pre-118*] "vail." (Vattel, lib. 3, *ch. 5, sect. 77.) The laws and customs of the United States ought to be so expounded as to conform to the modern law of nations, which is adverse to the confiscating of debts. Indeed, the confiscation of debts has become disreputable; and it has been feelingly observed by a late learned judge of this court, that "not a "single confiscation of this kind stained the "code of any European power engaged in the "war which our revolution produced." (3 Dall., 281.)

It will be admitted that the question relative to the confiscation of debts, or choses in action, is illustrative of the question relative to the confiscation of the private property of an enemy, found here under the faith of government at the breaking out of the war. Indeed, the law and practice is, and ought to be, the same in both cases; and until a law of Congress shall be produced confiscating property of this description, the judicial courts will not only proceed to do it with great reluctance, but will never assume an authority of that kind unless furnished with it by a legislative act, any more than in the confiscation of a private debt. In addition to all this, it seems to be now perfectly settled by the modern law and practice of nations, that debts are never to be confiscated; that it has become a disgraceful act in any government that does it; that these debts are suspended, and the right to recover them necessarily taken away by the war; but that upon the return of peace, the debts are revived, and the right to recover them perfectly restored.

The condemnation of this property is demanded upon the ground that the embargo of the 4th of April, 1812, arrested and detained it until the act of Congress took place declaring war; and that that act had a retroactive effect, and justifies the condemnation of this property. But to this it is answered: The embargo of the 4th of April was not a hostile, but a civil embargo; and no such construction was ever given to an embargo, not of a hostile character. That this embargo was not of this character is most manifest from this, that express provision was made for the departure of any foreign ships or vessels, either in ballast or with the goods, wares and merchandise, on board of such foreign ship or vessel when notified of the act. It was, therefore, the *being laden on board a vessel [119 of the United States that prevented the departure of this property. If it had been on board a foreign, even a British, ship, it would not have been detained. That it was actually laden on board, at the time of the notice of the embargo, manifestly appears from the record. This, it is conceived, is a sufficient answer to the claim of the government to this property, upon the ground that it was stopped by the embargo, and liable to confiscation by the retroactive operation of the act of Congress declaring war. The authorities in support of the principles here contended for, respecting the difference between hostile and civil embargoes, must be familiar to the court, and need not be cited.

But the practice of the British government is relied upon as a rule by which the court are to be governed in the present case. It is admitted that the English courts of admiralty have condemned vessels detained in port by an embargo, and found there at the breaking out of hostilities; but it is explicitly denied that they have ever condemned property found on land, in that situation. (1 Rob., 228.)

If, however, the English courts of admiralty have done wrong, and proceeded against the modern law of nations in these cases, this honorable court will not, for that reason, adopt so unjust a practice. The condemnation of property, arrested in the ports of Great Britain by an embargo, to which a hostile character is afterwards given by a subsequent declaration of war, appears to be a departure from the modern usages of nations, and cannot be justified by or reconciled with the spirit of those usages. But as they have never condemned property in this situation, except such as has been found not only afloat, but in vessels detained in their ports by an embargo, their decisions can form no precedent in this case; for the property which is the subject of this prosecution was either on land, or in such a situation as that it could not be the subject upon which an embargo could operate; or, in other words, the staves and lathwood were literally on the land; and the pine timber so discharged from the ship and so deposited as to be entitled to the same protection as if actually landed and stored.

120*] *The rule adopted in the English Court of Admiralty, as laid down in 2 Rob., 211, is this: "All vessels detained in port, and found there at the breaking out of hostilities, are condemned, jure coronæ, to the king; and all coming in after hostilities, not voluntarily by revolt, but ignorant of the war, are condemned as droits of admiralty. This rule, both in its import and application, has been adopted, it is conceived, only in cases of vessels and their cargoes found in the ports of Great Britain. There can be no reason for their application in this country to property found on the land, or to property, although waterborne yet, in the same situation, in reason and in fact, as if found literally on land.

Of this description is the property in question. By referring to the record, particularly the depositions of E. Brown and of Silas Allen, the condition of this property, from the time it was discharged from the ship to the time it was seized by Delano, may be learned, from whence it will appear that the allegation in the libel, that the property was on the high seas, is wholly without foundation. The staves and lathwood were landed on a wharf. With respect to these, there can be no doubt. The timber was discharged from the ship in the month of May, previous to the declaration of war; it is of such description that it did not admit of being stored; it would have been injured by lying on the land; and the only place proper to keep it in was the one selected, a creek, or small cove, where the tide ebbs and flows, but which was not navigable even for boats or scows; for it seems it was necessary to clear it out to admit a scow into it. Moreover, it was necessary to secure the entrance of this creek by booms or timber laid across its mouth, fastened by piles or stakes driven into the flats. This timber was thus secured and stored in the usual way in which property of this description is managed; and was, to all intents and purposes, as much lodged and impounded in this place, under a bailment, and in civil hands (1 Rob., p. 228), as if it had been in a ship-yard. It must, therefore, be a great stretch of power, and prerogative, to extend the reason of the practice of Great Britain in condemning property found in its harbors and on board vessels, to property in the situation of that in question; and unless the practice of Great Britain has extended to the 121*] seizure *and condemnation of enemies' property found on land at the time of breaking out of hostilities, no sanction can be derived from her practice in favor of the confiscation of this property.

The case was submitted by the Attorney-General upon the argument contained in the opinion of the Honorable Judge Story, in the Circuit Court, which came up in the transcript of the record.

Wednesday, March 2d. Present—All the Judges.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The material facts in this case are these:

The Emulous, owned by John Delano and others, citizens of the United States, was chartered to a company carrying on trade in Great Britain, one of whom was an American citizen, for the purpose of carrying a cargo from Savannah to Plymouth. After the cargo was put on board, the vessel was stopped in port by the embargo of the 4th of April, 1812. On the 25th of the same month it was agreed between the master of the ship and the agent of the shippers, that she should proceed with her cargo to New Bedford, where her owners resided, and remain there without prejudice to the charter-party. In pursuance of this agreement, the Emulous proceeded to New Bedford, where she continued until after the declaration of war. In October or November the ship was unloaded and the cargo, except the pine timber, was landed. The pine timber was floated up a salt water creek, where, at low tide, the ends of the timber rested on the mud, where it was secured from floating out with the tide by impediments fastened in the entrance of the creek. On the 7th of November, 1812, the cargo was sold by the agent of the owners, who is an American citizen, to the claimant, who is also an American citizen. On the 19th of April, a libel was filed by the attorney for the United States, in the District Court of Massachusetts, against the said cargo, as well on behalf of the United States of America as for and in behalf of John Delano and of all other persons concerned. It does not appear that this seizure was [

122 made under any instructions from the President of the United States; nor is there any evidence of its having his sanction, unless the libels being filed and prosecuted by the law officer who represents the government, must imply that sanction.

On the contrary, it is admitted that the seizure was made by an individual, and the libel filed at his instance by the District Attorney, who acted from his own impressions of what appertained to his duty. The property was claimed by Armitz Brown under the purchase made in the preceding November.

The District Court dismissed the libel. The Circuit Court reversed this sentence, and condemned the pine timber as enemy property forfeited to the United States. From the sentence of the Circuit Court the claimant appealed to this court.

The material question made at bar is this: Can the pine timber, even admitting the property not to be changed by the sale in November, be condemned as prize of war?

The cargo of the Emulous having been legally acquired and put on board the vessel, having been detained by an embargo not intended to act on foreign property, the vessel having sailed before the war, from Savannah, under a stipulation to re-land the cargo in some port of the United states, the re-landing having been made with respect to the residue of the cargo, and the pine timber having been floated into shallow water, where it was secured and in the custody of the owner of the ship, an American citizen, the court cannot perceive any solid distinction, so far as respects confiscation, between this property and other British property found on land at the commencement of hostilities. It will therefore be considered as a question relating to such property generally, and to be governed by the same rule.

Respecting the power of government no doubt is entertained. That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever 123] found, is conceded. The mitigations *of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself. That remains undiminished, and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation, the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that will shall be expressed, no power of condemnation can exist in the court.

The questions to be decided by the court are:

1st. May enemy's property, found on land at the commencement of hostilities, be seized and condemned as a necessary consequence of the declaration of war?

2d. Is there any legislative act which authorizes such seizure and condemnation?

Since, in this country, from the structure of our government, proceedings to condemn the property of an enemy found within our territory at the declaration of war can be sustained only upon the principle that they are instituted in execution of some existing law, we are led to ask,

Is the declaration of war such a law? Does that declaration, by its own operation, so vest the property of the enemy in the government as to support proceedings for its seizure and confiscation, or does it vest only a right, the assertion of which depends on the will of the sovereign power?

The universal practice of forbearing to seize and confiscate debts and credits, the principle universally received, that the right to them revives on the restoration of peace, would seem to prove that war is not an absolute confiscation of this property, but simply confers the right of confiscation.

Between debts contracted under the faith of laws, and property acquired in the course of trade, on the faith of the same laws, reason draws no distinction; and, although, in practice vessels with their cargoes, found in port at the declaration of war, may have been seized, it is not believed that modern usage would sanction the seizure of the goods of an enemy 124] on land, which *were acquired in peace in the course of trade. Such a proceeding is rare, and would be deemed a harsh exercise of the rights of war. But although the practice in this respect may not be uniform, that circumstance does not essentially affect the question. The inquiry is, whether such property vests in the sovereign by the mere declaration of war, or remains subject to a right of confiscation, the exercise of which depends on the national will; and the rule which applies to one case, so far as respects the operation of a declaration of war on the thing itself, must apply to all others over which war gives an equal right. The right of the sovereign to confiscate debts being precisely the same with the right to confiscate other property found in the country, the operation of a declaration of war on debts and on other property found within the country must be the same. What, then, is this operation?

Even Bynkershoek, who maintains the broad principle, that in war everything done against an enemy is lawful; that he may be destroyed, though unarmed and defenseless; that fraud, or even poison, may be employed against him; that a most unlimited right is acquired to his person and property; admits that war does not transfer to the sovereign a debt due to his enemy; and, therefore, if payment of such debt be not exacted, peace revives the former right of the creditor; "because," he says, "the occupation which is had by war consists more "in fact than in law." He adds to the observations on this subject, "let it not, however, "be supposed that it is only true of actions, that "they are not condemned ipso jure, for other "things also belonging to the enemy may be "concealed and escape condemnation."

Vattel says, that "the sovereign can neither "detain the persons nor the property of those "subjects of the enemy who are within his dominions at the time of the declaration."

It is true that this rule is, in terms, applied by Vattel to the property of those only who are personally within the territory at the commencement of hostilities; but it applies equally to things in action and to things in possession; and if war did, of itself, without any further exercise of the sovereign will, vest the property of the *enemy in the sovereign, his pres- [125 ence could not exempt it from this operation of war. Nor can a reason be perceived for maintaining that the public faith is more entirely pledged for the security of property trusted in the territory of the nation in time of peace, if it be accompanied by its owner, than if it be confided to the care of others.

Chitty, after stating the general right of seizure, says: "But, in strict justice, that right "can take effect only on those possessions of a "belligerent which have come to the hands "of his adversary after the declaration of hostilities."

The modern rule, then, would seem to be, that tangible property belonging to an enemy and found in the country at the commencement of war, ought not to be immediately confiscated; and in almost every commercial treaty an article is inserted stipulating for the right to withdraw such property.

This rule appears to be totally incompatible with the idea that war does of itself vest the property in the belligerent government. It may be considered as the opinion of all who have written on the jus belli, that war gives the right to confiscate, but does not itself confiscate the property of the enemy; and their rules go to the exercise of this right.

The constitution of the United States was framed at a time when this rule, introduced by commerce in favor of moderation and humanity, was received throughout the civilized world. In expounding that constitution, a construction ought not lightly to be admitted which would give to a declaration of war an effect in this country it does not possess elsewhere, and which would fetter that exercise of entire discretion respecting enemy property, which may enable the government to apply to the enemy the rule that he applies to us.

If we look to the constitution itself, we find this general reasoning much strengthened by the words of that instrument.

That the declaration of war has only the effect 126] of *placing the two nations in a state of hostility, of producing a state of war, of giving those rights which war confers; but not of operating, by its own force, any of those results, such as a transfer of property, which are usually produced by ulterior measures of government, is fairly deducible from the enumeration of powers which accompanies that of declaring war. "Congress shall have power" "to declare war, grant letters of marque and "reprisal, and make rules concerning captures "on land and water."

It would be restraining this clause within narrower limits than the words themselves import to say that the power to make rules concerning captures on land and water is to be confined to captures which are exterritorial. If it extends to rules respecting enemy property found within the territory, then we perceive an express grant to Congress of the power in question as an independent substantive power, not included in that of declaring war.

The acts of Congress furnish many instances of an opinion that the declaration of war does not, of itself, authorize proceedings against the persons or property of the enemy found, at the time, within the territory.

War gives an equal right over persons and property; and if its declaration is not considered as prescribing a law respecting the person of an enemy found in our country, neither does it prescribe a law for his property. The act concerning alien enemies, which confers on the President very great discretionary powers respecting their persons, affords a strong implication that he did not possess those powers by virtue of the declaration of war.

The "act for the safe keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war" is of the same character.

The act prohibiting trade with the enemy contains this clause:

"And be it further enacted, That the Presi- "dent of the United States be, and he is here- "by authorized to give, at any time within six 127] "months after the passage *of this act, "passports for the safe transportation of any "ship or other property belonging to British "subjects, and which is now within the limits "of the United States."

The phraseology of this law shows that the property of a British subject was not considered by the legislature as being vested in the United States by the declaration of war; and the authority which the act confers on the President is manifestly considered as one which he did not previously possess.

The proposition that a declaration of war does not, in itself, enact a confiscation of the property of the enemy within the territory of the belligerent, is believed to be entirely free from doubt. Is there in the act of Congress, by which war is declared against Great Britain, any expression which would indicate such an intention?

That act, after placing the two nations in a state of war, authorizes the President of the United States to use the whole land and naval force of the United States to carry the war into effect, and "to issue to private armed vessels "of the United States, commissions or letters "of marque and general reprisal against the "vessels, goods and effects of the government "of the united kingdom of Great Britain and "Ireland, and the subjects thereof."

That reprisals may be made on enemy property found within the United States at the declaration of war, if such be the will of the nation, has been admitted; but it is not admitted that, in the declaration of war, the nation has expressed its will to that effect.

It cannot be necessary to employ argument in showing that when the attorney for the United States institutes proceedings at law for the confiscation of enemy property found on land, or floating in one of our creeks, in the care and custody of one of our citizens, he is not acting under the authority of letters of marque and reprisal, still less under the authority of such letters issued to a private armed vessel.

*The "act concerning letters of [128 marque, prizes and prize goods," certainly contains nothing to authorize this seizure.

There being no other act of Congress which bears upon the subject, it is considered as proved that the legislature has not confiscated enemy property which was within the United States at the declaration of war, and that this sentence of condemnation cannot be sustained.

One view, however, has been taken of this subject, which deserves to be further considered.

It is urged that, in executing the laws of war, the executive may seize and the courts condemn all property which, according to the modern law of nations, is subject to confiscation, although it might require an act of the legislature to justify the condemnation of that property which, according to modern usage, ought not to be confiscated.

This argument must assume for its basis the position that modern usage constitutes a rule which acts directly upon the thing itself by its own force, and not through the sovereign power. This position is not allowed. This usage is a guide which the sovereign follows or abandons at his will. The rule, like other precepts of morality, of humanity, and even of wisdom, is addressed to the judgment of the sovereign; and although it cannot be disregarded by him without obloquy, yet it may be disregarded.

The rule is, in its nature, flexible. It is subject to infinite modification. It is not an immutable rule of law, but depends on political considerations which may continually vary.

Commercial nations, in the situation of the United States, have always a considerable quantity of property in the possession of their neighbors. When war breaks out, the question, what shall be done with enemy property in our country is a question rather of policy than of law. The rule which we apply to the property of our enemy will be applied by him to the property of *our citizens. Like all [129 other questions of policy, it is proper for the consideration of a department which can modify it at will; not for the consideration of a department which can pursue only the law as it is written. It is proper for the consideration of the legislature, not of the executive or judiciary.

It appears to the court, that the power of confiscating enemy property is in the legislature, and that the legislature has not yet declared its will to confiscate property which was within our territory at the declaration of war.

The court is therefore of opinion that there is error in the sentence of condemnation pronounced in the Circuit Court in this case, and doth direct that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the sentence of the District Court be affirmed.

STORY, J.

In this case, I have the misfortune to differ in opinion from my brethren; and as the grounds of the decree were fully stated in an opinion delivered in the court below, I shall make no apology for reading it in this place.

"This is a prize allegation filed by the District Attorney, in behalf of the United States, and of John Delano, against 550 tons of pine timber, part of the cargo of the American ship Emulous, which was seized as enemies' property, about the 5th day of April, 1813, after the same had been discharged from said ship, and while afloat in a creek or dock at New Bedford, where the tide ebbs and flows.

From the evidence in this case, it appears that the ship Emulous is owned by the said John Delano, John Johnson, Levi Jenny, and Joshua Delano, of New Bedford, and citizens of the United States. On the 3d day of February, 1812, the owners, by their agents, entered into a charter-party with Elijah Brown as agent of Messrs. Christopher Idle, Brother & Co. and James Brown, of London, merchants, for said ship, to proceed from the port of Charleston, South Carolina (where the ship then lay), to Savannah, in Georgia, and there take on board a cargo of timber and staves, at 130] a certain *freight stipulated in the charter-party, and proceed with the same to Plymouth, in England, "for orders to unload there or at any other of His Majesty's dock-yards in England." The ship accordingly proceeded to Savannah, took on board the agreed cargo, and was there stopped by the embargo laid by Congress on the 4th of April, 1812. On the 25th of the same April, it was agreed between Mr. E. Brown and the master of the ship, that she should proceed with the cargo to, and lay at New Bedford, without prejudice to the charter-party. The ship accordingly proceeded for New Bedford, and arrived there in the latter part of May, 1812, where, it seems, the cargo was finally—but the particular time is not stated—unloaded by the owners of the ship, the staves put into a warehouse, and the timber into a salt water creek or dock, where it has ever since remained, water-borne, under the custody of said John Delano, by whom the subsequent seizure was made, for his own benefit and the benefit of the United States. On the 7th November, 1812, Mr. Elijah Brown, as agent for the British owners (one of whom, James Brown, is his brother), sold the whole cargo to the present claimant, Mr. Armitz Brown (who it should seem is also his brother) for 2,433 dollars and 67 cents, payable in nine months, for which the claimant gave his note accordingly. The master of the ship, Capt. Allen, swears that, at the time of entering into the charter-party, Mr. Elijah Brown stated to him that the British owners had contracted with the British government to furnish a large quantity of timber to be delivered in some of His Majesty's dock-yards.

Besides the claim of Mr. Brown, there is a claim interposed by the owners of the ship Emulous, praying for an allowance to them of their expenses and charges in the premises.

A preliminary exception has been taken to the libel for a supposed incongruity in blending the rights of the United States and of the informer in the manner of a qui tam action at the common law.

I do not think this exception is entitled to much consideration. It is, at most, but an irregularity which cannot affect the nature of the proceedings, or oust the jurisdiction of this court. If the informer cannot legally take any *interest, the United States have still a [131 right, if their title is otherwise well founded, to claim a condemnation. Nor would a proceeding of this nature be deemed a fatal irregularity in courts having jurisdiction of seizures, whose proceedings are governed by much more rigid rules than those of the admiralty. It is a principle clearly settled at the common law, that any person might seize unaccustomed goods to the use of himself and the king, and thereupon inform of the seizure; and if, in the exchequer, the informer be not entitled to any part, the whole shall, on such information, be adjudged to the king. For this doctrine we have the authority of Lord Hale. (Harg. Law Tracts, 227.) And the solemn judgment of the court, in Roe v. Roe (Hardr., 185); and Malden v. Bartlett (Parker, 105). The same rule most undoubtedly exists in the prize court, and, as I apprehend, applies with greater latitude. All property captured belongs originally to the crown; and individuals can acquire a title thereto in no other manner than by grant from the crown. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173; 11 East, 619; The Maria Francoise, 6 Rob., 282.) This, however, does not preclude the right to seize; on the contrary, it is an indisputable principle in the English prize courts, that a subject may seize hostile property for the use of the crown, wherever it is found; and it rests in the discretion of the crown whether it will or will not ratify and consummate the seizure by proceeding to condemnation. But to the prize court it is a matter of pure indifference whether the seizure proceeded originally from the crown or has been adopted by it; and whether the crown would take jure coronæ, by its transcendent prerogative, or jure admiralitatis, as a flower annexed by its grant to the office of Lord High Admiral. The cases of captures by non-commissioned vessels, by commanders on foreign stations, anterior to war, by private individuals in port or on the coasts, and by naval commanders on shore on unauthorized expeditions, are all very strong illustrations of the principle. (The Aquila, 1 Rob., 37; The Twee Gesuster, 2 Rob., 284, note; The Rebeckah, 1 Rob., 227; The Gertruyda, 2 Rob., 211; The Melomane, 5 Rob., 41; The Charlotte, 4 Rob., 282; The Richmond, 5 Rob., 325; Thorshaven, 1 Edw., 102; Hale in Harg. Law Tracts, ch. 28, p. 245.) And in cases where private captors seek condemnation to themselves, it is the settled course of the court, on failure of their title, to decree con-

132*] demnation *to the crown or the admiralty, as the circumstances require. (The Walsingham Packet, 2 Rob., 77; The Etrusco, 4 Rob., 262, note; and the cases cited supra.) Nor can I consider these principles of the British courts a departure from the law of nations. The authority of Puffendorf and Vattel are introduced to show that private subjects are not at liberty to seize the property of enemies without the commission of the sovereign, and if they do they are considered as pirates. But when attentively considered, it strikes me that, taking the full scope of these authors, they will not be found to support so broad a position. (Puff. B. 8, ch. 6, § 21; Vattel, B. 3, ch. 15, § 223, 224, 225, 226, 227.) Vattel himself admits (§ 234) that the declaration of war, which enjoins the subjects at large to attack the enemy's subjects, implies a general order; and that to commit hostilities on our enemy without an order from our sovereign after the war, is not a violation so much of the law of nations as of the public law applicable to the sovereignty of our own nation (§ 225). And he explicitly states (§ 226) that, by the law of nations, when once two nations are engaged in war, all the subjects of the one may commit hostilities against those of the other, and do them all the mischief authorized by the state of war. All that he contends for is, that though, by the declaration, all the subjects in general are ordered to attack the enemy, yet that by custom this is usually restrained to persons acting under commission; and that the general order does not invite the subjects to undertake any offensive expedition without a commission or particular order (§ 227); and that if they do, they are not usually treated by the enemy in a manner as favorable as other prisoners of war (§ 226). And Vattel (§ 227) explicitly declares, that the declaration of war "authorizes, indeed, and even obliges every subject, of whatever rank, to secure the persons and things belonging to the enemy, when they fall into his hands." And he then goes on to state cases in which the authority of the sovereign may be presumed (§ 228). The whole doctrine of Vattel, fairly considered, amounts to no more than this, that the subject is not required, by the mere declaration of war, to originate predatory expeditions against the enemy; that he is not authorized to wage war contrary to the will of his own sovereign; and that, though the ordinary declaration of war imports a general authority to attack the enemy and his 133] *property, yet custom has so far restrained its meaning that it is in general confined to persons acting under the particular or constructive commission of the sovereign. If, therefore, the subject do undertake a predatory expedition, it is an infringement of the public law of his own country, whose sovereignty he thus invades, but it is not a violation of the law of nations of which the enemy has a right to complain. But if the property of the enemy fall into the hands of a subject, he is bound to secure it.

For every purpose applicable to the present case, it does not seem necessary to controvert these positions; and, whatever may be the correctness of the others, I am perfectly satisfied that the position is well founded, that no subject can legally commit hostilities, or capture property of an enemy, when, either expressly or constructively, the sovereign has prohibited it. But suppose he does, I would ask if the sovereign may not ratify his proceedings; and thus, by a retroactive operation, give validity to them? Of this there seems to me no legal doubt. The subject seizes at his peril, and the sovereign decides, in the last resort, whether he will approve or disapprove of the act. (Thorshaven, 1 Edw., 102.) The authority of Puffendorf is still less in favor of the position of the claimant's counsel. In the section cited (book 8, ch. 6, sec. 21), Puffendorf considers the question to whom property captured in war belongs; a question also examined by Vattel in the 229th section of the book and chapter above referred to. In the course of that discussion, Puffendorf observes, "that it may be very justly questioned, whether everything taken in war, by private hostilities, and by the bravery of private subjects that have no commission to warrant them, belongeth to them that take it. For this is also a part of the war, to appoint what persons are to act in a hostile manner against the enemy, and how far; and, in consequence, no private person hath power to make devastations in an enemy's country or to carry off spoil or plunder without permission from his sovereign; and the sovereign is to decide how far private men, when they are permitted, are to use that liberty of plunder; and whether they are to be the sole proprietors in the booty or only to share a part of it; so that all a private adventurer in war can pretend to, is no more than *what[134 his sovereign will please to allow him; for to be a soldier and to act offensively, a man must be commissioned by public authority."

As to the point upon which Puffendorf here expresses his doubts, I suppose that no person, at this day, entertains any doubts. It is now clear, as I have already stated, that all captures in war enure to the sovereign, and can become private property only by his grant. But is there anything in Puffendorf to authorize the doctrine that the subject so seizing property of the enemy is guilty of a very enormous crime—of the odious crime of piracy? And is there, in this language, anything to show that the sovereign may not adopt the acts of his subjects, in such a case, and give them the effect of full and perfect ratification? It has not been pretended, that I recollect, that Grotius supports the position contended for. To me it seems pretty clear that his opinions lean rather the other way, viz., to support the indiscriminate right of captors to all property captured by them. (Grotius, lib. 3, ch. 6, sec. 2, sec. 10, sec., 12.) Bynkershoek has not discussed the question in direct terms. In one place (Bynk. Pub. Juris, ch. 3,) he says, that he is not guilty of any crime, by the laws of war, who invades a hostile shore in hopes of getting booty. It is true that, in another place (Id., ch. 20,) he admits, in conformity to his doctrine elsewhere (Id., ch. 17), that if an uncommissioned cruiser should sail for the purpose of making hostile captures, she might be dealt with as a pirate, if she made any captures except in self-defense. But this he expressly grounds upon the municipal edicts of his own country in relation to captures made by its own subjects. And he says, every declaration of war not only permits but expressly orders all subjects to injure the enemy by every possible means; not only to avert the danger of capture, but to capture and strip the enemy of all his property. And, looking to the general scope of his observations (Id., ch. 3, 4, and ch. 16 and 17); I think it may, not unfairly, be argued that, independent of particular edicts, the subjects of hostile nations might lawfully seize each other's property wherever found; at least, he states nothing from which it can be inferred that the sovereign might not avail himself of property captured from the enemy by uncommissioned 135] subjects. On *the whole, I hold that the true doctrine of the law of nations, found in foreign jurists, is, that private citizens cannot acquire to themselves a title to hostile property unless it is seized under the commission of their sovereign; and that, if they depredate upon the enemy, they act upon their peril, and may be liable to punishment, unless their acts are adopted by their sovereign. That, in modern times, the mere declaration of war is not supposed to clothe the citizens with authority to capture hostile property, but that they may lawfully seize hostile property in their own defense, and are bound to secure, for the use of the sovereign, all hostile property which falls into their hands. If the principles of British prize law go further, I am free to say that I consider them as the law of this country.

I have been led into this discussion of the doctrine of foreign jurists, farther than I originally intended; because the practice of this court in prize proceedings must, as I have already intimated, be governed by the rules of admiralty law disclosed in English reports, in preference to the mere dicta of elementary writers. I thought it my duty, however, to notice these authorities, because they seem generally relied on by the claimant's counsel. In my judgment, the libel is well and properly brought; at least for all the purposes of justice between the parties before the court; and I overrule the exception taken to its sufficiency.

Having disposed of this objection, I come now to consider the objection made by the United States against the sufficiency of the claim of Mr. Brown; and I am entirely satisfied that his claim must be rejected. It is a well-known rule of the prize court, that the onus probandi lies on the claimant; he must make out a good and sufficient title before he can call upon the captors to show any ground for the capture. (The Walsingham packet, 2 Rob., 77.) If, therefore, the claimant make no title, or trace it only by illegal transactions, his claim must be rejected, and the court left to dispose of the cause, as the other parties may establish their rights. In the present case, Mr. Brown claims a title by virtue of a contract and sale made by alien enemies since the war. I say by alien enemies; for it is of no importance what the character of the agent is; the 136] transaction *must have the same legal construction as though made by the aliens themselves. Now, admitting that this sale was not colorable, but bona fide, which, however, I am not, at present, disposed to believe, still it was a contract made with enemies, pending a known war, and therefore invalid. No principle of national or municipal law is better settled than that all contracts with an enemy, made during war, are utterly void. This principle has grown hoary under the reverend respect of centuries; (19 Edw., 4, 6, cited Theol. Dig. lib. 1, ch. 6, sec. 21; Ex parte Bonsmaker, 13 Ves., Jun., 71; Briston v. Towers, 6 T. R., 45,) and cannot now be shaken without uprooting the very foundations of national law. (Bynk. Quæst. Pub. Juris, ch. 3.)

I therefore altogether reject the claim interposed by Mr. Brown. What, then, is to be done with the property? It is contended, on the part of the United States, that it ought to be condemned to the United States, with a recompense, in the nature of salvage, to be awarded to Mr. Delano. On the part of the claimant's counsel (who, under the circumstances, must be considered as arguing as amicus curiæ to inform the conscience of the court) it is contended, 1st. That this court, as a court of prize, has no proper jurisdiction over the cause. 2d. That if it have jurisdiction, it cannot award condemnation to the United States, for several reasons. 1st. Because, by the law of nations, as now understood no government can lawfully confiscate the debts, credits, or visible property of alien enemies, which have been contracted or come into the country during peace. 2d. Because, if the law of nations does not, the common law does afford such immunity from confiscation to property situated like the present. 3d. Because, if the right to confiscate exist, it can be exercised only by a positive act of Congress, who have not yet legislated to this extent. 4th. Because, if the last position be not fully accurate, yet, at all events, this process, being a high prerogative power, ought not to be exercised, except by express instructions from the President, which are not shown in this case.

Some of these questions are of vast importance and most extensive operation; and I am exceedingly obliged to the gentlemen who have argued them with so *much ability and [137 learning, for the light which they have thrown upon a path so intricate and obscure. I have given these questions as much consideration as the state of my health and the brevity of time would allow; and I shall now give them a distinct and separate discussion, that I may at least disclose the sources of my errors, if any, and enable those who unite higher powers of discernment with more extensive knowledge, to give a more exact and just opinion.

And first. As to the jurisdiction of this court in matters of prize.

This depends partly on the prize act of 26th June, 1812, ch. 107, § 6, and partly on the true extent and meaning of the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction conferred on the courts of the United States. The act of 26th June, 1812, ch. 107, provides that in all cases of captured vessels, goods and effects which shall be brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, the District Court shall have exclusive original cognizance thereof, as in civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The act of 18th June, 1812, ch. 102, declaring war, authorizes the President to issue letters of marque and reprisal to private armed ships against the vessels, goods and effects of the British government and its subjects; and to use the whole land and naval force of the United States to carry the war into effect. In neither of these acts is there any limitation as to the places where captures may be made on the land or on the seas; and, of course, it would seem that the right of the courts to adjudicate respecting captures would be co-extensive with such captures, wherever made, unless the jurisdiction conferred is manifestly confined by the former act to captures made by private armed vessels. It is not, however, necessary closely to sift this point, as it may now be considered as settled law, that the courts of the United States, under the judicial act of 30th September, 1789, ch. 20, have, by the delegation of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, at least as full jurisdiction of all causes of prize as the admiralty in England. (Glass et al. v. the sloop Betsey et. al. 3 Dall., 6; Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall., 133; Penhallow et al. v. Doane's administrators, 3 Dall., 54; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 2.) Over what captures, 138] *theu, has the admiralty jurisdiction as a prize court? This is a question of considerable intricacy, and has not as yet, to my knowledge, been fully settled. It has been doubted whether the admiralty has an inherent jurisdiction of prize, or obtains it by virtue of the commission usually issued on the breaking out of war. That the exercise of the jurisdiction is of very high antiquity and beyond the time of memory, seems to be incontestible. It is found recognized in various articles of the black book of the admiralty, in public treaties and proclamations of a very early date, and in the most venerable relics of ancient jurisprudeuce. (See Rob. Coll. Marit. Intro. p. 6, 7; Id. Instructions, 3 H. 8, p. 10, art. 18, &c.; Id. p. 12, note letter; Edw. 3, A. D., 1343; Treaty Henry 7 and Charles 8, A. D., 1497; Rob. Coll. Marit. p. 83 and p. 98, art. 8; Rob. Coll. Mar. p. 189, note; Roughton, art. 19, 20, &c., &c., passim.) In Lindo v. Rodney (Doug. 613, note), Lord Mansfield, in discussing the subject, admits the immemorial antiquity of the prize jurisdiction of the admiralty; but leaves it uncertain whether it was coeval with the instance jurisdiction, and whether it is constituted by special commission, or ouly called into exercise thereby. After the doubts of so eminent a judge, it would not become me to express a decided opinion. But taking the fact that, in the earliest times, the jurisdiction is found in the possession of the admiralty, independent of any known special commission; that, in other countries, and especially in France, upon whose ancient prize ordinances the administration of prize law seems, in a great measure, to have been modeled (Vide Ordin. of France, A. D. 1400, Rob. Coll. Marit. p. 75; Ordin. of France, A. D. 1584; Id. p. 105; Treaty Henry 7 and Charles 8; Id, p. 83, and Rob. note, Id. 105), the jurisdictiou has uniformly belonged to the admiralty; there seems very strong reason to presume that it always constituted an ordinary and not an extraordinary branch of the admiralty powers; and so I apprehend it was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Glass et al. v. the Betsey (3 Dall. 6).

However this question may be, as to the right of the admiralty to take cognizance of mere captures made on the land, exclusively by land forces, as to which I give no opinion, it is very 139] clear that its jurisdiction is not *confined to mere captures at sea. The prize jurisdiction does not depend upon locality, but upon the subject matter. The words of the prize commission contain authority to proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes and reprisals of all ships and goods that are and shall be taken. The admiralty, therefore, not only takes cognizance of all captures made at sea, in creeks, havens and rivers, but also of all captures made on land, where the same have been made by a naval force, or by cooperation with a naval force. This exercise of jurisdiction is settled by the most solemn adjudications. (Key and Hubbard v. Pearse, cited iu Le Caux v. Eden, Doug., 606; Lindo v. Rodney, Doug., 613, note; the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, 2 Rob., 274; the Stella del Norte, 5 Rob., 349; the island of Trinidad, 5 Rob., 92; Thorshaven, 1 Edw., 102; the capture of Chrinsurah, 1 Deten., 179; the Rebeckah 1 Rob., 227; the Gertruyda, 2 Rob., 211; the Maria Francoise, 6 Rob., 282.)

Such, then, being the acknowledged extent of the prize jurisdiction of the admiralty, it is, at least in as ample an extent, conferred on the courts of the United States. For the determination, therefore, of the case before the court, it is not necessary to claim a more ample jurisdiction; for the capture or seizure, though made in port, was made while the property was water-borne. Had it been landed and remained on land, it would have deserved consideration whether it could have been proceeded against as prize, under the admiralty jurisdiction, or whether, if liable to seizure and condemnation in our courts, the remedy ought not to have been pursued by a process applicable to municipal confiscations. On these points I give no opinion. (See the case of the Oester Eems cited in the Two Friends, 1 Rob., 284, note; Hale de Portubus Maris, &c. in Harg. Law Tracts, ch. 28, p. 245, &c.; Parker Rep., 267.)

Having disposed of the question as to the jurisdiction of this court, I come to one of a more general nature; viz.: Whether, by the modern law of nations, the sovereign has a right to confiscate the debts due to his enemy, or the goods of his enemy found within his territory at the commencement of the war. I might spare myself the consideration of the question as to debts; but, as it *has [140 been ably argued, I will submit some views respecting it, because they will illustrate and confirm the doctrine applicable to goods. It seems conceded, and indeed is quite too clear for argument, that, in former times, the right to confiscate debts was admitted as a doctrine of national law. It had the countenance of the civil law. (Dig. lib. 41, tit. 1; Id. lib. 49, tit. 15); of Grotius, (De jure belli et pacis, lib. 3, ch. 2, § 2, ch. 6, § 2, ch. 7, § 3 and 4, ch. 13, § 1, 2); of Puffendorf, (De jure Nat. et Nat., lib. 8, ch. 6, § 23); and lastly of Bynkershoek, (Quæst. Pub. Juris, lib. 1, ch. 7), who is himself of the highest authority, and pronounces his opinion in the most explicit manner. Down to the year 1737, it may be considered as the opiniou of jurists that the right was unquestionable. It is, then, incumbent on those who assume a different doctrine, to prove that, since that period, it has by the general consent of nations, become incorporated into the code of public law. I take upon me to say that no jurist of reputation can be found who has denied the right of confiscation of enemies debts. Vattel has been supposed to be the most favorable to the new doctrine. He certainly does not deny the right to confiscate; and if he may be thought to hesitate in admitting it, nothing more can be gathered from it than that he considers that, in the present times, a relaxation of the rigor of the law has been in practice among the sovereigns of Europe. (Vattel, lib. 3, ch. 5, § 77.) Surely a relaxation of the law in practice cannot be admitted to constitute an abolition in prineiple, when the principle is asserted, as late as 1737, by Bynkershoek, and the relaxation shown by Vattel in 1775. In another place, however, Vattel, speaking on the subject of reprisals, admits the right to seize the property of the nation or its subjects by way of reprisal, and, if war ensues, to confiscate the property so seized. The only exception he makes is of property which has been deposited in the hands of the nation, and intrusted to the public faith; as is the case of property in the public funds. (Vattel, lib. 2, ch. 18, § 342, 343, 344.) The very exception evinces pretty strongly the opinion of Vattel as to the general rule. Of the character of Vattel as a jurist, I shall not undertake to express an opinion. That he has great merit is conceded; though a learned civilian, Sir James MacIntosh, informs us that he has fallen into great mistakes in important "praetical discussions of public law." 141*] *(Discourse on the law of nations, p. 32, note.) But if he is singly to be opposed to the weight of Grotius and Puffendorf, and, above all, Bynkershoek, it will be difficult for him to sustain so unequal a contest. I have been pressed with the opinion of a very distinguished writer of our own country on this subject. (Camillus, No. 18 to 23, on the British treaty of 1794.) I admit, in the fullest manner, the great merit of the argument which he has adduced against the confiscation of private debts due to enemy subjects. Looking to the measure not as of strict right, but as of sound policy and national honor, I have no hesitation to say that the argument is unanswerable. He proves incontrovertibly what the highest interest of nations dictates with a view to permanent policy; but I have not been able to perceive the proofs by which he overthrows the ancient principle. In respect to the opinion of Grotius, quoted by him in No. 20, as indicating a doubt by Grotius of his own principles, I cannot help thinking that the learned writer has himself fallen into a mistake. Grotius, in the place referred to (lib. 3, ch. 20, § 16), is not adverting to the right of confiscation, but merely to the general results of a treaty of peace. He says (§ 15), that, after a peace, no action lies for damages done in the war; but (§ 16), that debts due before the war are not, by the mere operations of the war, released, but remain suspended during the war, and the right to recover them revives at the peace. It is impossible to doubt the meaning of Grotius, when the preceding and succeeding sections are taken in connection. Grotius, therefore, is not inconsistent with himself, nor is "Bynkershoek more inconsistent;" for the latter explicitly avows the same doctrine, but considers it inapplicable to debts confiscated during the war; for these are completely extinguished. (Bynk. Quæst. Pub. Juris, ch. 7.)

It is supposed by the same learned writer, that the principle of confiscating debts had been abandoned for more than a century. That the practice was intermitted, is certainly no very clear proof of an abandonment of the principle. Motives of policy and the general interests of commerce may combine to induce a nation not to enforce its strict rights, but it ought not therefore to be construed to release them. It may, however, be well doubted if the practice is quite so uniform as it is supposed. *The case [142 of the Silesia loan, which exercised the highest talents of the English nation, is an instance to the contrary, almost within half a century (in 1752). In the very elaborate discussions of national law to which that case gave birth, there is not the slightest intimation that the law of nations prohibited a sovereign from confiscating debts due to his enemies, even where the debts were due from the nation; though there is a very able statement of its injustice in that particular case; and the English memorial admits that when sovereigns or states borrow money from foreigners, it is very commonly expressed in the contract that it should not be seized as reprisals, or in case of war. Now, it strikes me that this very circumstance shows in a strong light the general opinion as to the ordinary right of confiscation. The stipulations of particular treaties of the United States have been cited, in corroboration of their general doctrine, by the claimant's counsel. These treaties certainly show the opinion of the government as to the impolicy of enforcing the right of confiscation against debts and actions. (See treaty with Great Britain, 1794, art. 10; with France, 1778, art. 20; with Holland, 8th October, 1782, art. 18; with Prussia, 11th July, 1799, art. 23; with Morocco, 1787, art. 24.) But I cannot admit them to be evidence for the purpose for which they have been introduced. It may be argued with quite as much if not greater force, that these stipulations imply an acknowledgement of the general right of confiscation, and provide for a liberal relaxation between the parties. I hold, with Bynkershoek (Quæst. Pub. Jur., ch. 7), that where such treaties exist, they must be observed; where there are none, the general right prevails. It has been further supposed that the common law of England is against the right of confiscating debts; and the declaration of Magna Charta, ch. 30, has been cited to show the liberal views of the British constitution. This declaration, so far as is necessary to the present purpose, is as follows: "If they" (i. e., foreign merchants), "be of a land making war against us, and be found in our realm at the beginning of the war, they shall be attached without harm of body or goods (rerum) until it be known unto us, or our chief justice, how our merchants be entreated, then in the land making war against us, and if our merchants be well entreated there, theirs shall be likewise with us." I *quote the trans- [143 lation of Lord Coke (2 Just., 27). This would certainly seem to be a very liberal provision; and if its true construction applied to all property and persons, as well transiently in the country as domiciled and fixed there, it would certainly be entitled to all the encomiums which it has received. (Montesq. Spirit of Laws, lib. 20, ch. 14.) How far it is now considered as binding, in relation to vessels and goods found within the realm at the commencement of the war, I shall hereafter consider. It will be observed, however, that this article of Magna Charta does not protect the debts or property of foreigners who are without the realm; it is confined to foreigners within the realm upon the public faith on the breaking out of the war. Now, it seems to be the established rule of the common law, that all choses in action, belonging to an enemy, are forfeitable to the crown; and that the crown is at liberty, at any time during the war, to institute a process, and thereby appropriate them to itself. This was the doctrine of the year books, and stands confirmed by the solemn decision of the exchequer, in the Attorney-General v. Weeden (Parker Rep., 267; Maynard's Edw., 2, cited Ibid). It is a prerogative of the crown which, I admit, has been very rarely enforced (see Lord Alvanley's observations in Furtado v. Rodgers, 3 Bos. and Pul., 191); but its existence cannot admit of a legal doubt. On a review of authorities, I am entirely satisfied that, by the rigor of the law of nations and of the common law, the sovereign of a nation may lawfully confiscate the debts of his enemy, during war, or by way of reprisal; and I will add, that I think this opinion fully confirmed by the judgment of the Supreme Court in Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall., 199), where the doctrine was explicitly asserted by some of the judges, reluctantly admitted by others, and denied by none.

In respect to the goods of an enemy found within the dominions of a belligerent power, the right of confiscation is most amply admitted by Grotius, and Puffendorf, and Bynkershoek, and Burlamaqui, and Rutherforth and Vattel. (See Grotius, and Puffendorf, and Bynkershoek ubi supra; and Bynk. Qu. Pub. Jur., c. 4 and 6; 2 Burlam., p. 209, sec. 12, p. 219, sec. 2, p. 221, sec. 11; Ruth. lib. 2, c. 9, p. 558 to 573.) Such, also, is the rule of the common law. (Hale in Harg. law tracts, p. 245, c. 18.) Vattel 144] has indeed contended (and *in this he is followed by Azuni, part 2, ch. 4, art. 2, sec. 7), that the sovereign declaring war can neither detain the persons nor the property of those subjects of the enemy who are within his dominions at the time of the declaration, because they came into the country upon the public faith. This exception (which, in terms, is confined to the property of persons who are within the country), seems highly reasonable in itself, and is an extension of the rule in Magna Charta. But, even limited as it is, it does not seem followed in practice; and Bynkershoek is an authority the other way. (Bynk. Quæst. Pub. Jur., c. 2, 3, 7.) In England, the provision in Magna Charta seems, in practice, to have been confined to foreign merchants domiciled there; and not extended to others who came to ports of the realm for occasional trade. Indeed, from the language of some authorities, it would seem that the clause was inserted, not so much to benefit foreign merchants as to provide a remedy for their own subjects, in cases of hostile injuries in foreign countries. (See the opinion of Ch. J. Lee in Key v. Pearse, cited Doug., 606, 607.) However this may be, it is very certain that Great Britain has uniformly seized, as prize, all vessels and cargoes of her enemies found afloat in her ports at the commencement of war. Nay, she has proceeded yet farther, and, in contemplation of hostilities, laid embargoes on foreign vessels and cargoes, that she might, at all events, secure the prey. It cannot be necessary for me to quote authorities on this point. In the articles respecting the droits of admiralty in 1665, there is a very formal recognition of the rights of the crown to all vessels and cargoes seized before hostilities. (The Rebeckah, 1 Rob., 227, and Id., 230, note [a.]) This exercise of hostile right, of the summum jus, is so far, indeed, from being obsolete, that it is in constant operation, and, in the present hostilities, has been applied to the property of the citizens of the United States. Of a similar character is the detention of American seamen found in her service at the commencement of the war, as prisoners of war; a practice which violates the spirit, though not the letter, of Magna Charta; and, certainly, can, in equity and good faith, find few advocates. Of the right of Great Britain thus to seize vessels and cargoes found in her ports on the breaking out of war, I do not find any denial in authorities which are *entitled to much weight; and I, there- [145 fore, consider the rule of the law of nations to be, that every such exercise of authority is lawful, and rests in the sound discretion of the sovereign of the nation.

The next question is, whether Congress (for with them rests the sovereignty of the nation as to the right of making war, and declaring its limits and effects) have authorized the seizure of enemies' property afloat in our ports. The act of 18th June, 1812, ch. 102, is in very general terms, declaring war against Great Britain, and authorizing the President to employ the public forces to carry it into effect. Independent of such express authority, I think that, as the executive of the nation, he must, as an incident of the office, have a right to employ all the usual and customary means acknowledged in war, to carry it into effect. And there being no limitation in the act, it seems to follow that the executive may authorize the capture of all enemies' property, wherever, by the law of nations, it may be lawfully seized. In cases where no grant is made by Congress, all such captures, made under the authority of the executive, must enure to the use of the government. That the executive is not restrained from authorizing captures on land, is clear from the provisions of the act. He may employ and actually has employed the land forces for that purpose; and no one has doubted the legality of the conduct. That captures may be made, within our own ports, by commissioned ships, seems a natural result of the language—of the generality of expression in relation to the authority to grant letters of marque and reprisal to private armed vessels, which the act does not confine to captures on the high seas, and is supported by the known usage of Great Britain in similar cases. It would be strange, indeed, if the executive could not authorize or ratify a capture in our own ports, unless by granting a commission to a public or private ship. I am not bold enough to interpose a limitation where Congress have not chosen to make one; and I hold, that, by the act declaring war, the executive may authorize all captures which, by the modern law of nations, are permitted and approved. It will be at once perceived, that in this doctrine I do not mean to include the right to confiscate debts due to enemy subjects. This, though a strictly *national right, is so [146 justly deemed odious in modern times, and is so generally discountenanced that nothing but an express act of Congress would satisfy my mind that it ought to be included among the fair objects of warfare; more especially as our own government have declared it unjust and impolitic. But if Congress should enact such a law, however much I might regret it, I am not aware that foreign nations, with whom we have no treaty to the contrary, could, on the footing of the rigid law of nations, complain, though they might deem it a violation of the modern policy.

On the whole, I am satisfied that Congress have authorized a seizure and condemnation of enemy property found in our ports under the circumstances of the present case. And the executive may lawfully authorize proceedings to enforce the confiscation of the same property before the proper tribunals of the United States. The District Attorney is, for this purpose, the proper agent of the executive and of the United States. From the character and duties of his station, he is bound to guard the rights of the United States, and to secure their interests. Whenever he chooses to institute proceedings on behalf of the United States, it is presumed by courts of law that he has the sanction of the proper authorities; and that presumption will avail, until the executive or the legislature disavow the proceedings, and sanction a restoration of the property.

I have taken up more time than I originally intended, in discussing the various subjects submitted in the argument. An apology will be found in their extraordinary importance. If I shall have successfully shown that the principles of prize law, as admitted in England and in the United States, have the sanction of the principles of public law and public jurists, I shall not regret the labor that has been employed, although, in this particular case, I may pronounce an erroneous sentence.

I reverse the decree of the District Court, and condemn the 550 tons of timber to the United States; subject, however, to the right of the owners of the Emulous to a re-imbursement of their actual charges and expenses for the custody of the property, which I shall reserve for further consideration; and I shall order the 147] said *property to be sold, and the proceeds brought into court to abide the further order of the court.

Such is the opinion which I had the honor to pronounce in the Circuit Court; and upon the most mature reflection, I adhere to it. The argument in this court, urged on behalf of the claimant, has put in controversy the same points which were urged before me. But as the opinion of this court admits many of the principles for which I contended, I shall confine my additional remarks to such as have been overruled by my brethren.

It seems to have been taken for granted in the argument of counsel that the opinion held in the Circuit Court proceeded, in some degree, upon a supposition that a declaration of war operates per se an actual confiscation of enemy's property found within our territory. To me this is a perfectly novel doctrine. It was not argued, on either side, in the Circuit Court, and certainly never received the slightest countenance from the court. I disclaim, therefore, any intention to support a doctrine which I always supposed to be wholly untenable. I go yet further, and admit that a declaration of war does not, of itself, import a confiscation of enemies' property within or without the country, on the land or on the high seas. The title or the enemy is not by war devested, but remains in proprio vigore, until a hostile seizure and possession has impaired his title. All that I contend for is, that a declaration of war gives a right to confiscate enemies' property, and enables the power to whom the execution of the laws and the prosecution of the war are confided, to enforce that right. If, indeed, there be a limit imposed as to the extent to which hostilities may be carried by the executive, I admit that the executive cannot lawfully transcend that limit; but if no such limit exist, the war may be carried on according to the principles of the modern law of nations, and enforced when and where, and on what property the executive chooses.

In no act whatsoever, that I recollect, have Congress declared the confiscation of enemies' property. They have authorized the President to grant letters of marque and general reprisal, which he may revoke and annul *at his [148 pleasure; and even as to captures actually made under such commissions, no absolute title by confiscation vests in the captors, until a sentence of condemnation. If, therefore, British property had come into our ports since the war, and the President had declined to issue letters of marque and reprisal, there is no act of Congress which, in terms, declares it confiscated and subjects it to condemnation. If, nevertheless, it be confiscable, the right of confiscation results not from the express provision of any statute, but from the very state of war which subjects the hostile property to the disposal of the government. But until the title should be devested by some overt act of the government and some judicial sentence, the property would unquestionably remain in the British owners, and if a peace should intervene, it would be completely beyond the reach of subsequent condemnation.

There is, then, no distinction recognized by any act of Congress between enemies' property which was within our ports at the commencement of war, and enemies' property found elsewhere. Neither are declared ipso facto confiscated; and each, as I contend, are merely confiscable.

I will now consider what, in point of law, is the operation of the acts of Congress made in relation to the present war.

The act of 18th June, 1812, ch. 102, declares war to exist between Great Britain and the United States, and authorizes the President of the United States to use the land and naval force of the United States to carry the same into effect; and further authorizes him to issue letters of marque, &c., to private armed vessels, against the vessels, goods and effects of the government of Great Britain and the subjects thereof.

The prize act of 26th June, 1812, ch. 107, confers the power on the President to issue instructions to private armed vessels, for the regulation of their conduct. The act of 6th July, 1812, ch. 128, authorizes the President to make regulations, &c., for the support and exchange of prisoners of war. The act of 6th July, 1812, ch. 129, respecting trade with the 149] enemy, authorizes the President *to grant passports for the property of British subjects within the limits of the United States during the space of six months, and protects certain British packets, &c., with dispatches, from capture. The act of 3d March, 1813, ch. 203, vests in the President the power of retaliation for any violation of the rules and usages of civilized warfare by Great Britain.

These are all the acts which confer powers, or make provisions touching the management of the war. In no one of them is there the slightest limitation upon the executive powers growing out of a state of war; and they exist, therefore, in their full and perfect vigor. By the constitution, the executive is charged with the faithful execution of the laws; and the language of the act declaring war authorizes him to carry it into effect. In what manner, and to what extent, shall he carry it into effect? What are the legitimate objects of the warfare which he is to wage? There is no act of the legislature defining the powers, objects or mode of warfare. By what rule, then, must he be governed? I think the only rational answer is by the law of nations as applied to a state of war. Whatever act is legitimate, whatever act is approved by the law, or hostilities among civilized nations, such he may, in his discretion, adopt and exercise; for with him the sovereignty of the nation rests as to the execution of the laws. If any of such acts are disapproved by the legislature, it is in their power to narrow and limit the extent to which the rights of war shall be exercised; but until such limit is assigned, the executive must have all the right of modern warfare vested in him, to be exercised in his sound discretion, or he can have none. Upon what principle, I would ask, can he have an implied authority to adopt one and not another? The best manner of annoying, injuring and pressing the enemy, must, from the nature of things, vary under different circumstances; and the executive is responsible to the nation for the faithful discharge of his duty, under all the changes of hostilities.

But it is said that a declaration of war does not, of itself, import a right to confiscate enemies' property found within the country at the commencement of war. I cannot admit this position in the extent in which it is laid down. 150] *Nothing, in my judgment, is more clear from authority than the right to seize hostile property afloat in our ports at the commencement of war. It is the settled practice of nations, and the modern rule of Great Britain herself, applied (as appears from the affidavits in this very cause) to American property in the present war; applied, also, to property not merely on board of ships, but to spars floating alongside of them. I forbear, however, to press this point, because my opinion in the court below contains a full discussion of it.

It is also said that a declaration of war does not carry with it the right to confiscate property found in our country at the commencement of war, because the constitution itself, in giving Congress the power "to declare war, "grant letters of marque and reprisal, and "make rules concerning captures on land and "water," has clearly evinced that the power to declare war did not, ex vi terminorum, include a right to capture property everywhere, and that the power to make rules concerning captures on land and water, may well be considered as a substantive power as to captures of property within our own territory. In my judgment, if this argument prove anything, it proves too much. If the power to make rules respecting captures, &c., be a substantive power, it is equally applicable to all captures, wherever made, on land or on water. The terms of the grant import no limitation as to place; and I am not aware how we can place around them a narrower limit than the terms import. Upon the same construction, the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal is a substantive power; and a declaration of war could not, of itself, authorize any seizure whatsoever of hostile property, unless this power was called into exercise. I cannot, therefore, yield assent to this argument. The power to declare war, in my opinion, includes all the powers incident to war, and necessary to carry it into effect. If the constitution had been silent as to letters of marque and captures, it would not have narrowed the authority of Congress. The authority to grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to regulate captures, are ordinary and necessary incidents to the power of declaring war. It would be utterly ineffectual without them. The expression, therefore, of that which is implied in the very nature of the grant, cannot weaken the *force of the grant itself. [151 The words are merely explanatory, and introduced ex abundanti cautela. It might be as well contended that the power "to provide and maintain a navy" did not include the power to regulate and govern it, because there is in the constitution an express provision to this effect. And yet I suppose that no person would doubt that Congress, indepeudent of such express provision, would have the power to regulate and govern the navy; and if they should authorize the executive "to provide and maintain a navy," it seems to me as clear that he must have the incidental power to make rules for its government. In truth, it is by no means unfrequent in the constitution to add clauses of a special nature to general powers which embrace them, and to provide affirmatively for certain powers, without meaning thereby to negative the existence of powers of a more general nature. The power to provide "for the common defense and general welfare," could hardly be doubted to include the power "to borrow money;" the power "to coin money," to include the power "to regulate the value thereof;" and the power "to raise and support armies," to include the power "to make rules for the government and regulation" thereof. On the other hand, the affirmative power "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas," has never been supposed to negative the right to punish other offenses on the high seas; and Congress have actually legislated to a more enlarged extent. I cannot, therefore, persuade myself that the argument against the doctrine for which I contend, is at all affected by any provision in the constitution.

The opinion of my brethren seems to admit that the effect of hostilities is to confer all the rights which war confers; and it seems tacitly to concede, that, by virtue of the declaration of war, the executive would have a right to seize enemies' property which should actually come within our territory during the war. Certainly no such power is given directly by any statute. And if the argument be correct, that the power to make captures on land or water must be expressly called into exercise by Congress, before the executive can, even after war, enforce a capture and condemnation, it will be very difficult to support the concession. Suppose a British 152*] *ship of war or merchant ship should now come within our ports, there is no statute declaring such ship actually confiscated. There is no express authority either for the navy or army to make a capture of her; and although the executive might authorize a private armed ship so to do, yet it would depend altogether on the will of the owners of the ship, whether they would so do or not. Can it be possible that the executive has not the power to authorize such seizure? And if he may authorize a seizure by the army or navy, why not by private individuals if they will volunteer for the purpose?

The act declaring war has authorized the executive to employ the land and naval force of the United States, to carry it into effect. When and where shall he carry it into effect? Congress have not declared that any captures shall be made on land; and if this be a substantive power, not included in a declaration of war, how can the executive make captures on land, when Congress have not expressed their will to this effect? The power to employ the army and navy might well be exercised in preventing invasion, and in the common defense, without necessarily including a right to capture, if the right to capture be not an incident of war; and upon what ground, then, can the executive plan and execute foreign expeditions or foreign captures? Upon what ground he can authorize a Canadian campaign, or seize a hostile fort or territory, and occupy it by right of capture and conquest I am utterly at a loss to perceive, unless it be that the power to carry the war into effect gives every incidental power which the law of nations authorizes and approves in a state of war. I am at a loss to perceive how the power exists, to seize and capture enemy's property which was without our territory at the commencement of the war, and not the power to seize that which was within our territory at the same period. Neither are expressly given nor denied (except as to private armed ships), and how can either be assumed except as an incident of war, acknowledged upon national and public principles? It may be suggested that the executive, "as commander-in-chief of the army and navy," has the power to make foreign conquests. But this is utterly inadmissible, if the right to authorize captures resides 153*] as a substantive power in *Congress, and does not follow as an incident of a declaration of war; and certainly the rights of the "commander-in-chief" must be restrained to such acts as are allowed by the laws. Besides, the same difficulty meets us here as in the former case; if his powers, as commander-in-chief, authorize him to make captures without the territory, why not within the territory?

The acts respecting alien enemies and prisoners of war, have been supposed, even in a state of actual war, to confer new powers on the executive. I cannot accede to the inference in the extent to which it is claimed. In general, these acts may be deemed mere regulations of war, limiting and directing the discretion of the executive; and it cannot be doubted that Congress had a perfect right to prescribe such regulations. To regulate the exercise of the rights of war as to enemies, does not, however, imply that such rights have not an independent existence. Besides, it is clear that the act respecting alien enemies applies only to aliens resident within the country; and not to the property of aliens, who are not so resident. I might answer, in the same manner, the argument drawn from the act of 6th July, 1812, ch. 129, § 4, and the act of 3d of March, 1813, ch. 203. But even admitting that these acts did confer some new powers, still, as these powers do not respect the present case, I cannot consider them as affording even a legislative implication against the existence of the powers for which I contend.

It has been supposed that my opinion assumes for its basis the position that modern usage constitutes a rule which acts directly on the thing itself by its own force, and not through the sovereign power. Certainly I do not admit this supposition to be correct. My argument proceeds upon the ground that when the legislative authority, to whom the right to declare war is confided, has declared war in its most unlimited manner, the executive authority, to whom the execution of the war is confided, is bound to carry it into effect. He has a discretion vested in him, as to the manner and extent; but he cannot lawfully transcend the rules of warfare established among civilized nations. He cannot lawfully exercise powers or authorize proceedings which the civilized world repudiates and disclaims. The sovereignty, as to declaring war and limiting its [ effects, rests with the legislature. The sovereignty, as to its execution, rests with the President. If the legislature do not limit the nature of the war, all the regulations and rights of general war attach upon it. I do not, therefore, contend that modern usage of nations constitutes a rule acting on enemies' property, so as to produce confiscation of itself, and not through the sovereign power; on the contrary, I consider enemies' property in no case whatsoever confiscated by the mere declaration of war; it is only liable to be confiscated at the discretion of the sovereign power having the conduct and execution of the war. The modern usage of nations is resorted to merely as a limitation of this discretion, not as conferring the authority to exercise it. The sovereignty to execute it is supposed already to exist in the President, by the very terms of the constitution; and I would again ask, if this general power to confiscate enemies' property does not exist in the executive, to be exercised in his discretion, how is it possible that he can have authority to seize and confiscate any enemies' property coming into the country since the war, or found in the enemies' territory? Yet I understood the opinion of my brethren to proceed upon the tacit acknowledgement that the executive may seize and confiscate such property under the circumstances which I have stated.

On the whole, I am still of opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court was correct and ought to be affirmed.

It is due, however, to myself to state, that, at the trial in the Circuit Court, it was agreed that the timber had always been afloat ou tide waters; and the affidavit by which it is proved to have rested on land at low tide, was not taken uutil after the hearing and decision of the cause.

In the opinion which I have expressed I am authorized to state that I have the concurreuce of one of my brethren.

155*] *THE RAPID, PERRY, MASTER.

After a declaration of war, an American citizen cannot lawfully send a vessel to the enemy's country to bring away his property.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court, for the District of Massachusetts.

The material facts in the case were these:

Jabez Harrison, a native American citizen, the claimant aud appellaut in this case, had purchased a quantity of English goods in England, before the declaration of war by the United States against that country, and deposited them on a small island belonging to the English, called Indian island, and situated near the line between Nova Scotia and the United States. Upon the breakiug out of the war, Harrison's agents in Boston hired the Rapid, a vessel licensed and enrolled for the cod-fishery, to proceed to the place of deposit and bring away the goods. The Rapid accordingly sailed from Boston on the 3d of July, 1812, with Harrisou, the claimant, on board, proceeded to Eastport, where Harrison was left, and from there, agreeably to Harrison's orders, to Indian island, where the cargo in question was taken on board. Ou the 8th of July, while ou her return, she was captured by the Jefferson privateer, on the high seas, and brought into Salem. The goods, being libeled as prize, and claimed by Harrison as his property, were condemned, iu the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, to the captors, on the ground that by "trading with the enemy," they had acquired the character of enemies' property.

A claim was also interposed by the United States, on the grouud of a violation, by the Rapid, of the non-intercourse act. This claim was also rejected. From the decree of the Circuit Court the United States and Harrison appealed.

Harper, for Harrison.

The ground of condemuation, iu the Circuit Court, of the goods in question, was, that trading with the enemy made them enemies' property. But we contend that, in this case, there 156] was no trading with the enemy. *Trading is a commercial contract or a series of coutracts of sale. Coutract is of the essence of trading. But no commercial transactiou of this kind took place betweeu Harrison and the enemy. The contract, in the present case, was made, the goods were purchased aud paid for before the declaration of war; consequently when the British were friends. Here was merely a case of removal by Harrison of his own property from the enemies' country to this, it was the simple exercise of an act of ownership, and an act which surely does not invest the property with a hostile character.

Every citizen has a right, on the breaking out of a war, to withdraw his property, purchased before the war, from the enemy's country aud remove it to his own; and it is certainly the interest of the community to permit such removal.

The cargo, therefore, being American property, neither the declaration of war nor the commissiou of the privateer authorized the capture.

But this case does not rest on general principles alone. In the case of Hallet v. Jenks (3 Cranch, 210), the actual purchase of a cargo in a French port was decided by this court to be no violation of the non-intercourse act of 13th June, 1798, a case much stronger than the present. Congress, also, has given a very different construction to transactions of this kind by the act of 27th February, 1813 (laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 388), remitting the forfeitures which had accrued uuder the non-intercourse act of March 1st, 1809. (Laws U. S., vol. 9, p. 243.)

The claim of the United States will uot, at this time, be interposed.[1]

Pitman, contra, contended,

1. That it appeariug, on the face of Harrison's claim, that the property iu question was put on board the Rapid in violation of the laws of the United States, he can have *uo [157 standing in court for the purpose of claiming the same.

In support of this point he cited the following cases: 2 Rob., 72, 77, The Walsingham Packet; 5 Rob., 28, 32, The Cornelis and Maria; 6 Rob., 348, The Recovery.

2. That all intercourse with the enemy being illegal, the vessel and cargo iu question are subjected to confiscation as prize. Pinkney, on the same side.

By the constitution of the United States, Congress has power to declare war. War, in the present case, had been declared. After knowledge of the declaration of war, the claimant fitted out a vessel to go to the enemies' country to bring away his property. The voyage was accordingly prosecuted, and the property brought away. By this intercourse with the enemy the vessel and cargo are to be considered as having adhered to the enemy, and as being, pro hac vice, hostile.

1.—This claim was subsequently, during the same term, revived, and an argument had thereupon. The decision of the court will be found in the opinion delivered March 15th, in the case of the Sally.

With regard to the general principle, that trade with an enemy is illegal, there can be no doubt: the principle is recognized by the common law and by the maritime codes of all the European nations. By these laws all intercourse with an enemy, not sanctioned by the sovereign power, is prohibited. This principle is founded on the strongest reasons. Without 158] this salutary * provision, what a wide door would be opened for every species of treasonable intercourse. The English authorities are almost omnipotent on this subject. (Vid. 8, T. R., 554, Potts v. Bell; Sir J. Nicholl's argument, and the cases there cited.) Many of these authorities are judicial decisions in cases which occurred before the revolution. The principle contended for was therefore brought over, before that time, by the English emigrants to this country, and is consequently to be considered of equal force here as in England.

The doctrine, then, may be considered as established.

The voyage, in this case, was undertaken by Harrison with full knowledge of the war—against his double duty—in violation both of the non-importation act and of the rights of war.

But the appellants have attempted to take a distinction between a purchase made before the declaration of war and a purchase made since; and they contend that, as the purchase, in the present case, was made previous to the declaration of war, the property is not liable to confiscation, no trading having been carried on with the enemy. But all the cases on this subject condemn such a distinction. Any commercial intercourse with the enemy is trading, within the meaning of the term as used in prize law; and that, for the very obvious reason before assigned, viz., that if commercial intercourse of any kind were permitted, it would facilitate the means of carrying on a traitorous correspondence.

The case of Hallet v. Jenks (3 Cranch, 210), cited by the appellants, was a case of clear compulsion. The transaction in the present case was perfectly voluntary.

Harper, in reply.

No case has been cited by the claimant's counsel in which there was not a trading with the enemy. Here, we contend, there was none In the case of Escott, cited in the case of The Hoop (1 Rob., 182), the goods were the product of a trade long carried on, and shipped under fictitious names. Here they were shipped openly. No circumstances of suspicion at-159] tended the transaction. *In some of the cases cited, part of the goods were purchased after the declaration of war. All the cases cited are either new acts of trade, or a continuation of trade in the regular course of employment of the parties, and are also attended with circumstances of suspicion.

The mere act of going into the enemies' country is not illegal. Any man may go thither at any time, if the enemy will permit him. He violates no law of his own country by so doing. Those laws prohibit commercial intercourse only; and that, not because it gives an opportunity of affording information to the enemy and opens a door for the commission of traitorous practices, but because such prohibition is rendered necessary by the modern mode of warfare which is intended to affect the enemy through his commerce. The principle and object of the rule, therefore, are not applicable to this case. The rule is confined to commercial transactions and commercial objects. If facility of treasonable intercourse were the reason on which the prohibition is founded, it would operate to prevent our citizens from going to the frontiers, or even towards them—an operation which was surely never intended to be given it. The question to be considered in every case of this nature is this: Has the privilege of going to the enemies' country been applied to improper purposes?

Monday, March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This capture was made on the high seas, about a month after the declaration of war. The claimant, Harrison, had purchased a quantity of English goods in England, "a long time," to use his own language, before the declaration of war, and deposited them on a small island, called Indian island, near to the line between Nova Scotia and these states. Upon the breaking out of the war, his agents in Boston hired the Rapid, a licensed vessel in the cod-fishery, to proceed to the place of deposit and bring away these goods. On her return she was captured by the Jefferson privateer, and was condemned for trading with the enemy's country.

*On the argument, it was contended, [160 in behalf of the appellant, that this was not a trading within the meaning of the cases cited to support the condemnation; that, on the breaking out of a war, every citizen had a right, and it was the interest of the community to permit her citizens, to withdraw property lying in an enemy's country and purchased before the war; finally, that neither the declaration of war nor the commission of the privateer authorized the capture of this vessel and cargo, as they were, in fact, American property.

It is understood that the claim of the United States for the forfeiture is not now interposed. The court, therefore, enters upon this consideration unembarrassed by a claim which would otherwise ride over every question now before us.

This is the first case, since its organization, in which this court has been called upon to assert the rights of war against the property of a citizen. It is with extreme hesitation, and under a deep sense of the delicacy of the duty which we are called upon to discharge, that we proceed to adjudge the forfeiture of private right, upon principles of public law highly penal in their nature, and unfortunately too little understood.

But a new state of things has occurred—a new character has been assumed by this nation, which involves it in new relations, and confers on it new rights; which imposes a new class of obligations on our citizens, and subjects them to new penalties.

The nature and consequences of a state of war must direct us to the conclusions which we are to form on this case.

On this point there is really no difference of opinion among jurists; there can be none among those who will distinguish between what it is in itself, and what it ought to be under the influence of a benign morality and the modern practice of civilized nations.

In the state of war, nation is known to nation only by their armed exterior; each threatening the other with conquest or annihilation. The 161] individuals who compose *the belligerent states, exist, as to each other, in a state of utter occlusion. If they meet, it is only in combat.

War strips man of his social nature; it demands of him the suppression of those sympathies which claim man for a brother; and accustoms the ear of humanity to hear with indifference, perhaps exultation, "that thousands have been slain."

These are not the gloomy reveries of the bookman. From the earliest time of which historians have written or poets imagined, the victor conquered but to slay, and slew but to triumph over the body of the vanquished. Even when philosophy had done all that philosophy could do to soften the nature of man, war continued the gladiatorian combat; the vanquished bled wherever caprice pronounced her fiat. To the benign influence of the Christian religion it remained to shed a few faint rays upon the gloom of war; a feeble light but barely sufficient to disclose its horrors. Hence, many rules have been introduced into modern warfare at which humanity must rejoice, but which owe their existence altogether to mutual concession, and constitute so many voluntary relinquishments of the rights of war. To understand what it is in itself, and what it is under the influence of modern practice, we have but too many opportunities of comparing the habits of savage with those of civilized warfare.

On the subject which particularly affects this case, there has been no general relaxation. The universal sense of nations has acknowledged the demoralizing effects that would result from the admission of individual intercourse. The whole nation are embarked in one common bottom, and must be reconciled to submit to one common fate. Every individual of the one nation must acknowledge every individual of the other nation as his own enemy—because the enemy of his country. It is not necessary to quote the authorities on this subject; they are numerous, explicit, respectable, and have been ably commented upon in the argument.

But, after deciding what is the duty of the citizen, the question occurs, what is the consequence of a breach of that duty?

162*] *The law of prize is part of the law of nations. In it, a hostile character is attached to trade, independently of the character of the trader who pursues or directs it. Condemnation to the use of the captor is equally the fate of the property of the belligerent, and of the property found engaged in anti-neutral trade. But a citizen or ally may be engaged in a hostile trade, and thereby involve his property in the fate of those in whose cause he embarks.

This liability of the property of a citizen to condemnation as a prize of war, may be likewise accounted for under other considerations. Everything that issues from a hostile country is, prima facie, the property of the enemy; and it is incumbent upon the claimant to support the negative of the proposition. But if the claimant be a citizen or an ally at the same time that he makes out his interest, he confesses the commission of an offense which, under a well-known rule of the civil law, deprives him of his right to prosecute his claim.

This doctrine, however, does not rest upon abstract reason. It is supported by the practice of the most enlightened (perhaps we may say of all) commercial nations. And it affords us full confidence in our decision, that we find, upon recurring to the records of the Court of Appeals in prize cases established during the revolutionary war, that, in various cases, it was reasoned upon as the acknowledged law of that court. Certain it is that it was the law of England before the revolution, and therefore constitutes a part of the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction conferred on this court in pursuance of the constitution.

After taking this general view of the principal doctrine on this subject, we will consider the points made in behalf of the claimant in this case, and,

1. Whether this was a trading, in the eye of the prize law, such as will subject the property to capture.

The force of the argument on this point depends upon the terms made use of. If by trading, in prize law, was meant that signification of the term which consists in negotiation or contract, this case would certainly not come under the penalties of the rule. But the object, policy and spirit of the rule, is to cut off all communication or actual *locomotive [163 intercourse between individuals of the belligerent states. Negotiation or contract has, therefore, no necessary connection with the offense. Intercourse inconsistent with actual hostility, is the offense against which the operation of the rule is directed; and by substituting this definition for that of trading with an enemy, an answer is given to this argument.

2. Whether, on the breaking out of a war, the citizen has a right to remove to his own country with his property, is a question which we conceive does not arise in this case. This claimant certainly had not a right to leave the United States for the purpose of bringing home his property from an enemy country; much less could he claim it as a right to bring into this country goods, the importation of which was expressly prohibited. As to the claim for the vessel, it is founded on no pretext whatever; for the undertaking, besides being in violation of two laws of the United States, was altogether voluntary and inexcusable. With regard to the importations from Great Britain about this time, it is well known that the forfeiture was released on grounds of policy and a supposed obligation induced by the assurances which had been held out by the American charge d'affaires in England. But this claimant could allege no such excuse.

3. On the third point, we are of opinion that the foregoing observations furnish a sufficient answer.

If the right to capture property thus offending, grows out of the state of war, it is enough to support the condemnation in this case, that the act of Congress should produce a state of war, and that the commission of the privateer should authorize the capture of any property that shall assume the belligerent character.

Such a character, we are of opinion, this vessel and cargo took upon herself; or at least, she is deprived of the right to prove herself otherwise.

We are aware that there may exist considerable hardship in this case—the owners, both of vessel and cargo, may have been unconscious that they were violating the duties which a state of war imposed upon them. It does not appear that they meant a daring violation either 164] *of the laws or belligerent rights of their country. But it is the unenvied province of this court to be directed by the head, and not the heart. In deciding upon principles that must define the rights and duties of the citizen and direct the future decisions of justice, no latitude is left for the exercise of feeling.

Friday, March 11th. The claim of the United States was taken up.

Rush, Attorney-General.

The United States claim the property in question as a forfeiture under the non-intercourse act of 1st March, 1809. This act was in force at the breaking out of the war, and still continued in force at the time of the capture of the Rapid. The 6th section of the act declares the prohibited goods liable to forfeiture immediately on being shipped with intention of importing the same into the United States. The United States do not claim in any case but where the vessel was unquestionably bound and sailing to the United States, and when no force was necessary to bring her in. When such a vessel actually arrives in a port of the United States, the intent is not only evidenced, but carried into effect, and the offense is complete.

The arrival, in this case, must be taken as a voluntary coming into port. For as the Rapid was bound to the United States previous to the capture, the intervention of the privateer was immaterial, and cannot be considered as rendering the arrival involuntary. The commencement of the illegal act was at the time of the shipment, and was prior to any forfeiture under belligerent rights. The forfeiture under the non-intercourse act, therefore, relates back to the inception of the offense. The municipal law, we contend, abrogated the jus belli, pro tanto.

It is true that, by the 14th section of the prize act of 26th June, 1812, (laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 238), provision is made for the importation of British goods captured from the enemy and made good and lawful prize of war; and it is admitted that such goods are forfeited and accrue to the captors; but the question recurs, 165] what is *good and lawful prize of war? Not, we contend, American property in an American bottom coming to the United States, as in the present case.

By the 16th section of the same act, the act of 4th of April, 1812, laying an embargo, and the non-exportation act of the 14th of the same month, are repealed so far as they relate to ships and vessels having commissions or letters of marque and reprisal. It was equally necessary that there should be an express repeal of the non-intercourse act.

By the act of 2d January, 1813, (laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 341), directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures and penalties in certain cases, property shipped and departing from Great Britain between the 23d of June and 15th of September, and forfeited, under the non-intercourse acts, to the United States, is to be restored to the owners, no notice is taken of any claim of the captors. The plain inference is, that the legislature did not suppose that any claim existed on the part of the captors. The same inference may be drawn from the act of 27th February, 1813, (laws U. S., vol. 11, p. 388).

The sovereign is not to be deprived of his rights by implication. Where the rights of the sovereign clash with those of a private individual, the rights of the latter must yield to those of the former. (2 Cranch, 358, Fisher v. Blight; Plowd., fo. 253, Hales v. Petit.) This last is a leading case on this point.

From the act of 13th July, 1813, (laws U. S., vol. 12, p. 14), it is clearly to be inferred, that, previous to the passage of that act, the rights of the captors were considered as being merged in the forfeiture under the non-intercourse acts. The act of July has merely suspended the right of the United States.

Pitman, contra, for the captors.

We do not claim adversely to the United States, but under the United States, as grantees. We were authorized by our commission to capture this vessel, and, upon capture, it was forfeited to us; condemnation, we *con- [166 tend, is not necessary to give us title: our title accrued at the moment of capture. The United States relinquished to us their right by the fourth section of the prize act.

The non-intercourse act had reference solely to time of peace.

The property in question could not be forfeited to the United States, merely by being put on board; for a municipal law can only have a municipal operation; it cannot operate extraterritorially; it can have no effect upon goods in a foreign country, whether that country be hostile or neutral.

Again, by the act of 1st March, 1809, sec. 8, no persons are authorized to seize property for a violation of that act, except the officers particularly mentioned therein. Until, therefore, a seizure was made by some person so authorized, no forfeiture to the United States could attach; and if, as in the present case, a seizure had been made jure belli, no seizure under the municipal act could subsequently be made, until the first was determined. (1 Rob., 68, 81, The Mercurius.)

The non-intercourse act was merged in the declaration of war, as it respected British subjects and American citizens; this property was therefore forfeited to the United States jure belli; they had a right to seize it jure belli. This right they have granted to us, and our title to the property we have captured must be tried jure belli. If this were a municipal seizure, and if the property were British, the British owner would have had a right to come into court and assert his claim; but this he could not now do, being an alien enemy.

The 2d sec. of the act of the 13th July, 1813, we consider, notwithstanding what has been said by the counsel for the United States, as acknowledging a previous right in the captors.

Jones, on the same side, considered,

1st. The law independent of the instructions of the President to privateers.

167*] *2d. The instructions themselves.

1st. The United States did not mean to relinquish the broad ground of jus belli, as to British property coming to the United States.

The declaration of war and the prize act, being subsequent to the non-intercourse law, are to be considered as having abrogated or superseded that law.

But if this should not be admitted, we contend that these acts may exist together without any inconsistency. There is room enough for the non-intercourse and the prize act both. It has been decided by this court, that trading with the enemy is, per se, a ground of confiscation. There, then, the prize act may operate. But many hostile cargoes may escape capture, and reach the United States. Many such cargoes may be imported by neutrals. Here is room for the operation of the non-intercourse act.

The act of 13th July, 1813, relinquishing to the captors the claims of the United States to the captured property, is conclusive to show that the United States did not mean to relinquish the rights of war. That act describes the property to which the United States give up their claim, as property captured on the high seas, without limitation.

2d. As to the President's instructions. These instructions do not apply to vessels sailing after knowledge of the declaration of war.

But we contend that the President, not having the power of war and peace, had no authority to give such instructions; he could only control the privateers by the power he had of revoking their commissions. There is a difference between his power over these vessels and his power over the public armed ships of the United States.

The prizes taken by privateers under the prize act are forfeitures, and are to be appropriated differently from those captured under the non-intercourse act.

To show that the capture, and not the con-

168*] demnation, *is the foundation of the captor's right of property, the court is referred to 1 Wils., 211, Morrough v. Comyns.

Irving, contra.

By the 3d section of the prize act, privateers are bound to observe all the laws of the United States. Supposing, therefore, the non-intercourse act to have been in force, they had no right to seize for a violation of that act. Besides, the mode of prosecution under the non-intercourse act is essentially different from that directed to be pursued under the prize act. There is also a difference in the manner of distributing the captured property.

Pinkney. The rights of the captors depend not upon the non-intercourse act. Both that and the prize act may be in force at the same time, and operate on the same thing. The first seizure decides which mode of condemnation, &c., shall be adopted.

Harper, in reply.

There is a distinction between importations made by citizens of the United States and those made by foreigners. The latter cannot be affected by the non-intercourse act until the goods have arrived within the United States. They commit no offense till the goods are actually imported. But with regard to citizens of the United States the case is different. They are guilty of a violation of the act by the mere shipment of prohibited goods in a foreign country, with intent to import the same into the United States. The law, as to them, has an extraterritorial operation; it binds them wherever they are. By the shipment, therefore, at Indian Island with intent to import into the United States, the property in the present case was immediately forfeited; and the right of the United States to the forfeiture, at that moment became complete.

For the opinion of the court on the foregoing question, respecting the claim of the United States, under the non-intercourse act, see the opinion in the case of the Sally, delivered by STORY, J., 15th March, 1814, in which the court decided in favor of the captors.

*THE ALEXANDER, PICKET, MASTER. [*169

A vessel, owned by citizens of the United States, sails from Naples, in the year 1812, for the United States, with a cargo and a British license to carry the same to England. On her passage, hearing that war had broken out between Great Britain and the United States, she alters her course for England; is captured by the British, carried into Ireland, libeled, and acquitted upon her license; sells her cargo, and, after a detention of seven months in Ireland, purchases a return cargo in Liverpool, sails for the United States, and is captured by a United States privateer. Vessel and cargo condemned as prize to the captors. Capture good, though only a prize-master put on board.

THIS was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The following were the material facts in the case:

The brig Alexander, William S. Picket, master, sailed from Naples on the 22d June, 1812, with a cargo of brandy, wine and cream of tartar, with a British license to carry the same from Naples to England. She touched at Gibraltar, and there left her deck-load, consisting of brandy, and sailed from thence for the United States. On the 3d of August, 1812, she received intelligence of the war between the United States and Great Britain, and changed her course for England. She was afterwards captured by the British, and sent into Cork, Ireland, and acquitted, and there disposed of her cargo. After seven months' detention in Cork, she proceeded to Liverpool, in ballast. At Liverpool, she took in the cargo in question, purchased by Samuel Welles, one of the claimants, then in England, from the proceeds of the cargo brought from Naples, and sailed from Liverpool for Boston, May 9th, 1813. On the 2d of June following, she was captured by the privateer America, John Kehew, commander, and libeled, as prize, in the District of Massachusetts.

When the Alexander sailed from Naples, she and her cargo were owned, one-half by the claimants, and the other half by W. and S. Robinson, of New York.

The master, on his examination upon the standing interrogatories, stated that the vessel belonged to J. and S. Welles and W. and S. Robinson.

He also stated that, on his arrival in the United States, he delivered to the chief clerk of J. and S. Welles, of Boston, bills of lading, invoices and letters relating to the vessel and goods. These papers were never produced by the claimants.

John Welles, of Boston, claims the vessel [*170] and cargo *for himself and Samuel Welles, alleging that Samuel Welles, in London, purchased, on their joint account, of the agent of W. and S. Robinson, their half of the brig and the proceeds of the Naples cargo, before the purchase of the cargo in question. The United States, also, interposed a claim to the vessel and cargo, as forfeited under the non-importation act.

In the District Court the claim of J. and S. Welles was rejected, and the property condemned to the United States. From this decree the captors and claimants appealed.

In the Circuit Court the property was condemned to the captors. From this decree the United States and the claimants appealed.

Rush, Attorney-General, stated that it was not the intention of government to interpose.

Dexter, for claimants.

There being no general rule of the law of nations, that every trading with the enemy is unlawful, and there being no municipal law on the subject, an American citizen, surprised abroad by an unexpected war, has a right to use all necessary means to save his property and to secure his return home, provided the means used for that purpose be not inconsistent with the interest of the nation to which he belongs. All the means employed in the present case were necessary to save the property in question, and were so far from being inconsistent with the interest of the United States that they clearly tended to the national benefit.

That there is no general rule of the law of nations prohibiting all trade with the enemy, is a proposition which probably will not be controverted. Even Sir William Scott does not deny the right to withdraw funds upon the breaking out of a war; he allows that cases of this kind are entitled to be treated with indulgence; he only holds, that if a particular mode of withdrawing funds has been prescribed by the municipal law, as by license, for instance, the person who pursues a different mode is punishable. He has, however, expressly de- [*171] cided, *that where circumstances rendered it impossible for the party to obtain a license, there the property shall not be condemned, if it be a case where a license ought to have been granted, if applied for. (2 Rob., Cranch 8. 264, 322, The Harmony; 3 Rob., 37, 38, The Citto; 5 Rob., 90, The Ocean; 4 Rob., 193, 234, The Dree Gebroeders.)

No man is bound, on the breaking out of a war, to abandon his property to the enemy; and if no tribunal is established to decide in what cases property shall or shall not be withdrawn, every man must judge for himself.

In the case of Hallet v. Jenks (3 Cranch, 210), there was an entire prohibition of trade; a prohibition more complete than any one which results from any provision of the law of nations; yet this court decided, in that case, that the party being forced into the prohibited port, and obliged by the public authorities of the place to sell, he might purchase a return cargo. In the present case, the captain of the Alexander, hearing of the war and believing it impossible to reach the United States without capture, conceived himself to be under the necessity of changing his course for England, or losing his vessel and cargo; and, having a license, he determined to deceive the enemy. Being captured by a British cruiser and carried into Ireland, he was libeled, but acquitted upon his license. He was compelled to sell his cargo. What was he to do with the proceeds? Suppose he had sold for bank bills—must he bring them to this country? He could not bring specie; it is prohibited. The only way in which he could withdraw his property was to purchase a return cargo and obtain another license. This course he pursued; and we conceive that he was perfectly justified in so doing. The motives for withdrawing his property, after acquitted, were strong. One among others which might be mentioned was the danger that the deception he had practiced upon the enemy would be detected.

2. But allowing, for the sake of argument, that sailing to England after a knowledge of the war, would have been an illegal act—it is clear, in this case, that there was no sailing to England; there was only an intention to go *thither; and it is a well-known rule of [*172] law that the bare intention to commit an illegal act is not punishable. Again, it cannot be contended that the sailing to Ireland was illegal, as the vessel was forcibly carried in there by the enemy.

3. This is a case which comes within the additional instruction of the President of the United States to our public and private armed vessels, issued August 28th, 1812. That instruction prohibits the interruption, by our public and private armed vessels, of "any vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, coming from British ports to the United States laden with British merchandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council." Kehew, the commander of the privateer, had received this instruction.

As to the power of the President to issue such instructions, there can be no doubt. Even if there were no act of Congress relating to the subject, the general power of the executive to direct all hostile operations, gives him the particular power in question. But Congress has sanctioned the instruction in question by the proviso contained in the 1st sec. of the act of 13th July, 1813. (Laws United States, vol. 12, p. 16.)

But it will be said, perhaps, that this instruction is applicable only to vessels sailing from a British port after the repeal of the orders in council, and before the knowledge of the war. Such a construction is erroneous. By the act of Congress last mentioned it is provided: That nothing in the said act contained shall extend to any capture made by private armed vessels, in violation of the additional instructions of the President of 28th Aug., 1812, after the captor "shall have been" apprised thereof. From the use of the phrase, "shall have been," it is clear that the instructions were in force as late as the date of the act of 13th July, i. e., nearly a year after the instructions in question were first given by the President. Government also continued to issue these instructions to the privateers, up to the time of the trial of this cause in the District Court, and afterwards. Now, to what vessels coming from a British port, and laden with British merchandise, could 173] *those instructions apply which were issued more than a year after the declaration of war? Surely not to vessels which sailed while the orders in council were supposed to be repealed, and which had not heard of the war: it would be absurd to suppose that there were any such, so long after the event had taken place. The instructions, therefore, must be considered as having been originally intended to apply to vessels sailing with a knowledge of the war, as well as to those sailing without that knowledge. Again, what was the great object government had in view in issuing these instructions? No doubt to give our citizens an opportunity of withdrawing their property from the enemy's country, and bringing it to the United States. Our citizens had immeuse funds in England. The whole commercial capital of the United States was there. It was an object of vast importance to get it home; and so long as Great Britain would permit us to withdraw it, it was our interest to afford to our citizens every possible facility in aid of that permission. This was the policy of our government, and this the source of the instructions.

3. This was not a capture jure belli. The cruiser was afraid of running the risk of damages for an illegal capture. An understanding was, therefore, had between the parties, which was considered as being mutually beneficial, that the captor should preserve his claim to any British goods which might be found on board, and that the residue should remain to the claimants. A single man only, not a prize crew, was put on board the Alexander. The prize-master alone was utterly unable to secure the vessel against a rescue, should one be attempted. He was utterly unable to bring her into port, without the aid of the hands originally belonging to her. How, then, can it be considered as a capture? But if the court should finally decide it to be a capture, we shall contend that it was only partial, a capture of the British goods only.

Pitman, contra, contended, on behalf of the captors,

1. That Samuel Welles being in England at the time of the purchase of the cargo, he is to be presumed there animo manendi, and is clothed with a British character.

174*] *2. That the suppression of papers connected with the origin of the voyage, affords a sufficient presumption of a concealment of enemy intercsts, to subject the vessel and cargo to condemnation.

3. That the vessel and cargo, being taken in trade with the enemy, are condemnable to the captors as enemy's property.

As to the first point. It appearing that S. Wellcs was residing in England at the time of the purchase of the property in question, it is incumbent on him to explain the circumstances of his residence there. This has not been done. The presumption, then, must be that he was in England animo manendi; that the property was, of course, hostile and liable to condemnation. (1 Rob., 87, 103, The Bernon.)

On the second point little need be said. Suppression of papers is always a suspicious circumstance. In the present case it will, no doubt, have its due weight with the court.

Third point. That here was an actual trading with the enemy, the claimants do not attempt to deny; but they would justify it on the ground of necessity. They say that the vessel was captured by the enemy and carried into Ireland, where she was compelled to sell her cargo, and had no other means of sccuring the proceeds, but by laying them out in the purchase of British goods. This plea of necessity comes with a very bad grace from the claimants. If there were any necessity, it was one voluntarily brought upon themselves. They voluntarily, and, as we contend, unnecessarily, placed themselves and their property in the the power of the enemy, after a knowledge of the war; and can therefore claim no indulgence on the ground of necessity.

The cases which have been cited in which Sir William Scott speaks with indulgence of withdrawing funds, are inapplicable to the present case. Where the withdrawing of funds is spoken of, those funds only are meant which were in the enemy's country before the war; which was not the case here. Besides, the cases cited depend not on trade with the enemy, but on domicile. *A license to withdraw the [175 property would not have been granted in such a case as the present, in England. The President of the United States, acting on English principles, could not have granted a license, supposing him to have the same power in relation to the subject which the King of England has. But he has no such power. Congress has not invested him with it, though they might have done so; and this court, it is presumed, will not undertake to say that the present is a case in which a license would have been granted, supposing the President to have possessed the power. No such power, then, having been granted by Congress, it is to be presumed that they did not intend there should be any exception to the general rule, that trade with the enemy is unlawful.

But it has been urged that this case comes within the President's instructions of 28th of August, and that this capture, being in violation of those instructions, is void. The vessels contemplated by those instructions are described as vessels coming from British ports, "in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council." Now, it is clear that the Alexander did not sail from the enemy's port in consequence of that alleged repeal; she cannot, therefore, be within the meaning of the instructions.

The delivery of the instructions to cruisers, after the case contemplated by them no longer existed, is quite unimportant, notwithstanding the great stress which has been laid upon that circumstance by the claimants. The thing is very easily accounted for. The instructions may have continued to be issued through mere inattention; but the counsel for the claimants, in the explanation which he has attempted, has given to them a coustruction in direct hostility both with their letter and spirit. (See letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Russel, of August 21, 1812, accompanying the President's message of Dec., 1812).

It has been also coutended that there was no capture. But here is the property before the court, and we trust they will not restore it, unless non-capture be fully proved, and eveu theu there can be no restoration unless the claimants prove their right—which they have not yet 176] *doue. They have produced no title papers, no documents whatever, proviug property in themselves.

On this point of uon-capture, which was iusisted on in the courts below, the District Court ordered further proof. We contend,

1. That as the preparatory examinations prove a capture, no further proof should have been ordered.

2. That the further proof establishes the fact of the capture.

3. That the proof upon this order offered by the claimants was inadmissible, being the depositions of the captain and mate, who were examined in preparatory.

As to the putting no prize crew on board, that is a circumstance which in no degree alters the nature of the case; it is not essential to capture. The capture is always made before either a prize-master or crew are put on board; and if the circumstauces of the captured vessel be such as to do away all apprehension of rescue, and inspire confidence that the crew will bring her into port, there is no reason why the property of the captor may not be retained as well by a prize-master alone as by a considerable crew. The object, in such cases, in putting a prize-master ou board, is merely to keep possession, and show that the vessel is not abandoned. (6 Rob., 21, The Resolution; 4 Rob., 316, 386, The William and Mary.)

Pinkney, on the same side.

If the declaration of war is to be cousidered as confining captures to property belonging to British subjects, municipally speaking, there is an end of the belligerent rights of the United States upon the ocean. But it is not so to be considered; it is to be construed by the law of nations.

The claimants seemingly deny that there was any capture in this case; but they iu fact contend, not for uon-capture, but abandonment. We coutend that there was a capture, and that 177] it has not been abandoued. It *was unuecessary to put a prize crew on board to navigate the vessel to the United States, for she was already bound thither. If it was the intention of the captor to abandon her, why put any person on board? The very circumstance of puttiug a prize-master on board clearly evidences an intention not to abandon.

It is perfectly immaterial whether the capture was absolute or couditional only, to secure the British property found on board. To secure that, it was necessary to capture the whole. The capture cannot be considered as partial.

It is said, on the part of the claimauts, that there is no general rule of the law of nations that every trading with the enemy is unlawful. We are of a different opinion. Bynkershoek lays down the rule. (Bynk. Q. J. P. book 1, c. 3.) Vattel gives it by implication. He says that, in time of war, not only the two belligerent nations, in their politic capacity are enemies, but that all the subjects of the one are enemies to all the subjects of the other inclusively. (Vattel, lib. 3, c. 5, § 70.) Sir William Scott, in the case of the Hoop (1 Rob., 167), has laid down the rule—the universal rule. The exception which he allows to this general principle is, that, under certain circumstances, funds may be withdrawu with liccuse from the war-making power. So, in the United States licenscs for the same purpose may be granted by the same power. But this, as has been already observed, is not a case of withdrawing funds; the funds entitled to the benefit of the exception are such only as were in the couutry before the war.

It is said by the counsel for the claimants, that the intention to sail to England was not carried into effect, and therefore no illegal act was committed, even supposing that the act, if committed, would have been illegal. But we contend that the offense was cousummated by the overt act of sailing for the enemy's country several days. Such is the law in the case of blockade. Such, also, it is stated to be by Sir William Scott, in the case of a vessel sailing to a port which was captured, during the voyage, by the nation to which the vessel belonged. By all the analogies of law au intention in part executed completes the offense. (1 Rob., 132, 156; The Columbia.)

*But it has been denied that the act, [178 if carried into executiou, would have been illegal, in the present case; it has been urged that the safety of the property required it. But the law of nations does not permit a man to secure his property by taking it to the enemy's country.

The case of Hallet v. Jenks was cited as supporting the claim of the appellants. But there, compulsion to sell and to take the produce of the enemy's country in paymeut was part of the case stated. Here, the purchase of a return cargo was voluntary; which materially alters the case. Welles ought to have left his funds in the euemy's country.

As to the additional instructions of the President, they clearly do not embrace this case, either by their letter or spirit. An expectation had been raised that, upon the repeal of the orders in council, our non-iutercourse would cease. The instructious were intended to meet this case—to redeem the pledge, and save the national faith. These instructions are explained by the act of Congress of January 2, 1813, authorizing the remission of the forfeitures incurred under the non-intercourse. That act directs the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the forfeitures in the case of such American property only as sailed before the 15th September, 1812; a time by which the merchauts in England were presumed to have been uudeceived.

The proviso to the act of 13th July, 1813, does not alter the nature of the instructions; it leaves them to be expounded by the courts.

Dexter, in reply.

This is a more favorable case than if the property had been in the enemy's country before the war. The object in going to England was merely to save the property from British capture, to which it was exposed, and for this purpose to pass through the enemy's country in disguise—conduct perfectly justifiable in a case like this.

As to the capture, no evidence has been produced to prove the fact. If there had been any agreement that this should be considered 179*] as a capture, we will admit *that it would have been one. But no such agreement is shown—it does not appear that anything of the kind was intended.

But supposing it to have been a capture by agreement—even then the extent of the capture must be limited by the terms of that agreement. (1 Rob., 204, 243, The Jonge Jacobus Baumann.)

There is no evidence of Welles being in England animo manendi.

Monday, March 7th. Absent—TODD, J.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The principles settled in the case of the Rapid decides this cause so far as respects the character of the Alexander and her cargo. In open sea, unpressed by any peculiar danger, with a full knowledge of the war, she changes her course and seeks an enemy's port. If such an act could be justified, it were vain to prohibit trade with the enemy. The subsequent traffic in the enemy country, by which her return cargo was obtained, connects itself with this voluntary sailing for an enemy port; nor does the circumstance that she was carried by force into Ireland, when her actual destination was England, break the chain. The conduct of the Alexander is much less to be defended than that of the Rapid.

But it is alleged by the claimants, that in this case there was no actual capture. This allegation cannot, in the opinion of the court, be sustained. That the America took possession of the Alexander with the intention of making prize of that part of her cargo which might be deemed British, is not controverted. How was this intention to be executed? how was this part of the cargo to be libeled, if it was not captured? And if such part of the cargo as might eventually be British, was captured, and the whole remained together in the vessel, how can the capture be considered as partial?

But it has been truly observed, that it is not non-capture, but abandonment, for which the complainants in fact contend.

180*] *But while the whole cargo remains together, claimed by the captor, if it be enemy property, how can any part of it be said to be abandoned? If it was entirely abandoned, for what purpose was one of the crew of the America put on board the Alexander?

The inability of the prize-master to secure the captured vessel against a rescue, should one be attempted, his inability to bring in the vessel without the aid of the hands belonging to her, is, in reason, no proof of abandonment. If the circumstances of the captured vessel be such as to do away all apprehension of rescue, and inspire confidence that the crew will bring her into port, no reason is perceived why the property of the captor may not be retained as well by a prize-master alone as by a considerable detachment from his crew. The cases cited to this point by the counsel for the captors are entirely satisfactory.

With as little reason do the claimants seek to shelter themselves under the instructions of the 28th of August, 1812. Those instructions apply, in express terms, to such American vessels as have sailed from Great Britain for the United States, "in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council." A vessel which sailed while those orders were not alleged to be repealed, cannot bring herself within these instructions.

But it is alleged that these instructions are still issued, and must mean something. Rather than ascribe their continuance to inattention, the counsel for the claimants would give them a construction in direct hostility with their letter and spirit. Were this reasoning even admitted to be correct, which it is not, it would become the duty of the court to be astute in finding some object to which they might possibly apply. It is possible, though certainly it is barely possible, that some vessels which sailed from England while the orders of council were supposed to be repealed, may not yet have reached the United States. It would be more reasonable to reserve these instructions for such possible case than to apply them to cases which can neither be brought within their words nor their meaning.

The sentence is affirmed with costs.

*THE JULIA, LUCE, MASTER. [*181

The sailing on a voyage under the license and passport of protection of the enemy, in furtherance of his views or interests, constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

D. Davis, for the claimants.

The brig Julia and cargo, consisting of about three hundred hogsheads of salt, were captured by the United States frigate Chesapeake, Samuel Evans, commander, about the last of December, 1812, and libeled and condemned in the District Court of Massachusetts. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court, the sentence of condemnation was affirmed, and the claimants now appeal to this court.

The allegation in the libel is that the property belongs to British subjects.

The facts proved and relied upon by the claimants, and which are fully substantiated by the documents contained in the record, are as follows: That the Julia and cargo were owned wholly by the claimants, who are native American citizens; that she was documented as an American ship, for a voyage from Baltimore to Lisbon, with a cargo of corn, flour, and bread; that she sailed with this cargo from Baltimore to Lisbon, where she arrived in safety; that the outward cargo was there sold to Portuguese merchants in that port, and a return cargo of salt purchased with a part of the proceeds of the outward cargo; and that, as the Julia was returning to Boston, her port of discharge, with her homeward cargo, she was captured by the Chesapeake; that all the transactions of the voyage were really and truly for account of the claimants, and that, in point of fact, no connection, intercourse, trade, supply, or other matter or thing relative thereto, was ever had, made, intended, or contemplated with the enemy, in the whole course of this voyage.

It is admitted by the claimants, that copies of the following documents signed and granted by Admiral Sawyer and Andrew Allen, late the British consul at Boston, were filed in the 182] courts below, and, for the *reasons stated by the learned judges, admitted in evidence, viz:

1st. A license from Admiral Sawyer, in the words following:

"By Herbert Sawyer, Esq., Vice-Ad-[SEAL] miral of the blue, and commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed and to be employed in the river St. Lawrence, along the coast of Nova Scotia, the islands of Anticosti, Madelaine and Saint John, and Cape Breton and the Bay of Fundy, and at and about the island of Bermuda, or Somers' Islands, &c., &c., &c.

"Whereas, Mr. Andrew Allen, His Majesty's consul at Boston, has recommended to me Mr. Robert Ewell, a merchant of that place, and well inclined towards the British interest, who is desirous of sending provisions to Spain and Portugal, for the use of the allied armies in the Peninsula, and whereas, I think it fit and necessary that encouragement and protection should be afforded him in so doing.

"These are therefore to require and direct all captains and commanders of His Majesty's ships and vessels of war which may fall in with any American, or other vessel bearing a neutral flag, laden with flour, bread, corn, or peas, or any other species of dry provisions, bound from America to Spain or Portugal, and having this protection on board, to suffer her to proceed without unnecessary obstruction or detention in her voyage; provided she shall appear to be steering a due course for those countries, and it being understood this is only to be in force for one voyage and within six months from the date hereof.

By command of the vice-admiral,
WILLIAM AYRE.

183*] *2d. The following document signed by Andrew Allen:

"To the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war or of private armed ships belonging to subjects of His Majesty:

"Whereas, from the consideration of the great importance of continuing a regular supply of flour and other dried provisions to the allied armies in Spain and Portugal, it has been deemed expedient by His Majesty's government that, notwithstanding the hostilities now existing between Great Britain and the United States, every degree of encouragement and protection should be given to American vessels laden with flour and other dry provisions, and bona fide bound to Spain and Portugal. And whereas, in furtherance of these views of His Majesty's government, Herbert Sawyer, Esq., Vice-Admiral and Commander-in-Chief on the Halifax station, has addressed to me a letter under the date of the 5th of Aug., 1812, (a copy whereof is hereunto annexed), wherein I am instructed to furnish a copy of his letter, certified under my consular seal, to every American vessel so laden and bound, destined to serve as a perfect safeguard and protection of such vessel in the prosecution of her voyage. Now, therefore, in obedience to these instructions, I have granted to the American brig Julia, Tristram Luce, master, of 159 tons burthen, now lying in the harbor of Boston, and bound to Baltimore for the purpose of taking in a cargo of flour and corn, and proceeding thence to a port in Spain or Portugal, not under French domination, the annexed documents, requesting all officers commanding His Majesty's ships of war, or private armed ships belonging to subjects of His Majesty, to give to the said vessel all due assistance and protection in the prosecution of her voyage to Spain or Portugal, and on her return thence to her port of original departure, laden with salt or with specie to the net amount of her outward cargo, or in ballast only.

I shall therefore give directions to the commanders of His Majesty's squadron under my command not to molest American vessels unarmed and so laden, "bona fide" bound to British, Portuguese or Spanish ports, whose papers shall be accompanied with a certified copy of this letter under the consular seal.

185*] *If the opinions of the courts below, in admitting copies of these documents to be received as evidence, were correct, then it is also admitted that these licenses and letters had been obtained for, and were found on board the Julia at the time of her capture.

Upon this statement, and upon the evidence contained in the record, the claimants submit two points to the decision of the court.

1. That the mere acceptance or possession of the British license and documents do not subject the property to condemnation.

2. That if the peculiar terms of the license in this case create a presumption unfavorable to the claimants, either of an intention to supply the enemy, or of any other unlawful intercourse with the enemy, such presumption is entirely destroyed by the evidence in the case, which shows that no such supply or intercourse did ever, in fact, take place.

As to the first point. The nature and effect of an enemy's license, so far as respected the acceptance, possession or use of such a document by an American citizen, were so fully and ably pointed out in the case of the Aurora, that the counsel for the claimants is content to rely upon, and to refer the court to the arguments and authorities which were submitted and quoted in that case, upon this point.

But as to the second point. If the Julia had been captured on her passage to Lisbon, with these British documents on board, there might have been some ground for a condemnation. The suspicious or obnoxious parts of them, such as those which state that "Elwell is well inclined towards the British interest," and that he contemplates furnishing supplies to the allied armies in the Peninsula, might have raised a presumption that such was his intention, and would have cast the onus probandi upon him, or upon those in whose hands the license might be found. But it is contended, that if, upon furnishing the proof, it shall appear that no unlawful intercourse with the enemy ever did, in fact take place, and, moreover, that no such 186] intercourse was ever even intended *to be held with the enemy, the presumption against the claimants, arising from the terms of the British documents, will be entirely destroyed, and the complainants left in a state wholly free from guilt, both legal and moral.

That this is a correct position, the court is referred to the case of the Matilda, decided in the North Carolina Circuit, by the Chief Justice of the United States, and reported in the American Law Journal, p. 478. In that case, the license was granted after the war, and for the express purpose of a trade and supply to the British W. I. islands. But there was no evidence that any act of trading had been committed. In that case the Chief Justice is said to have declared, "that there was no evidence of "a criminal intent, except that of the license; "that the obtaining the license was to deceive "the enemy, which the claimants lawfully "might do; and that the case was cleared of all "doubts by the evidence, which stated the real "object of the voyage."

In the case of the Abby (5 Rob., p. 254), it is expressly stated to be law "that there must "be an act of trading to the enemy country, "as well as the intention; that there must be a "legal as well as moral illegality." It is in the same case stated, that "no case has been pro- "duced, in which a mere intention to trade "with the enemy, contradicted by the fact, "enures to condemnation." Upon both points (said Sir William Scott), "I am of opinion, that "the claimant is entitled to restitution. On "the first there was no illegal act; on the "second there was neither intention nor act."

There is no principle better known or established by the writers, both upon law and ethics, than that there must be both a will and an act to constitute an offense. The act is necessary to demonstrate the depravity of the will: a vicious will without a vicious act is no offense.

It is not denied that the Julia and her outward cargo were the property of the claimants; it is not denied that the Julia, on her departure from Baltimore, was documented, in every respect, as required by law, as an American ship bound from Baltimore to Lisbon, with a cargo of flour, corn and bread.

*It is not denied that the Julia, [187 with this cargo on board, was ordered to proceed, and that she did in fact proceed, to Lisbon; and that it was the intention of the owners that the cargo should be there sold to the best advantage, to merchants or other subjects of that government; nor is it denied that the Julia and cargo did, in fact, proceed to Lisbon for these purposes.

It is not denied that this cargo of corn, flour and bread, was in fact carried to Lisbon, there landed, and sold to a house of merchants of that city. It is also a fact, probably not disputed, that the cargo of salt with which the Julia was laden, and with which she was captured on her homeward voyage, was purchased with the proceeds of the cargo sold at Lisbon. And it is not pretended that there was any intercourse with the enemy at Lisbon, or with any of his agents; or that there was in reality any sale, contract or other transaction by the claimants, or their agents, that any part of the cargo, or of the proceeds of it, should, in any manner, serve as a supply or come to the hands and possession of the enemy. On the other hand, it does appear from all the evidence in the case, that the whole object of the voyage was to export the cargo of the Julia to Lisbon, there to be sold, and the proceeds to be invested in such funds as are pointed out in the owners' letter of instructions to the captain. The intention to trade with, or supply the enemy, is proved only from the prima facie evidence of the license and other British documents; and this evidence is fully explained and counteracted by the whole mass of evidence in the case, showing the real object of the voyage, and that no supply, trading or intercourse were in fact had with the enemy.

If the bare possession or acceptance of a license condemns the property which it purports to protect, the Julia must be condemned; but if the presumptive or prima facie evidence resulting from the possession of the license, however obnoxious may be the terms of it, can be explained and counteracted by evidence of the facts, the Julia and cargo must be restored. The former position, it is conceived, will never be sanctioned by this court; and if the latter be not established, the claimants will be severely punished for an act which they never committed, and which they never intended to commit, viz., that of the trading with, and supplying 188] the enemies of their country. *The case of the Julia, therefore, turns upon a question of fact. Did the Julia pursue a voyage to a neutral port, and was her cargo disposed of to the subjects of a neutral country, or did she pursue the voyage and furnish the supplies to the enemy, which appear to have been the objects of the British admiral? It is repugnant to law and reason that a man shall not be permitted to prove his innocence; and, when he has proved it, that he should be held guilty, and punished. If taken with the mainor, may he not prove that he came honestly by the goods?

If a contrary doctrine be established, it will lead to one inevitable result—viz., a prohibition of all trade from this to a neutral country which happens to be in alliance with Great Britain; it will be, in fact, declaring that a cargo of flour shall not be exported to Spain or Portugal, because the neutral subjects, to whom it may be there sold, may sell it again to their British allies.

This case is distinguishable from, and stands upon much firmer ground than, that of the Aurora. In that case, the ship was taken on her outward passage, and (as it was alleged) out of her course to her ostensible port. It was therefore impossible for the claimants to remove the presumption against them, arising from the possession of the license, by the subsequent events of the voyage. But in this case, everything is explained, and every doubt or suspicion removed by the evidence showing the bona fide objects and ultimate termination of the voyage. The case is thus cleansed of everything that might be presumed to be foul by the unhappy terms of the license, or the officious and unofficial interpositions of Mr. Allen. The case must turn upon the bona fide views and intention of the claimants, and upon the evidence that, in point of fact, no unlawful intercourse between them and the enemy ever existed, or was ever contemplated. If they have merely accepted a license, but have made no unlawful use of it, they cannot be injured by it.

Rush, Attorney-General, in behalf of the United States.

It is utterly impossible that, if any American property, embarked in a trade under an enemy license, can be the subject of prize, this should escape. The transaction is the most obnoxious 189] of its class; and presents the *leading question in its most advantageous forms for the captors.

The object of the enemy was supply to the allied armies in Portugal and Spain. The engagement to execute that purpose was the consideration of the protection granted by the license. The purpose was executed in fact, and in strict conformity with the engagement. The homeward cargo was purchased with the proceeds of the outward; and, when captured, was still under the protection of the license. If the circumstances in this case do not amount to a trading with the enemy, there is no such thing. If this license (or rather these licenses) should not be held to give to the property a hostile character, no license, whatever may be the facts with which it is combined, can produce that effect.

There can be no foundation for restitution in this case but one. It has been doubted whether American property can, for any cause, become subject to confiscation as prize, when captured by a privateer; and it will be contended, (as it is understood) in the case of the Frances, that it cannot.

The capture on this occasion, however, was made by a national vessel, in virtue of the declaration of war, and the public law of the world operating upon it. The Attorney-General does not believe that this difference in fact creates any difference in the legal conclusion; because he supposes that privateers have, upon the sound construction of the act of Congress, the same rights of capture with national vessels; but he contends that, even if it should be held that the rights of capture, vested by their commissions in private armed vessels, are confined to property strictly (not constructively) British, the rights of national vessels are not so restricted.

The court is referred to the opinion at large (in the transcript) of the learned judge by whom this cause was decided in the Circuit Court, for a very able discussion of the doctrine which it involves.

Monday, March 7th, 1814. Absent. TODD, J.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

*The facts of this case, and the grounds[190 upon which a decree of condemnation was pronounced in the Circuit Court, fully appear in the opinion of that court which accompanies this record. That opinion has been submitted to my brethren, and a majority of them concur in the decree of condemnation, upon the reasons and principles therein stated. It is not thought necessary to repeat those reasons and principles in a more formal manner; it is sufficient to declare as a result of them, that we hold that the sailing on a voyage under the license and passport of protection of the enemy, in furtherance of his views or interests, constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war, and that the facts of the present case afford irrefragable evidence of such act of illegality.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed with costs.

The following is the opinion of the Circuit Court of Massachusets, referred to in the foregoing opinion.

"The Julia and cargo were captured, as prize, by the United States frigate Chesapeake, commanded by Captain Evans, on the 31st December, 1812. From the preparatory evidence and documents it appears that she sailed from Baltimore on or about the 31st October, 1812, bound on a voyage to Lisbon, with a cargo of corn, bread and flour; and the capture took place on the return voyage to the United States. The vessel and cargo were documented as American, and as owned by the claimants, who are American citizens. The vessel had on board sundry documents of protection from British agents, which were delivered up to the captors, and, together with the other ship's papers, were put on board of the prize, in the custody of the prize-master; and these documents were the unquestionable cause of the capture. It appears that the American master and crew were left on board the prize, and during the subsequent voyage to the United States, these British documents were taken from the custody of the prize-master surreptitiously and without his knowledge as to the time or manner. He alleged expressly that they were stolen, 191] and this allegation seems *admitted by the master, in a supplementary affidavit, who, however, denies any knowledge or connection in the transaction. The prize-master took exact copies of these documents, for the purpose of sending them to the Secretary of the Navy; which copies have been produced in court, and verified by his affidavit. All the other original documents have been faithfully produced. Upon the examination of the master upon the standing interrogatories, on the 18th February, 1812, although there are several interrogatories, and particularly the 16th and 27th, which point directly to the subject matter, he did not state the existence of any British document, passport, safeguard or protection; and, what is quite as remarkable, he expressly declared that he knew not upon what pretenses nor for what reason the vessel and cargo were captured. It was not until after the time assigned for the trial, and on the 8th of March, 1813, that the master, by a supplementary affidavit (which was admitted through great indulgence, and contrary to the general practice of prize courts), attempted to explain his omission, and to vindicate his misconduct. The apology is equally weak and futile. At the time when these examinations were taken, the interrogatories had been drawn up with care and deliberation. The commissioners were present to explain to the understanding of every man intent on truth, the meaning of any question which might appear obscure. The master was a part owner of the vessel and cargo, and the regular depository of all the papers connected with the voyage. It is utterly incredible that he should not recollect, on his examination, the existence of these British documents. They were put on board for the special safeguard and security of the vessel and cargo. Indeed, independent of them, the risk of the capture would have been imminent. A master can never be admitted to be heard in a prize court, to aver his ignorance or forgetfulness of the documents of his ship. It is his duty to know what they are; and he cannot be believed ignorant of their contents, without overthrowing all the presumptions which govern in prize proceedings. Looking to the whole conduct of the master, it seems to be irreconcilable with the rules of morality and fair dealing; and I have great difficulty in exempting him from the imputation of being guilty of a willful suppression of the truth.

192*] *At the hearing, a preliminary objection was taken to the introduction of the copies of the British documents, upon the ground that the originals, as the best evidence, ought to be produced. The rule undoubtedly applies when the originals are in existence, and in the possession or control of the party. The extraordinary disappearance of these important papers, under the circumstances of this case, I can have little doubt was occasioned by a fraudulent substraction. There is no reason to impute this substraction to the prize-master. The documents were to him a very important protection; they constituted the avowed reason of the capture, as the mate and some of the seamen testify. It is true that the master has declared that he knew not the pretense of capture; but it can hardly be believed that he could be ignorant of a fact which so materially affected his interest. I feel myself bound to make very unfavorable inferences against him; and if, in odium spoliatoris, I impute the substraction to some person on board connected with the voyage, and in the confidence of the master, it is measuring out no injustice to one who appears to deem misstatements and concealments no violent breach of good faith. I shall, therefore, admit the copies, verified as they are, as good evidence in these proceedings; and I will add, that if a single material fact in favor of the claimants had depended upon the supplementary affidavit of the master, I should have felt myself compelled to repudiate it in order to vindicate the regularity of prize proceedings, and suppress the efforts of fraud to derive benefit from after thoughts and contrivances. These remarks are not made without regret; but public duty requires that manifest aberrations from moral propriety should not receive shelter in this court.

Having disposed of this preliminary objection, I now proceed to consider the two questions which have been so ably discussed in this case.

1st. Whether the use of an enemy's license or protection, on a voyage to a neutral country in alliance with the enemy, be illegal so as to affect the property with confiscation.

2d. If not, whether the terms of the present license distinguish this case unfavorably from the general principle.

*The British documents which were [193 on board, and which, for conciseness, I have termed a license, are as follows:

[It is thought unnecessary to insert these documents here, as they are to be found at length in the argument of the claimant's counsel in the former part of this report.]

In approaching the more general question which has been raised in this case, I am free to acknowledge that I feel no inconsiderable diffidence, both from the importance of the question, and the different opinions which eminent jurists have entertained respecting it. Nor am I insensible, also, that it has entered somewhat into political discussions, and awakened the applause and zeal of some, and the denunciations of others, considered merely as a subject of national policy, and not of legal investigation. It has now become my duty to examimine it; and, whatever may be my opinion, I feel a consolation that it is in the power of a higher tribunal to revise my errors, and award ample justice to the parties.

At the threshold of this inquiry, I lay it down as a fundamental proposition, that strictly speaking, in war all intercourse between the subjects and citizens of the belligerent countries is illegal, unless sanctioned by the authority of the government, or in the exercise of the rights of humanity. I am aware that the proposition is usually laid down in more restricted terms by elementary writers, and is confined to commercial intercourse. Bynkershoek says: "Ex natura belli, commercia inter hostes cessare, non est dubitandum. Quamvis nulla specialis sit commerciorum prohibitio, ipso tamen jure belli commercia esse vetita, ipsæ indictiones bellorum satis declarant." (Bynk Q. J. P. book 1, c. 3.) And yet it seems not difficult to perceive that his reasoning extends to every species of intercourse. Valin, in his commentary on the French ordinance, speaking of the reason of requiring the name and domicile in a policy, says: "Est encore de connaitre, en temps de guerre, si malgré l'interdiction de commerce, qu'emporte toujours toute déclaration de guerre, les sujets du Roi ne font point commerce avec les ennemis de l'Etat, ou avec des amis ou alliés, par l'interposition desquels on ferait passer aux 194 ennemis des munitions de guerre et de bouche, ou d'autres effets prohibés; car tout cela, étant défendu comme préjudiciable à l'Etat, serait sujet à confiscation, et à être déclaré de bonne prise." (Lib. 1. tit. 6, art 3, p. 31.) In another place, adverting to a case of neutral, allied, and French property on board an enemy ship, &c., he declares it subject to confiscation, because "C'est favoriser le commerce de l'ennemi et faciliter le transport de ses denrées et marchandises, ce qui ne peut convenir aux traités d'alliance ou de neutralité, encore moins aux sujets du Roi auxquels toute communication avec l'ennemi est strictement défendu sur peine même de la vie." (Lib. 3, tit. 9, art. 7, p. 253.) And Valin, Traité des Prises, (chap. 5, sec. 5, p. 62.)

From this last expression it seems clear that Valin did not understand the interdiction as limited to mere commercial intercourse. In the elaborate judgment of Sir W. Scott, in The Hoop (1 Rob., 165, 196), the illegality of commercial intercourse is fully established as a doctrine of national law; but it does not appear that the case before him required a more extended examination of the subject. The black book of the admiralty contains an article which deems every intercourse with the public enemy an indictible offense. This article, which is supposed to be as old as the reign of Edw. III., directs the grand inquest "Soit enquis de tous ceux qui entrecommument, vendent ou achetent avec aucuns des enemis de notre Seigneur le Roi sans license spécial du Roi ou de son admiral." But, independent of all authority, it would seem a necessary result of a state of war to suspend all negotiations and intercourse between the subjects of the belligerent nations. By the war every subject is placed in hostility to the adverse party. He is bound by every effort of his own to assist his own government, and to counteract the measures of its enemy. Every aid, therefore, by personal communication, or by other intercourse, which shall take off the pressure of the war, or foster the resources, or increase the comforts of the public enemy, is strictly inhibited. No contract is considered as valid between enemies, at least so far as to give them a remedy in the courts of either government; and they have, in the language of the civil law, no ability to sustain a persona standi in judicio. The ground upon which a trading with the enemy *is prohibited, is not the [195 criminal intentions of the parties engaged in it, or the direct and immediate injury to the state. The principle is extracted from a more enlarged policy, which looks to the general interests of the nations, which may be sacrificed under the temptation of unlimited intercourse, or sold by the cupidity of corrupted avarice. In the language of Sir William Scott, I would ask, "Who can be insensible to the consequences that might follow, if every person, in time of war, had a right to carry on a commercial intercourse with the enemy, and, under color of that, had the means of carrying on any other species of intercourse he might think fit? The inconvenience to the public might be extreme; and where is the inconvenience on the other side, that the merchant should be compelled, in such a situation of the two countries, to carry on his trade between them (if necessary) under the eye and control of the government charged with the care of the public safety?"

Nor is there any difference between a direct intercourse between the enemy countries and an intercourse through the medium of a neutral port. The latter is as strictly prohibited as the former. (4 Rob., 65, 79, The Jonge Pieter.)

It is argued that the cases of trading with the enemy are not applicable, because there is no evidence of actual commerce; and an irresistible presumption arises from the nature of the voyage to a neutral port, that no such trade is intended. If I am right in the position, that all intercourse, which humanity or necessity does not require, is prohibited, it will not be very material to decide whether there be a technical commerce or not. But is it clear, beyond all doubt, that no inference can arise of an actual commerce? The license is issued by the agents of the British government, and, I must presume, under its authority. It is sold (as it is stated) in the market; and if it be a valuable acquisition, the price must be proportionate. If such licenses be an article of sale, I beg to know in what respect they can be distinguished from the sale of merchandise? If purchased directly of the British government, would it not be a traffic with an enemy? If purchased indirectly, can it change the nature of the transaction? It has been said *that [196 if purchased of a neutral, the trade in licenses is no more illegal than the purchase of goods of the enemy fabric bona fide, conveyed to neutrals. Perhaps this may, under the circumstances, be correct; but I do not understand that the purchase of goods of enemy manufacture, and avowedly belonging to an enemy, is legalized by the mere fact of the sale being made in a neutral port. The goods must have become incorporated into the general stock of neutral trade before a belligerent can lawfully become a purchaser. If such licenses be a legitimate article of sale, will they not enable the British government to raise a revenue from our citizens, and thereby add to their resources of war? Admit, however, that they are not so sold, but are a measure of policy adopted by Great Britain to further her own interests, and ensure a constant supply of the necessaries of life, either in or through neutral countries; can it be asserted that an American citizen is wholly blameless, who enters into stipulations and engagements to effect their purposes? Is not the enemy thereby relieved from the pressure of the war, and enabled to wage it more successfully against the other branches of the same commerce not protected by this indulgence?

It is said that the case of a personal license is not distinguishable from a general order of council authorizing and protecting all trade to a neutral country. In my judgment they are very distinguishable. The first presupposes a personal communicaton with the enemy, and an avowed intention of furthering his objects, to the exclusion of the general trade by other merchants to the same country; it has a direct tendency to prevent such general trade, and relieves the enemy from the necessity of resorting to a general order of protection; it contaminates the commercial enterprises of the favored individual with purposes not reconcilable with the general policy of his country; exposes him to extraordinary temptations to succour the enemy by intelligence; and separates him from the general character of his country, by clothing him with all the effective interests of a neutral. Now, these are some of the leading principles upon which a trade with the enemy has been adjudged illegal by the law of nations. On the other hand, a general order opens the whole trade of the neutral country to every merchant. It presupposes no incorporation in enemy 197*] *interests. It enables the whole mercantile enterprise of the country to engage upon equal terms with the traffic; and it separates no individual from the general national character. It relaxes the vigor of war, not only in that particular trade, but collaterally opens a path to other commerce. There is all the difference between the cases that there is between an active personal co-operation in the measures of the enemy, and merely accidental aid afforded by the pursuit of a fair and legitimate commerce.

In the purchase or gratuity of a license for trade, there is an implied agreement that the party shall not employ it to the injury of the grantor; that he shall conduct himself in a perfectly neutral manner, and avoid every hostile conduct. I say there is an implied agreement to this effect, in the very terms and nature of the engagement. I am warranted in declaring this, from the uniform construction put by Great Britain on the conduct of her own subjects acting under licenses. Can an American citizen be permitted in this manner to carve out for himself a neutrality on the ocean, when his country is at war? Can he justify himself in refusing to aid his countrymen who have fallen into the hands of the enemy on the ocean, or decline their rescue? Can he withdraw his personal services, when the necessities of the nation require them? Can an engagement be legal which imposes upon him the temptation or necessity of deeming his personal interest at variance with the legitimate objects of his government? I confess that I am slow to believe that the principles of national law, which formerly considered the lives and properties of all enemies as liable to the arbitrary disposal of their adversary, are so far relaxed that a part of the people may claim to be at peace, while the residue are involved in the desolations of war. Before I shall believe the doctrine, it must be taught me by the highest tribunal of the nation; in whose superior wisdom and sagacity I shall most cheerfully repose.

It has been said that no case of condemnation can be found on account of the use of an enemy license. Admitting the fact, I am not disposed to yield to the inference that it is therefore lawful. It is one of the many novel questions which may be presumed to arise out of *the extraordinary state of the world.. [198 The silence of adjudged cases proves nothing either way. It may well admit of opposite interpretations. The case of the Vrow Elizabeth (5 Rob., 2), has been cited by the captors in support of the more general doctrine. It was a case where the ship had the flag and pass and documents of an enemy's ship; and the court held that the owner was bound by the assumed character. There is no similarity in the case before the court. The ship and cargo were documented as American and not as British property. As little will the Clarissa (5 Rob., 4), cited on the other side, apply. It was, at most, but a license given by the Dutch government, allowing a neutral to trade within its own colony; in all other respects the ship and property were avowedly neutral; and, unless so far as the English doctrines as to the colonial trade could apply, there was nothing illegal or improper in waiving any municipal regulations of colonial monopoly in favor of a neutral. There was nothing which compromitted the allegiance or touched the interest of the neutral country. If, however, this license had conferred on the neutral the special privileges of a Dutch merchant, or had facilitated the Dutch policy in warding off the pressure of the war, it would probably have received a very different determination. (See the Vreede Scholtys, 5 Rob., 5, note a; The Rendsborg, 4 Rob., 98, 121.) We all know that there are many acts which inflict upon neutrals the penalty of confiscatiou, from the subserviency which they are supposed to indicate to enemy interests; the carrying of enemy dispatches; the transportation of military persons; and the adopting of the coasting trade of the enemy. The ground of these decisions is the voluntary interposition of the party to further the views and interests of one belligerent at the expense of the other, and I cannot doubt that the Clarissa would have shared the general fate, but from some circumstance of peculiar exemption.

By the prize code of Louis XIV, (which I quote the more readily because it is, in general, a compilation of prize law as recognized among civilized nations,) it is a sufficient ground of condemnation that a vessel bears commissions from two different states. Valin (Traite des prises, p. 53) says: "*A l' égard du vaisseau ou se trouverent des commissions de deux differens princes ou états, il est également juste [199 qu' il soit declaré de bonne prise, soit parce qu' il se peut arborer le pavillon de l'un, en consequence de sa commission, sans faire injure à l'autre, ceci, au reste, regarde les Francais comme les êtrangers." In what consists the substantive difference between navigating under the commissions of our own and also of another sovereign, and navigating under the protection of the passport of such sovereign which confers or compels a neutral character? Valin, in another place (sur l'ordinance, lib. 3, tit. 9, art.

4, p. 241), declares, "si sur un navire Francais il y a une commission d'un prince étranger avec cette de France, il sera de bonne prise, quoiqu'il n'ait arboré que le pavillon Francais." It is true that he just before observes, "que ce circonstance de deux congés ou passe-ports, ou de deux connaissements, dont l'un est de France, et l'autre d'un pays ennemi, ne suffit pas seule faire declarer le navire ennemi de bonne prise, et que cela doit dependre des circonstances capables de faire découvrir sa véritable destination." But Valin is referring to the case of an enemy ship having a passport of trade from the sovereign of France. I infer from the language of Valin, that a French ship sailing under the passport, conge, or license of its enemy, without the authority of its own sovereign, would have been lawful prize.

This leads me to another consideration; and that is, that the existence and employment of such a license affords a strong presumption of concealed enemy interest, or, at least, of ultimate destination for enemy use. It is inconceivable that any government should allow its protection to an enemy trade, merely out of favor to a neutral nation, or to an ally, or to its enemy. Its own particular and special interests will govern its policy; and the quid pro quo must materially enter into every such relaxation of belligerent rights. It is, therefore, a fair inference, either that its subjects partake of the trade under cover, or that the property, or some portion of the profits, finds its way into the channel of the public interests.

It has been argued that the use of false or simulated papers is allowable in war as a stratagem to deceive the enemy and elude his vigilance. However this may be, it certainly cannot authorize the use of real papers of a hostile character, to carry into effect the avowed pur- 200*] pose *of the enemy. We may be allowed to deceive our enemy; but we can never be allowed to set up, as such a deception, a concert in his own measures for the very purpose he has prescribed.

An allusion has been made to the passports or safe-conducts granted, in former times, to the fishing vessels of enemies; and it has been argued that such passports or safe-conducts have never been supposed to induce the penalty of confiscation. This will at once be conceded, as to the belligerent nation who granted these indulgences; but as to the other nation, where such passports were not guaranteed by treaty or mutual pacts, I have no authority to lead me to an accurate decision. The French ordinance of 1543 authorized the admiral to make fishing truces with the enemy; and, where no such truces were made, to deliver to the subjects of the enemy, safe-conducts for fishing upon the same stipulations as they should be delivered to French subjects by the enemy. This, therefore, was an authority to be exercised only in cases of reciprocity; and it seems to have been abolished from the manifest inconveniences which attended the practice. (Valin, sur ord. lib. 1, p. 689, 690.) I do not think that any argument in favor of the validity of the present license (unrecognized as it is by our government) can be drawn from these ancient examples as to fisheries.

It has been argued that the voyage was lawful to a neutral port, and the mere use of a license cannot cover a lawful voyage with the taint of illegality. This, however, is assuming the very point in controversy. It is not universally true that a destination to a neutral port gives a bona fide character to the voyage. If the property be ultimately destined for an enemy port or an enemy use, it is clear that the interposition of a neutral port will not save it from condemnation. (4 Rob., 65, 79, The Jonge Pieter.) Suppose, in the present case, the vessel and cargo had been destined to Lisbon for the express use of the British fleet there, could there be a doubt that it would have been a direct trade with an enemy? Whether the voyage, therefore, be legal or not, depends not merely upon the destination, but the ultimate application of the property, or the ascertained intentions of the party. A contract to carry provisions to St. Bartholomews for the *ultimate supply of the British West [201 India Islands, would be just as much an infringement of the law of war as a contract for a direct transportation. On the whole, I adopt, as a salutary maxim of war, the doctrine of Bynkershoek: "Vetatur quoquo modo hostium utilitati consulere." It is unlawful in any manner to lend assistance to the enemy, by attaching ourselves to his policy, sailing under his protection, facilitating his supplies, and separating ourselves from the common character of our country.

I am aware that the opinion which I have formed as to the general nature of licenses, is encountered by the decisions of learned judges for whom I entertain every possible respect. This circumstance alone, independent of the novelty and importance of the question, would awaken in my own mind an unusual hesitation as to the correctness of my own opinion; but, after much reflection upon the subject, I have not been able to find sufficient grounds to yield it; and my duty requires that, whatsoever may be its imperfections, my own judgment should be pronounced to the parties.

I am glad, however, to be relieved from the painful necessity of deciding the more general question, by the peculiar terms of the present license, which I consider as affording irrefragable proof of an illicit intercourse with the enemy, and a direct contract to transport the cargo for the use of the British armies in Spain and Portugal. The very preamble to the license of Admiral Sawyer shows this in a most explicit manner, and discloses facts which it is no harshness to declare, are not very honorable to the principles or the character of the parties.

It has been attempted to distinguish the present claimants from Mr. Elwell, to whom the original license was granted. It could hardly have been expected that such an attempt would be successful. The assignees cannot place their derivative title on a better footing than the original party. They must be considered as entering into the views and contracting to effectuate the intentions of the latter; and, at all events, the illegality of the employment of the license attaches indissolubly to their conduct. If it were material, however, it might deserve consideration how far an actual assignment is *shown in the case. It [202 rests on the affidavit of one of the claimants, and on the mere face of papers which carry no very decisive character, and are quite recon-cilable with concealed interests in other persons, as the records of prize courts abundantly show. However, I only glance at this subject, as it in no degree enters into the ingredients of my judgment.

A very bold proposition was, at one time, advanced in the argument by the claimants' counsel, that if this cargo had been actually destined to Portugal for the use of the allied armies of Great Britain and Portugal, or even for the use of the British army, it would not be an offense against the laws of war. In the sequel, if I rightly understand, this proposition, in this alarming extent, was not contended for; and certainly it is utterly untenable upon the principles of national law.

But it was insisted on, that the British armies in Portugal and Spain were to be considered as incorporated into the armies of those kingdoms, and as not holding the British character.

If I could so far forget the public facts of which, sitting in a prize court, I am bound to take notice, there is sufficient in the papers before me to prove the contrary of this suggestion. In Admiral Sawyer's license and Mr. Allen's certificate they are expressly called the allied armies; thereby plainly admitting a separate character and organization; and so, in point of fact, we all know it to be; if, indeed, the British character be not predominant throughout these countries. I reject the distinction, therefore, as utterly insupportable in point of fact.

It has been further argued that, if the conduct be illegal, it is but a personal misdemeanor in no degree affecting the vessel and cargo; and at all events, that the illegality was extinguished by the termination of the outward voyage. The principles of law afford no countenance to either part of the proposition. If the property be engaged in an illegal traffic with the enemy, or even in an attempt to trade, it is liable to confiscation as well on the return as on the outward voyage; and it may be assumed as a proposition, liable to few, if any, exceptions, that the 203] *property which is rendered auxiliary or subservient to enemy interests, becomes tainted with forfeiture.

I cannot but remark that the license in this case, issued within our own territory by an agent of the British government, carries with it a peculiarly obnoxious character. This circumstance, which is founded on an assumption of consular authority that ought to have ceased with the war, affords the strongest evidence of improper intercourse. The public dangers to which it must unavoidably lead, by fostering interests within the bosom of the country, against the measures of the government, and the breach of faith which it imports in a public functionary receiving the protection of the government, can never be lost sight of in a tribunal of justice. I forbear to dwell further on this delicate subject.

Upon the whole, I consider the property engaged in this transaction as stamped with the hostile character; and I entirely concur in the decision of the district judge, which pronounced it subject to condemnation."

THE AURORA, PIKE, MASTER.

The acceptance and use of an enemy's license on a voyage to a neutral port, prosecuted in furtherance of the enemy's avowed objects, is illegal, and subjects vessel and cargo to confiscation.

It is not necessary, in order to subject the property to condemnation, that the person granting the license should be duly authorized to grant it, provided the person receiving it takes it with the expectation that it will protect his property from the enemy.

Sailing, with an intention to further the views of the enemy, is sufficient to condemn the property, although that intention be frustrated by capture.

THIS was an appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The following were the material facts of the case:

Some months after the declaration of war, the ship Aurora, documented as American property, and owned by Thomas M. Clarke and Ebenezer Wheelright, the claimants, who are American citizens, sailed from Newburyport to Norfolk, in ballast. At the latter place she took in a cargo consisting of bread, flour, corn, &c., and sailed from thence on or about the 12th November, 1812, ostensibly for St. Bartholomews, a neutral island belonging to the Swedes, for which port she had obtained *her clearance. The cargo was consigned [204 to the supercargo of the ship. On the 26th November, 1812, she was captured by the American privateer schooner Governor Tompkins, on the high seas. At the time of capture, she was to the leeward of St. Bartholomews, and had on board a British license, which she exhibited to the captors, supposing them to be British. This license consisted of three documents:

1st. A pass for the West Indies, exclusively, from Andrew Allen, His Britannic Majesty's consul, residing at Boston; to which is annexed a copy of a letter, under the consular seal, from Admiral Sawyer to Mr. Allen, as follows:

"To the commanders of any of His Majesty's ships of war or of private armed ships belonging to His Majesty.

"Whereas, from a consideration of the great importance of continuing a regular supply of flour and other dry provisions and lumber to the British islands in the West Indies, it has been deemed expedient by His Majesty's government, that, notwithstanding the hostilities now existing between Great Britain and the United States of America, every protection and encouragement should be given to American vessels laden with flour and other dry provisions and lumber, and bound to the British islands in the West Indies. And whereas, in furtherance of these views of His Majesty's government, Herbert Sawyer, Esq., Vice-Admiral and Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's squadron on the Halifax station, has directed to me a letter under date of the 5th August, 1812, (a copy whereof is hereunto annexed) wherein I am instructed to furnish a copy of his letter, certified under my consular seal, to every American vessel so laden and bound to the West Indies, which is designed as a perfect safeguard and protection to such vessel in the prosecution of such voyage. Now, therefore, in pursuance of these instructions, I have granted to the American ship Aurora, William Augustus Pike, master, burthen 257 47-95ths.

To the above pass was annexed the following copy of a letter from Admiral Sawyer, certified under the consular seal, and alluded to in the above document:

"SIR—"I have fully considered that part of your letter of the 18th ultimo which relates to the means of insuring a constant supply of flour and other dry provisions to Spaiu and Portugal, and to the West India Islands; and, being aware of the importance of the subject, concur in the proposition you have made.

"I shall therefore give directions to the commanders of His Majesty's squadron under my command, not to molest American vessels so laden, and unarmed, bona fide bound to British, Portuguese, or Spanish ports, whose papers shall be accompanied with a certified copy of this letter, under the consular seal.

The Aurora was carried into Newport, Rhode Island, and there libeled. The Circuit Court of that district condemned vessel and cargo as prize to the captor; from which sentence the claimants appealed to this court.

Hunter, for Appellants.

The libel, in this case, sets forth that the sailing was for the purpose of supplying the British West India colouies, aud that the papers stating the voyage to St. Bartholomews were fraudulent and collusive; and urges the coudemnatiou of vessel and cargo, ou the following grouuds:

1. That the possession of and sailing with a British licence is cause of capture and condemnation.

2. That the voyage of the Aurora was intended as an indirect voyage to a British port, through St. Barts.

3. That the real destination of the ship was to a British port.

On the first point it is contended, on the part of the claimants, that the having on board a British license or *pass in a lawful trade [208 to a neutral country, could not, before the act of Congress of August 2, 1813, prohibiting the use of British liceuses, subject a vessel to capture.

This is clear from the act itself, the operation of which is not to commeuce from its passage, but, with regard to vessels then in port, was to take effect in five days after the promulgation of the act; with regard to vessels at a distance from the United States, not until the 1st of November; and in some cases not before the 1st of December following. Hence it is evident that the legislature did not consider this act as merely declaratory of the law of nations on the subject, but as then, for the first time, making the use of a British license by an American vessel, illegal. (Laws of U. S., vol. 12, p. 226.)

But we are bound to meet the general proposition, which is that the use of such a license gives a hostile character to the property and the voyage.

The doctrine that any intercourse with the enemy exposes to condemnation, has been supposed to be very ancient; but we find no case of a decision upon the principle, till the year 1747, when a bill was brought into parliament in consequence of insurance made for enemies. (Parl. debates, vol. 26, p. 178; Sir William Murray's speech on the subject of insuring enemy property; and 1 T. R., 84, Gist v. Mason.)

The rule appears to us to be unreasonable and impolitic. Where is the harm of taking advantage of a relaxation of the rights of war by the enemy? How can that be a crime when granted by the policy of the enemy, which would have been no crime if obtained by force—by conquest? It is not less for our own interest to take advantage of such permission from the enemy than it is for his interest to grant it. It is a public benefit.

The general rule by which to determine the national character of a vessel, is the domicile of the owner. Here, the owners were American citizens. The case of a vessel sailing under the flag or assumed character of a country to which she does not belong, is admitted to be an exception to the general rule. But here was no sailing under such assumed character. All the papers of the Aurora were American, 209] except the one in question, which cannot of itself be sufficient to give a hostile character to the holders of it, nor to the vessel and cargo. (1 N. Y. T. R., 64, Jenks v. Hallet et al.; Chitty's law of nations, 58; case of the Clarissa cited in 5 Rob., 4; The Vrow Elizabeth.)

The only prohibition existing at the time of the sailing of the Aurora was to take a license to a British port. That was prohibited by the act of July 6th, 1812, § 7.

By that act, we admit, all commercial intercourse with the enemy was rendered unlawful; but we contend that it was not unlawful to use a British license in a neutral voyage. (1 Rob., 167, 200, The Hoop.)

Suppose Great Britain should think proper to permit a particular neutral trade—suppose she were even to protect it by convoy—are we bound to refuse to except such permission—such protection?

Valin laughs at the English for restoring, in the form of insurance, the captures made by their cruisers; but does not censure the French merchant for taking it.

The voyage in this case was not made by the license, but merely made safer by it. The voyage was certainly lawful without it; and a license to pursue a voyage which was lawful without it, cannot make that voyage unlawful. (Pamphlet of cases decided in the district courts of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, p. 80, 81; Judge Davis's opinion on the use of British licenses; Judge Peters's opinion, 1 Vez., 317; Duponceau's Bynk., 166.)

On the second point, viz.: That the voyage of the Aurora was intended as an indirect voyage to a British port through St. Barts, it is contended by the claimants that there is no evidence to justify the fact assumed.

Was this a bona fide voyage to St. Barts? On the decision of this point the whole case turns. In discussing this question all the circumstances of the case should be taken into consideration. (Vid. Portalis's opinion in the case of the Pigou, contained in a note to the case of the Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, 98; Vid. also Ch. [*210 J. MARSHALL'S opinion in the case of the Matilda, decided in North Carolina; Hall's law journal, 487.)

With respect to those circumstances attending the transaction, which, on first view, are perhaps calculated to excite a suspicion that this was not a bona fide voyage to St. Barts, it may be observed, that it was the object of the Aurora to deceive the enemy, and thereby obtain an exemption from capture, during the voyage, by inducing him to suppose that the cargo was ultimately intended for the British. Such an imposition, in a case like the present, we conceive was justifiable.

What motive could the Aurora have had for sailing to a British island rather than to St. Barts? At a British island she could only take in a cargo of rum; and the importation of such a cargo was prohibited by our own laws. At St. Barts, she could take in a general West India cargo. Motives of interest, therefore, would have induced her to go to the latter place rather than the former.

But suppose the intention was to go to a British port; was that intention executed? It was not. But according to the decision in the case of the Abby (5 Rob., 254), there must be an act of trading as well as an intention, in order to subject the vessel to condemnation.

On the third point, which, it is presumed, constitutes the stress of the case, we contend that the real destination of the Aurora was not to a British port, and that the condemnation on the ground of a British supply being intended and proceeded in, is erroneous and against proof.

That the supply of the British West Indies was the object of Admiral Sawyer in granting the license, we do not deny; but what his intention was, is perfectly immaterial; such was not our intention in accepting it. Our object was to escape capture; and with that view we obtained a license from the enemy, by inducing him to believe that we intended to furnish supplies to his islands.

*What is said by Allen, the consul, [*211 is mere surplusage; his authority extended no farther than to certify Admiral Sawyer's letter. Having done this, he was functus officio. But suppose the license granted by Allen to have been valid, it was only for a voyage to St. Barts, and would not have protected the Aurora in any other voyage. That was the voyage insured.

J. Woodward, contra.

With regard to the act of August 2, 1813, which has been said, by the counsel for the claimants, to prove that the use of British licenses, previous to the passage of that act, was not unlawful, we are still of opinion that the act is merely in affirmation of the law of nations. It is also cumulative—it adds penalties to what was before unlawful; but does not make anything unlawful which was not so before. The latter clause in the 3d sec. of the act providing "that nothing contained in the said act shall be so construed as to arrest or stay any prosecutions," &c., was intended to guard against the construction which the claimants have now attempted to give it. The several periods of time allowed to vessels in different situations, to obtain notice of the act, were allowed them in order that they might be enabled to avoid the new penalties.

Trading with the enemy was an indictable offense at common law, (2 Rolle's Abr., 173), but it was necessary for Congress to fix the penalty for trading on land; this they have accordingly done in the act of July 6, 1812. By the course of the admiralty, the thing itself was liable to forfeiture for trading with the enemy.

The British papers on board the Aurora show a case of supply, and therefore the question of pass or license is immaterial. The pass was expressly for the purpose of supplying the enemy.

But suppose the papers do not prove a case of supply, the use of the license on the high seas is, of itself, sufficient to give the property a hostile character. The license in this case is essentially different from a general license by an order in council. There no special favor—no particular benefit—is granted.

212*] *The use of a hostile protection in the prosecution of a neutral trade gives a hostile character to the voyage. Sailing under a hostile convoy is good ground of condemnation; Sir William Scott denominates it "illicit protection." Sailing under two commissions is also cause of condemnation. (Valin, p. 241, b. 3, art. 9.) All these cases are analogous to the present. The Aurora was sailing under the physical force of the enemy. Admiral Sawyer's letter requires the British naval force to assist her in the prosecution of her voyage. She must therefore be considered as having placed herself under the protection of the enemy, and as having, consequently, abandoned her national character.

Trading with an enemy was cause of forfeiture at common law; and whatever was cause of forfeiture at common law is good cause of condemnation in the admiralty. (2 Rob., 82, 69, The Walsingham Packet.)

The case of Jenks v. Hallet et al., cited by the claimants, is not applicable to the present case—we were not then at war with France.

Sir William Scott, in the case of the Vigilantia (1 Rob., 11, 13), has laid it down as a known and established rule, that if a vessel is navigating under the pass of a foreign country, she is considered as bearing the national character of that nation under whose pass she sails. Now, what was the license in question but such a pass?

The license is not a document under the law of nations. The granting of it is the exercise of a municipal right—a prerogative to the crown. The king, however, has no right to grant licenses to any but his own subjects, without a particular act of parliament authorizing him so to do. There is no case in which he has granted a license to strangers without such an act of parliament. If a license be granted without such authority, the person who takes it can take it only as a subject. (Chitty's law of nations, 256; Id., 316; 2 Roll. Abr., 173, tit., Prerogative; 1 Rob., 199, 200, The Hoop; 2 Tucker's Bl. Com., 258; Chitty's law of nations, 278; Reeves, 358.)
